[25] It has been suggested that it may not be possible for a Zamindar in this case to check & control whether the sale is made to the bona fide residents of the village only & is made within the limits of the village. This is a question of making some practicable arrangements, but cannot be held to make out that the custom alleged is unreasonable. The next objection that has been raised is that the custom is claimed not in respect of the entire residents of the village, but in respect of a particular section thereof, namely, the Sahars. It is contended that there can be a local customary right in favour of all the residents of a village or all the tenants of a village, but not in respect of inhabitants of a particular denomination in the village. On the other side the cases in Kuar Sen v. Mammal, 17 ALL 87: (1895 A. W N. 10) and Mohidin v. Shivlingappa 23 Bom. 666: (1 Bom. L. R. 170) have been cited to show that the customary rights in favour of a particular class of persons in a village, namely, Muhammadans, have been recognised valid in those cases having regard to the Indian conditions. It would appear that some doubt has been thrown on the correctness of these decisions in the decision of Mukherjee J. in Gopal Krishna v. Abdul Samad, 34 C. L. J. 319 : (A. I. R. (8) 1921 Cal 569) (See also Ram Ran Bijaya Prasad Singh v. Abdul Ghani A. I. R. (26) 1939 Pat. 682: (185 I. C. 350)). But the doubt expressed is only with reference to the question whether a right of burial can be acquired as a customary right & not whether a section of the inhabitants of a village can acquire a customary right. In A. I. R. 1927 Mad. 48 (sic) the validity of a customary right in favour of a particular class of villagers has been recognised. Whatever may be the correct view regarding the general question thus raised, it is noteworthy that the Bihar & Orissa Forest Manual, 1917 Edn. Vol. I, Part II, p. 88, R. 6 relating to the neighbouring Khurda Khasmahal protected forest clearly recognises the right of indigenous tribes of Sahars & Bouris to fell, cut, collect & remove certain specified kinds of forest produce, without any payment for sale, provided the sale is not to unprivileged persons under the rules. Therefore it does appear that so far as this customary right claimed in favour of the aboriginal Sahars is concerned, having regard to local conditions it cannot be held to be unrecognisable in law on the ground that the right is not claimed in respect of the entire inhabitants of the village, which has been negatived.

[26] The next objection that has been taken is that since the right claimed is only in respect of the unreserved portion of the forest & that since the right of the proprietor for constituting a reserve in the forest is not challenged the alleged customary right itself can be defeated by the proprietor's power for reservation & that accordingly such an illusory right cannot be claimed as a valid customary right. This appears to me to be no valid objection at all. If the customary right of the defts as claimed is established & upheld, it follows that the right of the proprietor for constituting reserves in the forest must be subject to it & the question resolves itself to one of properly balancing the two rights in an appropriate manner so as to prevent disputes as pointed out in P. C. case in I. L. R. 31 Cal. p. 503 at p. 510.

[27] There is thus no valid objection to the recognition in law of the customary right as now alleged on any of the grounds that have been arised to it. The defts. must therefore be held entitled to the right & the pltf. must be refused the injunction that he has asked for.

[28] In order to avoid any future misapprehension it is desirable to state that the right recognised by this judgment is one exercisable by the Sahar-residents of Patia & Chandrasekharpur to remove the minor forest produce of annual growth, from the unreserved portion of the Patia jungle, without any payment of fees, for their own domestic consumption & for sale, in small quantities, within the limits of Patia & Chandrasekharpur, to the residents thereof, by removal on head-loads. We do not decide in this case what is the exact nature of the minor forest produce of annual growth to which the right extends & what are the present limits of the reserved forest. But when such a question arises, the report of Mr. Datta, Ex. B &

the map & the report of the estate Amin EXS. 15 & 15-A will have a material bearing. The rights of the Sahars are without prejudice to the proprietory rights of the pltf to the forest so long as there is sufficient unreserved forest left for the legitimate exercise of the rights of the Sahars, (See Bhola Nath v. Midnapore Zamindar Co, 31 Cal. 503 at P. 510: (31 I. A. 75 P. C), for an analogous provision) & is also without prejudice to the right of the pltf. to make such reasonable arrangements as may be required to prevent any gross abuse of the rights having regard to the limitations of the same as above stated.

[29] In the result the appeal must be allowed & the suit dismissed with costs throughout.

P. C. Chatterji—for Applt.; P. V. B. Rao—for Resp.

Jagannadhadas J.—The deft. is the applt. in this second appeal. The appeal arises out of a suit brought by the pltf. for recovery of two plots of lands described in the plaint schedule from the possession of the deft. These two items of land have been purchased in the name of the son of the pltf. under two sale deeds, EXS. B & C, dated 4-10-30 & 4-2-35 respectively. The pltf.'s son died in the year 1942 prior to the suit without leaving any issue. The deft. claims to be in possession as being his married wife. The pltf.'s contention is that the deft. is not the legally married wife of his son & that in any case the suit properties though standing in the name of the son were the joint family properties & that his son died undivided & that therefore the deft. had no title to the property. The Cts. below have found that the pltf. & his deceased son were undivided & that the properties covered in EXS. B & C, though standing in the name of the son, were joint family properties. They also held that the deft. is not proved to be the married wife of the deceased son of the pltf. On these findings both the Cts. below have decreed the pltf.'s suit.

[2] On the state of the law, as it stood on the date of the institution of the suit, namely, 22-12-43, the pltf. was entitled to a decree on the finding that the suit properties were the joint family properties & that the pltf.'s son died undivided from the pltf. There has, however, been a change in the law since, with retrospective operation, which has not been brought to the notice of the Cts. below.

[3] The suit property is situated in Koraput district which is a partially excluded area. The Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act of 1937 (Central Act XVIII [18] of 1937) as amended in 1938 has been extended to the partially excluded areas by notfn. NO. 8306-J, dated 14-12-38. published in the Orissa Gazette dated 23-12 38 at P. 897. After the decision of the F. C. holding that this Act is ultra vires of the Central Legislature, in so far as it relates to agricultural land, the Provincial Legislature has enacted the Orissa Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act (Extension to Agricultural Land in Orissa) of 1944 (Orissa Act V [5] of 1944) enacting that the Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act shall apply also to agricultural land & it is further enacted that the extension is to be with retrospective operation. This Orissa Act has been extended to all the partially excluded areas including Koraput Dist. by notfn. NO. 3401 J., dated 9-9-44, published in Orissa Gazette dated 15-9-1944 at P. 228.

[4] There can be no doubt, therefore, that if the deft. is the married wife of the pltf.'s son, she is entitled to her husband's share in the joint family property including the suit property.

[5] In this view as to the change of law, the outstanding crucial question in the case is whether the deft. is the married wife of the pltf.'s son. Though both the Cts. below found against the deft. on this question as a fact, it appears to me that this question has not received proper judicial attention in view of the other findings against her which were in the then state of law sufficient to entitle the pltf. to a decree. Two issues relevant to this point were raised at the trial, viz.,

Issue 3, whether the deft. is the legally married wife or a concubine of late Bhagaban Biswoi (pltf.'s son), Issue 4, whether there is any custom in the caste of the parties enabling a concubine to succeed & if so, is such custom legal and valid.

The trial Ct. found on issue (3) as follows :

"I have therefore no reason to disbelieve the pltf.'s witnesses that she was kept by the pltf.'s son."

On issue (4) he finds :

"Under the circumstances, she (deft. can, in my opinion, be taken to have occupied the same position as a married wife & to have got the same right to the property of her deceased husband in the absence of any custom or authority to the contrary."

[6] The appellate Ct. finds as follows :

"As appears from the evidence of the caste people, she was the concubine of his son & no marriage ceremony was gone through to celebrate the marriage between his son & the deft., even though she was admitted to the caste after purification & caste dinner."

He also finds that

"there was no tangible evidence on record to support the finding of the learned Munsif that the deft. must be taken to have occupied the position of a married wife so as to be entitled to inherit the property left by her husband."

[7] The suggestion that though a concubine, she was, by custom, entitled to inherit to her husband's property on account of her being treated as a married wife needs no serious consideration, because, as held by the learned Subordinate Judge on appeal, there was absolutely no evidence in support of this & counsel for the applt has not attempted to put his case on that footing. As regards the finding of fact about the married status of the deft. the Cts. below have come to halting findings & do not appear to have appraised the evidence from the correct legal standpoint. They have not realised that most of the evidence is inadmissible. The most important circumstance in the case on this matter which the trial Ct. has not noticed & which the appellate Ct. has not properly appraised, though it has noticed it is the fact that in the document, Ex. D dated 15-7-41, executed by the pltf's. son in favour of the deft., he makes a categorical statement that she is his married wife. Ex. D purports to be a deed of gift of the suit plots, but being unregistered is not operative. It is however admissible in evidence with reference to the collateral recitals therein. The pltf's. son, the executant of the document, being dead, his statement that the deft. is his legally married wife, is clearly admissible under S. 32, cl. (5), Evidence Act. It is not suggested that there was any dispute at the time with reference to which the pltf.'s son made a tendentious statement in favour of the deft. This document appears to have been put in evidence after the pltf.'s examination was over, but the pltf. could have been recalled to speak to any circumstance relating to the document which may weaken the value to be attached to these recitals in the document. But that has not been done. All that is suggested on the side of the resp. is that this document is not genuine. But we cannot accept this suggestion. It has been formally proved on the side of the deft. by an attestor thereto O, D. W. 3 & it appears from the exhibit-list that this has been marked without objection. The recital in the document, Ex. D made by the pltf's. son that the deft. is his married wife is, in my opinion, sufficient to throw the burden of proof entirely on the pltf. to show that the deft. is not the married wife of this son. It is true that the deft. has no other evidence to support her case apart from this recital & her own evidence. No doubt she appears to have said as D. W. 1 "Bhagaban kept me as his wife." Too much stress, however, cannot be laid on the use of the word "kept" in the deposition, remembering that she must have given her evidence in Oriya. She has categorically stated in her written statement that she was the married wife & rebutted the pltf's. averment that she was his concubine. It cannot be easily assumed that she totally gave up that case in her evidence. The question, therefore, is whether there is sufficient evidence on the side of the pltf. to rebut the presumption in favour of the deft. The pltf. & his witnesses P. Ws. 2 to 6, in effect, did nothing more than to assert that she was the concubine of Bhagaban, of these only P. Ws. 4 & 5 belong to the same caste as of the parties, namely, Sudhi caste but belong to villages different from the pltf's. village. Neither they, nor any of the other witnesses are shown to have had any special means of knowledge. Evidence of this kind is nothing more than mere opinion which, to be admissible, must be the opinion of persons having special means of knowledge & expressed by conduct according to S. 50, Evidence Act. Further it is doubtful whether under that section, evidence of non-existence of relationship is admissible. (See the instructive judgment in Chandulal v. Bibi Khatemonnessa A. I. R. (30) 1943 Cal. 76 at p. 80 (col. 2): (I. L. R. (1942) 2 Cal. 299)). Evidence of concubinage is evidence of non-existence of relationship. In any case the opinion must be expressed in conduct. In this case, as found by both the Cts. below, the conduct if any is the other way. The pltf. & his witnesses admit that the deft. who belongs to the Sundhi caste has been admitted to the caste after purification ceremony. The pltf. also admits that she cooks in his family & in the feasts & even in the funeral feast she sat in the same row & ate. The evidence adduced, therefore, is wholly insufficient to displace the presumption which arises in her favour under Ex. D. The pltf's. witness have given evidence that the deft. before she came to live with the pltf's son was living in concubinage with some persons & that she was at one time also the married wife of one Krishno. Her previous immoral character, if any, has no bearing in the case except as improbablising that the husband would not have taken her in marriage. But that cannot rebut the proof of marriage afforded by the husband's statement, Ex. D. If it was positively proved that when she was entertained by the pltf's. son, her relationship with him started in concubinage, the position might have been different as found in the cases in Mt. Jarintool Butool v. Mt. Hoseinee Begum, 11 M. I. A. 194 : (10 W. R. 10 P. C.) &Ghazanfar Ali Khan v. Mt. Kaniz Fatima, 32 ALL. 345 : (6 I. C. 674 P. C,) & other cases. The suggestions that she was at one time the married wife of one Krisbo might also if proved, have gone against the deft. If it appeared that she continued to be the married wife of Krishno by the time when her relationship with Bhagaban started, then her alleged marriage would have been invalid. But it appears from the evidence on the plf's side itself that she was driven away by Krishno within about three months of her marriage with him & also that Krishno had died since (prior to her coming under the protection of Bhagaban, see evidence of P. W. 5). It is not shown that in this caste the remarriage of a divorced woman or of a widow is prohibited. The deft. being admittedly of the same caste no legal bar to the marriage has been made out. The appellate Ct. appears to have assumed that the evidence shows that no ceremony to celebrate the marriage was gone through. There is, however, excepting the vague statements of the witnesses that she was a concubine, which are really inadmissible, no positive evidence of competent persons that no ceremony took place at all or what were the customary ceremonies for marriage in the caste. The marriage itself, if any, has taken place, according to the deft. about 30 years ago. In such cases & in such circumstances there is a strong presumption in favour of a legal & valid marriage & of the performance of the requisite ceremonies, as has been laid down in a number of cases, starting from Ramamani Ammal v. Kulanthai Natchear, 14 I. A. 346 : (2 Sar. 736). (See also Manjilal v. Chandrabati, 38 Cal. 700 : (38 I. A. 122 P. C.); Bipin Behari v. Atul Krishna, 15 I. C. 328 (2) (Cal.); Sastry Velaider Aronegary v. Sembecutty Vaigalie, (1881) 6 A. C. 365: (50 L. J. P. C. 28) & Inder Singh v. Thakar Singh, 2 Lah. 207: (A. I. R. (8) 1921 Lah. 20)). It is no doubt true as pointed out in Ma Ween Di v. Ma Kin, 35 Cal. 232 : (4 Beng. L. R. 175), by the P. C. that the presumption in favour of lawful marriage is not to be lightly applied to situations where sex relationships are proved to be loose & the appellation "wife" is indiscriminately used. But it is also equally the law as pointed out by P. C. in Mohabbat Ali Khan v. Mahomed Ibrahim Khan, A.I.R. (16) 1929 P.C. 135: (10 Lah. 725) that mere evidence of what may be called class or clan proclivity to concubinage is not admissible in evidence & cannot be used to rebut the presumption of marriage. In the present case there is nothing more than some loose evidence that persons of this caste take women as concubines & treat them as wives. This is the sort of evidence which is inadmissible according to the P. C. case in Mohabbat Ali Khan v. Mahomed Ibrahim Khan, A.I.R. (16) 1929 P.C., p. 135: (10 Lah. 725). There is in this case nothing more than vague evidence that persons of this caste keep concubines & that the deft. lives in concubinage, which is as already pointed out inadmissible or at any rate wholly insufficient to displace the presumption afforded by the recital in her favour in Ex. D. It must, therefore, be found in disagreement with the Cts. below that the deft. is the married wife of the pltf's. deceased son, Bhagaban.

[8] It, therefore, follows that the pltf. cannot treat the deft. as a trespasser & obtain ejectment against her in respect of the suit properties. His remedy, if any, would to be bring a suit for partition of the entire family properties including the suit properties & recover from her such of the properties as may not be allotted to her share. In the result, therefore, the appeal will be allowed with costs & the decrees of the lower Cts. set aside & the suit dismissed. So far as the costs of the Cts. below are concerned, both the parties will bear their respective costs.

M. M. Das—for Petnrs.; Advocate-General & N. Das —for Opposite Party.

Ray C. J.—It arises out of an order of the Munsif of Cuttack refusing to grant a temporary injunction to the pltfs.-petnrs. by way of restraining the deft. 1 (O. P. 1), Hindu Religious Endowments Comr. from levying contribution from the pltf. under the provisions of the Orissa Hindu Religious Endowments Act.

[2] The Comr. in exercise of the powers under the Act declared the endowment a public one, & accordingly, is going to levy the usual contribution which, in this case, amounts to Rs. 80 annually, the aggregate of the claim, at the time the petn. was filed, amounting to Rs. 240. The prayer for injunction has been rejected on two grounds, namely, (i) that the suit having been stayed under S. 3, (Orissa Hindu Religious Endowments Amendment Act (Orissa Act (XXXI [31] of 1947), the Ct. has no power to issue injunction; & (ii) that according to the balance of convenience, the petn. has no merits,

[3] We have to consider two very important questions of law

(i) Whether the suit is one within the purview of s. 3 of the Act, &

(ii) Whether the statutory stay of the suit deprive the Ct. in which a suit of the specified nature is pending of this usual jurisdiction & power to protection to the parties by interlocutory preventive orders, such as, Issue of injunction, appointment of receiver, & attachment of properties before the judgment &c.

[4] The present suit was instituted in the year 1948, that is, after the date of commencement of the Amendment Act. Section 3 reads :

3. (i) Subject to the provisions of sub-s. (2), all suits instituted under the provisions of sub-s. (2) of S. 64 of the said Act & pending on the date of the commencement of this Act shall be stayed for a period of two years from the said date.

(ii) Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-s. (1) the Provincial Govt. may direct that any suit or class of suits stayed under sub-s. (1) shall be proceeded with from the stage which had been reached when the suit was stayed.

[5] The plain grammatical meaning of the language in which the sub-s. (1) has been enacted leads to only one construction, to wit, that the class of suits specified for the purpose of the Act includes those which had been instituted before the commencement of the Act & were pending at the time. It has been very strenuously contended by Mr. Advocate General who represents the Comr. that the section must be so interpreted as to give effect to the intention of the Legislature as gathered from the preamble & the scopes & object of the Act. The part of the preamble material for the purpose is:

"Whereas it is expedient to provide for the stay of certain classes of suits pending further legislation , . . . ," The preamble does not at all indicate that all suits under S. 64 (2), Hindu Religious Endowments Act, & intended to be the target of the legislation for the purpose of stay. The class of suits referred to in the preamble must be those specified in that behalf in S. 3. That the intention of the Legislature was to stay all such suits instituted either before or after the commencement of the Act does not appear from the preamble. It does not proceed to say what further the legislation was going to be nor how the trial of such suits was injurious or harmful to the due administration of the Act. Had there been any such indication that could have been prayed in aid to find out the intention of the Legislature as to what class of suits were intended to be stayed. So the preamble is quite unuseful in this respect. We have, therefore, to confine ourselves to the language in which S. 3 has been enacted. The material words are: "all suits instituted . . . . . & pending on the date of the commencement of this Act. In order to include suits to be instituted after the commencement of the Act in the class of suits specified in the section, one must read "all suits to be instituted "or" all suits whenever instituted". I am unable to introduce these words into the section which would amount to creating a new section or usurping the functions of the Legislature. Besides, the words "all suits instituted" are further controlled by the words "and pending on the date of the commencement of this Act". In order that a suit may come within the purview of the class, it must be one not only instituted but also pending on the date of the commencement of the Act. By any stretch of imagination & without replacing the present section by a new one, it is difficult to conceive that the section, as expressed, can, at all, be construed to include all future suits. Mr. Advocate General referred us to certain passages from Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes in support of his contention that 'and' can be read as 'or'. That too will not improve the position. That would be reading the section as : "all suits instituted "or" (all suits) pending on the date of the commencement of this Act". The meaning of the section remains as it is, even if 'and' is substituted by 'or' or is deemed equivalent thereto. Unless you introduce certain language to the section which would amount to say "all suits when so instituted under the provisions of S. 64 (2) including those pending on the date of the commencement of this Act", you cannot give effect to the contention raised by the learned Advocate General. Besides, as rightly pointed out by my learned brother, in course of argument, sub s. (2) fortifies our view that the construction we have put upon sub-s. (1) is the only admissible one. Sub-s (2) is an enabling provision empowering the Provincial Govt. to direct that any suit shall be proceeded with from the stage which had been reached when the suit was stayed. This could hardly be translated into action in its application to a suit not instituted on or before the commencement of the Act. Any suit which is instituted, if at all, after the commencement of the Act, should never reach any stage so as to be proceeded with from that stage. It is a still-born suit which never breathed nor moved & it is beyond conception that it should, even notionally, reach any stage. That 'stage' is not intended to refer to merely the 'stage' of filling is clear from the language of sub-s. (2) that is 'the stage which had been reached when the suit was stated'. Can it be predicated of a suit filed after the date of commencement of the Act that a stage had been reached before its filing? Could it be reasonably construed that the Legislature intended that the Govt. should exercise the power contemplated in the sub-section only in pre-amendment cases & not in the post-amendment ones? Sub-Ss. (1) & (2) of the section must be taken as co-extensive as to their respective fields of operation, &, in that contingency, sub-s. (2), which is clear in its expression, must be prayed in aid of construction of sub-s. (1). I shall try to read sub s. (1) as divisible into two mutually exclusive or disjuncted parts divided by disjunctive 'or'. In doing so I shall omit the words 'subject to the provisions of sub-s. (2)', as they are common to each of the parts. One part will read:

"All suits instituted under the provisions of sub-s. (2) of S. 64 of the said Act shall be stayed for a period of two years from the said date."

The other part will read "all suits pending on the date of the commencement of this Act shall be stayed". Looking at the two parts severally, the first part may cover-assuming 'instituted' to mean either 'to be instituted 'or' whenever instituted'-post-amendment suits; but what about the second part? The latter contains no words of limitation so as to specify the class of suits but refers to 'all suits' irrespective of any characteristic features. Did the Legislature intend to paralyse the civil administration of justice till two years from the commencement of the Act (XXXI [31] of 1947)? That could be only in the land of absurdities. Another reading of the second part of the sub-section might be "the section itself as a whole so as to define the suits as are instituted before but pending at the Commencement of the Act". This amounts to not reading 'or' for 'and' by way of complete replacement but reading both as 'or' a disjunctive conjunction & also as a conjunctive one. In grammar, when this is intended, the language used is 'and/or'—a formula allowing readers to take either or both of two expressions (e. g. contributions in money and/or garments).

[6] Besides, there are certain other considerations which also compel us to the view. In S. 64 (2), the time limit for instituting a suit challenging the correctness of the Endowments Comr.'s order is one year. The Amendment Act does not raise it to two years or more. If the bar of limitation is to be avoided, the party must file a suit, this amending Act notwithstanding, within one year of the Comr's order, under challenge. He should file the suit, pay c. f. & then be prevented from proceeding further. This could never have been the intention of the Legislature. If it were so, they could have, in very simple language, expressed the section & could have kept operation of sub-S. (2) of S. 64 in abeyance pending further legislation. Unnecessary & unuseful harassment to the members of the public can never be imagined to have been within the contemplation of the Legislature. One construction would have led to consequential amendment of S. 64 or its abeyance for two years & the other would require neither this nor that. Under the circumstances, it is futile to argue that the intention of the Legislature was to harass the people & to compel them to file suits spending money over them but for no purpose. Besides, we are not concerned with nor it is our function to speculate on what the intention of the Legislature could more probably be. It is only when the language employed admits of several constructions, we may accept one in preference to the other in order to give effect to the Legislature's intention when that appears clearly within the four corners of the piece of the legislation, under consideration. Here, neither the intention is clear nor the language admits of more than one construction, namely, the one which we have been forced to put on the section. In our view, therefore the present suit is not one which shall be considered to have been stayed by the Amendment Act (XXXI [31] of 1947).

[7] The next point, for consideration, is that conceding that the suit is within the class of suits which have been stayed, if the Ct. is deprived of his power of giving protection to an aggrieved party by such interlocutory orders as an injunction. This leads us to think that if the Legislature has not prevented the suits from being instituted, they cannot be said to have deprived the Ct. of the powers of protection by maintaining the status quo ante. What has been intended to be stayed must be the trial of the suit challenging the validity of the Comr's order. The matter is not without an authority. In the case of Senaji Kapurchand v. Pannaji Devichand, 46 Bom. 431 : (A I. R. (9) 1922 Bom. 276), it has been held:

"It is competent to the Ct. to pass interlocutory orders, e. g., orders for a receiver or an injunction or an attachment before judgment, where a suit has been stayed under S. 10 of the Procedure Code, 1908".

I find no distinction between the stay, as enacted in S. 10, & the provision for stay in this Act. Both the stays are as against adjudication of the subject matter of dispute. If the Legislature intended that not only the trial of the suit should be stayed but also that in matter of all interim protections against continuance of injury, violence & ravages to one's property he should be made completely defenceless, they must express themselves clearly. To hold that it did so intend, it would be assigning to it attribute of reacting Czar's regime in this land. They could have kept in abeyance or suspense the operation of S. 64 (2), though that should not have been enough, because as against civil wrong, a citizen has got a right to sue under his fundamental right & under Civil P. C. If they did do so it must be with a purpose, namely, at any rate they did not contemplate that they would make the aggrieved defenceless as against a containing wrong by paralysing the interim machinery of temporary protection. If I assume that the Legislature has paralysed & freezed the said machinery, I shall have to assume that the Hindu Religious Endowments Comr. has been let loose upon the public as a licensed despotic autocrat, like Autocrat of all the Russians (title of the Czar)." I cannot conceive for a moment that the Legislature intended such irresistible harassment to the public in relation to their fundamental rights. Under the circumstances we are unhesitatingly of opinion that, even in all suits, which come within the class specified in S. 3 as interpreted by us in the earlier part of this judgment, the Cts. have got the power of passing interlocutory orders by way of protection to the aggrieved by way of maintaining the status quo till the disposal of the suit.

[8] Coming to the merits of this appln. it is contended by the learned Advocate-General that the levy of contribution is not going to be a very serious affair nor to inflict any irreparable loss & injury to the pltfs. & further urges that it being a stone temple situate beyond the homestead of the pltfs.-sebaits, presumably it is a public temple, or in other words, that, prima facie, the order of the Comr. is correct. It is difficult to pre-judge the issue nor is it possible to say that it is easy for the pltfs. to get back the contribution realised from them in case they succeed in the suit. Besides, as Mr. Das, the learned counsel for the petnrs. has put in, the payments of these contributions should naturally reduce correspondingly the funds available for the upkeep of the worship. Under the circumstances, I consider that the balance of convenience is in favour of the petnrs. I should, therefore, allow this petn & direct that deft. 1 be restrained from levying any contribution payable under the provisions of the Orissa Hindu Religious Endowments Act from the pltfs. including the deity & his properties.

[9] The civil revn. is allowed with costs as against deft. 1. Hearing fee is assessed at three gold mohurs.

[10] Panigrahi J.—I agree, but I would like to add a few observations in view of the importance of the matter involved. If the intention of the Legislature was to direct stay of suits to be instituted after the commencement of the Orissa Act No. 31 of 1947, nothing could have been simpler than to say that no suit shall be instituted to challenge the decision of the Endowments Comr. under S. 64 (2) for a period of two years. It would not be legitimate to attribute vagueness to the Legislature when by adopting this simple language it could have brought in all suits instituted before or after the commencement of the Act within its scope. It says that :

"all suits instituted . . . . . & pending on the date of the commencement of this Act shall be stayed for a period of two years from the said date."

'All suits instituted' could only have reference to those that had already been instituted. The words 'and pending' have also to be read conjunctively with the previous clause beginning with 'all suits instituted'. The proper construction should therefore, be that a suit should have been instituted & been also pending on the date of the commencement of the Act if the Act is to apply. Furthermore, the section says that 'a suit shall be stayed for two years from the said date'. How can it be said that a suit shall be stayed for a period of two years from the date of the Act unless it was pending on that date ? To give effect to the words 'for a period of two years from the said date', I am compelled to restrict the operation of S. 3 (1) to suits which were capable of being stayed for two years from the commencement of the Act. This could only apply to a suit which had already been instituted & been pending on the date of the commencement of the Act. Reference to the language of S. 3 (2) also leads to the same result. The Govt. is given the power to direct that a suit shall be proceeded with from the 'stage which had been reached' when the suit was stayed. The suit is stayed under that Act. Therefore, the 'stage' referred to in sub-s. (2) can only be the 'stage' which had already been reached before the commencement of the Act. My third reason for arriving at this conclusion is that the section contemplates stay of 'suits'. Does it mean as was contended by the learned Advocate-General, that the trial of the suit alone is stayed ? That appears to be the meaning of the language used by the Legislature though it could easily have said that 'all proceedings except the trial of suits shall be proceeded with'. Otherwise, we are driven to the position that a suit must be filed under S. 64(2) within one year of the order of the Comr. & must be stayed under the Act XXXI [31] of 1947 as soon as filed. The result would be preposterous because the Ct. cannot check the plaint nor can even order for supply of deficit c.-f. nor can do any thing in the way of progress of the suit. If this were the intention of the Legislature, as strict construction of the language would lead us to hold, we arrive at the same conclusion namely, that the Act would not apply to a suit filed subsequent to the commencement of the Act.

[11] I am also inclined to accept the contention of the learned Advocate-General &, in agreement with my Lord, will hold that no proceeding other than adjudication of the rights involved in the suit was intended to be stayed & that the Ct. is at liberty to pass interim or interlocutory orders as may be necessary from time to time, in the interest of justice. In the present case, I do not see how the balance of convenience can be on the side of the Comr. It is urged for him that the money now paid can, at any time, be recovered from the Comr. &, therefore, no injunction should issue. It is equally that the Comr. can go on with his administration of endowment even without payment of any sum by the petnrs. & administration of religious endowments is not likely to suffer because of the non-payment of the contribution levied on the petnrs. I have, therefore, no hesitation in arriving at the same conclusion, namely, that this is a fit case in which the injunction should issue restraining the Comr. from realising contribution from the petnrs. The petn. should be allowed with costs, as proposed by my Lord the learned Chief Justice.

Advocate-General & B. Mohapatra—for Applts.; P. C. Chatterji, B. N. Das & B. Dube—for Resps.

Narasimham J.—These two appeals are by the defts. against the judgment of the Subordinate Judge of Sambalpur reversing the judgment of the Munsif of Bargarh & decreeing the pltf's. suit for a declaration that they have the sole and exclusive right to appoint & dismiss a Nariha who is a village servant & that the revenue authorities have no right to interfere in any way with the exercise of that right by the pltfs.

[2] Pltf. 1 is the Lambardar Gaontia of Mouza Gudesira which is a Gaontiahi village in Sambalpur district. Pltfs. 2 to 5 are the Punches of the said village who are elected by the raiyats for the purpose of assisting the Lambardar in the management of the village. In the last settlement deft. 1 was recorded as a Nariha in respect of 9·42 acres of land which were held by him rent-free (Ex. 2 A). In the wazib-ul-arz of the village (Ex. 2) it is recorded that the Nariha may be dismissed & deprived of his service lands by the Lambardar & the Punches for failure to render due service. The duties of a Nariha have not been clearly described in the wazib-ul-arz; but from the Settlement Reports of Dewar (1906) & Hamid (1926) it appears that a Nariha is a village servant whose duties are those of a herdsman & water-carrier of the whole village. Sometime in 1930, the Lambardar & the Punches dismissed deft 1 from his post as Nariha & appointed one Nitai Bhoi in his place. Then they applied to the S. D. O., Bargarh, under S. 58, C. P. Tenancy Act for ejectment of deft. 1 from his holding & for putting the newly appointed Nariha Kasiram Bagar in possession of the said holding. The S. D. O. passed orders for ejecting deft. 1 & putting his successor in his place (Ex. 1). But on appeal the D. C. of Sambalpur (Ex. B 2) held that deft. 1 had been wrongfully dismissed by the Lambardar & the Punches & therefore, set aside the eviction order of the S. D. O. Against this order of the D. C. an appeal was preferred to the Comr. Mr. C. L. Philip who by his order dated 11-7-32 (Ex. B-3) maintained the order of the D. C. & observed that the power of the Lambardar & the Punches to dismiss a Nariha was not arbitrary but that it should be exercised reasonably & that before passing such an order there should be a clear finding as regards his specific neglect of duty & further the reasons for his dismissal should be formally recorded. Soon after the passing of this order by the Ct. the Lambardar & the Punches drew up proceedings & again dismissed deft. 1 on 31-10-32. This second order of dismissal was confirmed by the S. D. O., Bargarh but was set aside by the D. C. Sambalpur. There was a further appeal to the Comr. Mr. E. S. Hoernle who by his order dated 16 9-33 (Ex. B-4) maintained the order of the D. C. reinstating deft. 1. But at the same time he pointed out certain anomalies caused by the absence of clearly defined duties of the Nariha & suggested that if the dispute should recur, a responsible officer should define not merely the theoretical but also the practical limits of his duties. On 15 2-34 the S. D. O, after visiting the village & persuading the parties to agree to settle their differences, passed an order enumerating the various duties to be performed by deft. 1 as Nariha for the village community (Ex. 4). The necessity for enumerating the various duties of a Nariha arose chiefly because there was a serious difference of opinion between the Lambardar & the Punches on the one hand & deft. 1 on the other as to what were his 'due duties'. Against this order of the S. D. O. enumerating the duties of deft. 1 there was an appeal to the D. C. who by his order dated 17-4-34 (Ex. 5) directed the S. D. O. to make furthat enquiries. The S. D. O. then held a further enquiry & passed orders on 23 6 34 (Ex. 6) clarifying the nature of the duties of the Nariha in certain respects. Against this order also there was an appeal to the Comr. who by his order dated 16-12-34 (Ex. B 5) rejected the appeal as being not maintainable; but suggested to the D. C. that some attempt should be made to settle the dispute by compromise. Apparently subsequent attempts at compromise by the revenue authorities proved abortive & then the dispute between the parties was again taken to the Comr. who by his order dated 12-7-35 (Ex. B 6) allowed deft. 1 to continue in the service holding as a Nariha. In this order also he made some observations regarding the anomalies arising out of the existence of these obsolete service holdings. It appears that he intended to visit the spot himself & settle the matter; but subsequently gave up the idea & the D. C. Sambalpur, by his order dated 30-6-37 (EX. B-7) warned the Lambardar Gaontia (pltf. 1) from creating any trouble. The Gaontia again appealed to the Revenue Comr. Sir John Dain who by his order dated 13-3-38 (EX. B-8) refused to interfere observing as follows :

"I am not prepared to pass any orders in this case. The whole arrangement is an anachronism & no longer workable. The authorities can enforce a custom which is certain & reasonable. They cannot enforce a custom which the passage of time has rendered unreasonable. Nor can they, as one of my predecessors has suggested, modify that custom or attempt to adopt it to present conditions. The whole of the Sambalpur law will come under review shortly, & no doubt provision will be made as has been made in C. P. to resume their service tenures when the service can no longer be rendered. Till then nothing can be done."

[3] I may at this stage further point out that when the revenue authorities refused to evict deft. 1 from his holding or to put one Kasiram Bagar who was appointed by the Lambardar & the Punches in his place, the said Kasiram instituted a civil suit against deft. 1 in the Ct. of the Munsif of Bargarh. But that suit was dismissed by the Munsif (EX. C) on the ground that the civil Ct. had no jurisdiction to try the same.

[4] In the present litigation the Lambardar & the Punches have impleaded the Nariha & the Province of Orissa as defts. & prayed for a declaration to the effect that their right to appoint & dismiss a Nariha who is a village servant was unfettered & that the revenue authorities have no right to interfere in the matter in any way. In support of this right they had relied on the entries in the wazib-ul-arz which under S. 82, C. P. Land Revenue Act, 1881 should be presumed to be correct until the contraty is shown. There is absolutely no evidence on record to show that the entries in the wazib-ul-arz are incorrect. On the other hand, from the orders of the Comr. dated 11-7-32 (EX. 1-A) & 16-9-33 (EX. 1-B) it is clear that the revenue authorities also recognised the right of the Lambardar & the Punches to dismiss a Nariha but they pointed out that this right should be exercised reasonably & that an arbitrary exercise of that right may be subject to interference by the revenue authorities.

[5] The main question for decision, therefore, is whether this view of the revenue authorities is correct or else whether the Lambardar & the Punches have an absolutely unfettered right to appoint & dismiss a Nariha. In considering this question it is necessary to discuss briefly some of the relevant provisions of the C. P. L. R. Act & the C. P. T. Act. In the C. P. L. R. Act there is absolutely no provision regarding the duties of any village servant other than the village watchmen. So far as the village watchman is concerned, express provisions were made in S. 147-A & in the rules framed thereunder. His duties were clearly prescribed & the power of appointing & dismissing him was vested only in the D. C. As regards other class of village servants the Act is entirely silent & it may be reasonably inferred that their duties & other conditions of service were left to be regulated by village customs which were embodied in the wazib ul-arz prepared by the Settlement Officer under S. 79 of that Act which by virtue of S. 82 of that Act should be presumed to be correct. But the Lambardar is not an independent authority. His appointment & dismissal rests with the Revenue Officers & under the rules made under S. 137 of that Act the Lambardar himself may be removed from office by the D. C. for gross misconduct. Oppression of village servants by arbitrary appointment & dismissal may, in some circumstances, constitute sufficient misconduct so as to render the Lambardar liable for dismissal. Therefore the Lambardar cannot legally maintain that in exercise of his powers under the wazib-ul-arz he cannot be subject to any interference by the revenue authorities. Moreover, in the wazib-ul-arz it is clearly stated that the Lambardar shall be responsible for the management of the village. He thus owes a clear responsibility to the Govt. through the revenue authorities for proper management of the village & oppression of any class of village servants would necessarily indicate improper management & as such would bring his action within the scrutiny of the Revenue Officers.

[6] If the relevant provisions of the C. P. T. Act are scrutinised the position becomes much more clear. Chapter V of that Act deals with village service tenants of whom Nariha is clearly one. Section 58 of that Act says that no village service tenant shall be ejected from his holding except in execution of an order for ejectment passed by a Revenue Officer on some specified grounds. This section has obviously been framed with a view to prevent arbitrary ejectment of village service tenants. Only a Revenue Officer has the power to turn him out of the holding for certain well-defined grounds & his order is subject to appeal & revn. before higher Revenue authorities. At first sight this section may appear to conflict with the provisions in the wazib ul-arz which confer on the Lambardar & the Punches the right to appoint & dismiss a Nariha & deprive him of his holding. Even if there be such a conflict the provisions in the statute would obviously override any entry regarding the village customs contained in the wazib ul-arz. But I am not satisfied that there is really any conflict between the two. Both of them have to be construed together & if such a construction is adopted it will be clear that after the Lambardar & the Punches have passed an order dismissing a Nariha the actual ejectment of the Nariha from his holding should be done by the Revenue Officer under S. 58. In fact cl. (d) of sub s. (1) of that Section specifies dismissal from office as one of the grounds for which a Revenue Officer may eject a village service tenant. Therefore, before exercising the powers under S. 58, the Revenue Officer has to be satisfied that the village servant has been dismissed from his office. The question arises as to the nature & extent of the enquiry that he can legally make for the purpose of so satisfying himself. It was argued that all that law permits him is to examine whether in fact the Lambardar & the Punches have dismissed the Nariha & that he has no jurisdiction to consider whether the dismissal was on proper grounds or not or else whether it was unreasonable. It is doubtless true that neither in the C. P. L. R. Act nor in the C. P. T. Act is there any provision conferring on the revenue authorities appellate jurisdiction over the action of a Lambardar & the Punches in dismissing a Nariha. Therefore, the revenue authorities cannot claim to have the right to enter into the merits of the order of dismissal, analyse the findings on facts or come to an independent finding of their own as regards the propriety or otherwise of such an order; but they have no doubt jurisdiction to enquire whether the dismissal was 'lawful' or not. It is true that in cl. (d) of sub-s. (1) of S. 58 the expression 'lawful' has not been inserted before the word 'dismissed.' But in sub-s (1) of S. 56 it is clearly stated that the right of a village service tenant in his holding is lost only when he is 'lawfully dismissed.' The power of the Revenue Officer to eject a village service tenant arises only when the latter's right in his holding is lost & therefore, if sub-s. (1) of S. 56 is read along with cl. (d) of sub-s. (1) of S. 58 the reasonable construction is that in that clause also the Legislature meant that the dismissal should be lawful though they did not expressly say so. Therefore, there can be no doubt that the Revenue Officer has full jurisdiction to enquire into the lawfulness or otherwise of an order of dismissal passed by the Lambardar & the Punches. It is difficult to lay down exhaustively the various grounds which would render such dismissal 'unlawful.' Obviously substantial defects in procedure such as the failure to frame a specific charge, & the omission to give the village servant reasonable opportunity to show cause against his dismissal or any substantial defect in the constitution of the authority dismissing him such as the failure of the Lambardar to consult the Punches would be clear grounds for holding that the dismissal is unlawful. Similarly any fraud on the exercise of the power such as dismissal for some private grudge though ostensibly acting in exercise of the power may be a good ground. Difficulty, however, arises in deciding whether the Lambardar & the Punches are the final authority to decide what are 'due services' to be rendered by a Nariha to the villagers. The Wazib-ul arz does not specify those due services. Apparently they are of a customary nature & the settlement authorities while allowing the customs to continue did not specify them in detail trusting to the good sense of the Lambardar & the Punches. But as the Lambardar himself is responsible to the Govt. for the proper management of the village & as he is liable to be dismissed for gross misconduct it seems obvious that any attempt by him (with the help of the Punches) to enlarge the 'due services' of a Nariha so as to make him practically a private servant of the Lambardar & his favourites can be questioned by the revenue authorities while considering whether the Nariha should be ejected under S. 58, C. P. T. Act The general control of the revenue authorities over the actions of the Lambardar is clearly implied in the provisions of the C. P. L R. Act & the very fact that while enacting the C. P. T. Act the Legislature thought that the power of evicting a village service tenant from his holding should be retained exclusively by the Revenue Officer indicates that the Legislature did not intend that a village service tenant should be entirely at the mercy of the Lambardar & the Punches. The pltfs.' claim to an unfettered right to dismiss a Nariha must fail though it must also be added that the revenue officers cannot take upon themselves the functions of an appellate authority over the actions of the Lambardar & the Punches in dismissing a Nariha.

[7] An attempt was made to distinguish between a 'village servant' & a 'village service tenant.' This distinction is not material for the purpose of this litigation. In the Wazib-ul-arz the expression 'village service tenant' does not appear but the expresssion used is only 'village servant.' In Chap. V, C. P. T. Act, however, the former expression alone occurs. In Chap. VI of the Hamid Settlement Report (pp. 27-28) no such distinction is maintained between the two expressions. Apparently when the service aspect is emphasised, the expression 'village servant' is used & when the tenancy aspect is emphasised in the C. P. T. Act the expression 'village service tenant' is used. Nothing material, however, turns on this distinction.

[8] I may now consider some other technical points that were urged. Firstly, it was urged that the Province of Orissa was not a proper party. It is doubtless true that the Province of Orissa is not a necessary party in this litigation but as the cause of action arose from the orders of the various Revenue Officers it cannot be said that the Province of Orissa is not a proper party. Secondly, it was urged that a declaratory suit of this type is barred by S. 42, Specific Relief Act, inasmuch as the pltfs. have not prayed for any consequential relief. Strictly speaking, no consequential relief can be validly prayed for in the Civil Ct. The main refief which the pltfs. seek is the ejectment of deft. 1 from his service holding & putting it in the possession of his successor appointed by them. This power is however exclusively vested in the Revenue Officers by S. 58, C. P. T. Act & S. 95 of that Act expressly bars the jurisdiction of the Civil Ct. over such matters. There is no other consequential relief that the pltfs. could pray for & consequently it cannot be said that the pltfs. were able to seek further relief & that they omitted to do so, as required by the proviso to S. 42 of this Specific Relief Act.

[9] The present suit in essence is a suit for the proper construction of S. 58, C. P. T. Act & relevant entries in the Wazib-ul-arz regarding the rights of the Lambardar & the Punches. The revenue authorities gave an interpretation against which the pltfs. felt aggcieved. The question arises as to whether a pure declaratory suit of this type would be maintainable. But this point seems to have been set at rest by the P. C. decision in Robert Fisher v. Secy. of State, 22 Mad. 270 : (26 I. A. 16 P. C.), where it was held that :

was maintainable. This has been followed in Venkataraghaviah v. Subbiah, A. I. R. (18) 1931 Mad. 502 : (136 I. C. 38) ; Secretary of State v. Subba Rao, A. I. R. (20) 1933 Mad. 618 : (56 Mad. 749) & Sri Krishna Chandra v. Mahabir Prasad, A. I. R. (20) 1933 ALL. 488 : (55 ALL. 791 F. B.). I would, therefore, hold that the suit is maintainable.

[9-A] Next it was argued by Mr. Purohit that under S. 97, C. P. T. Act, this suit was cognizable only by a Civil Ct. having revenue jurisdiction & not by an ordinary Civil Ct. I do not think S. 97, C. P. T. Act would apply to a suit of this type. This suit is not between a landlord & a tenant as such. Doubtless a Lambardar is a landlord & deft. 1 as Nariha is a village service tenant under that Act but the suit has nothing do to with their relationship as landlord & tenant. Here there is no question of terminating the tenancy by evicting the tenant or determining any other incident of tenancy. As already pointed out, the suit in substance is merely a suit for true construction of S. 58, C. P. T. Act & the Wazil-ul-arz so as to set aside the orders of the revenue authorities maintaining deft. 1 in the holding notwithstanding his dismissal by the Lambardar & the Punches.

[10] Lastly I take up the question of limitation. It was conceded that Art. 120, Limitation Act, applies to the present case. On behalf of the applts. it was urged that the cause of action accrued on 11-7-32 when the Comr. Mr. Philip (EX. 1 A) gave his own view of the powers of the Lambardar & the Punches to dismiss a Nariha & maintained the order of the D. C. declining to give effect to such dismissal. The suit was filed more than six years after that date & it was therefore urged that the suit was not maintainable. On behalf of the resps. however, it was urged that the cause of action did not arise till the final order of the Revenue Comr. Sir John Dain on 19-3-48 refusing to pass any orders in the case & that from 1932 to 1938 the parties were fighting out the dispute before the revenue authorities. From the narrative of facts stated above it would appear that on two distinct dates the resps. dismissed deft. 1. The first order of dismissal was passed sometime in 1931-32. That order was ignored by the D. C. & also by Mr. Philip by his order dated 11-7-32 (EX. 1-A). On receipt of this order of the Comr. the Lambardar & the Punches drew up formal proceedings against deft. 1 & again dismissed him from the post on 31-10-32. They then applied to the S. D. O. to give effect to this order & this was the subject-matter of the dispute between the parties in the Revenue Cts. till the passing of the final order by Sir John Dain on 13-3-38 (EX. B-8). If the first order of Mr. Philip dated 11-7-32 be taken as the starting point the suit is well within time. It should however be noted that in none of the orders did the Comr. deny the pltf's. right to dismiss the Nariha but all that he pointed out was that though they had legal right, that right was to some extent subject to scrutiny by the revenue authorities with a view to satisfy themselves that the right had been exercised reasonably & in good faith. It was urged that the pltfs. were claiming an unfettered right to dismiss a Nariha & since this right was interfered with by the orders of the Comr. the right of the pltfs. to sue arose when there was the first denial of that right in the first order of the Comr. in the year 1932. Even if this argument be accepted, I think limitation would run only from the last order of the Comr. in the year 1938. The pltfs. are lawful holders of offices, namely, the office of a Lambardar & the office of the Punches. They were in possession of those offices & whenever there was an interference with the performance of their duties as such a fresh cause of action arose. As pointed out in Annaswami Aiyangar v. Adivarachari, A. I. R. (28) 1941 Mad. 81 : (I. L. R. (1941) Mad. 275 F. B.) the interference by the Comrs. did not affect the position of the pltfs. as Lambardar & Punches & therefore they were not bound to institute a suit when there was the first interference. They could bide their time & whenever there was such an interference a fresh cause of action arose. So far as the second order of dismissal dated 31-10-32 is concerned, it is not seriously contended that limitation would only run from the last order of the Comr. in the year 1938. From 1933 to 1938 the dispute was fought out before the revenue authorities &

"Limitation cannot be deemed to run so long as the adverse order is sub judice or is being challenged by the persons against whom it was made by an appeal to a higher tribunal & is liable to be set aside or to merge in the decision of the tribunal."

Bans Gopal v. Basdeo Singh, A. I. R. (4) 1917 Oudh 168 : (20 O. C. 126).

[11] I would, therefore allow the appeals, set aside the order of the Subordinate Judge & restore the order of the learned Munsif dismissing the suit. Both parties will bear their own costs.

[12] Jagannadhadas J.— I agree with my learned brother that the pltf's claim to an unfettered right to dismiss a Nariha must fail on a proper construction of the relevant provisions of the C. P. Tenancy Act. The Wazib-ul-arz of the village EX. 2 no doubt recognises the right of the Lambardar & the Punches to dismiss a Nariha for failure to render due service & S. 56, C. P. Tenancy Act, states that the right of the village service tenant in his holding is lost when he is lawfully dismissed. Though the Wazib-ul-arz states that on dismissal the Nariha may be deprived of his service lands by the Lambardar & the Punches, the actual ejectment can only be done through the intervention of the revenue officer, the power to eject the village service tenants for one or other of the grounds specified under S. 58, C. P. Tenancy Act, being vested only in the revenue officials. Therefore on a proper construction of the Wazib-ul-arz taken with Ss. 56 & 58, C. P. Tenancy Act, it is reasonably clear that while the Lambardar & the Punches have the power to dismiss the Nariha on his failure to perform the service, if they want it to be followed up by deprivation of the service lands that can only be done through the machinery of a decree by the revenue officer. The jurisdiction vested in the revenue officer to decree ejectment on the ground of dismissal is not a power vested in him merely to execute & give effect to the order of dismissal. When a statutory tribunal is vested with the jurisdiction to exercise a specific power in a certain event & on the existence of certain facts, that tribunal has undoubtedly the power to examine the existence & the legal validity of the facts & the events which give rise to the power. The revenue officer has the power to eject on the ground that the Nariha has been dismissed from the service. Before ejecting him therefore he must be satisfied about the dismissal, that is, not only that he was in fact dismissed, but also that he has been lawfully dismissed, for as a matter of substantive right, it is clear from S. 56 that it is only on lawful dismissal that the right of the village service tenant is lost. The question whether he has been lawfully dismissed depends on the further question whether the Nariha has failed to render due service & whether the dismissal has been otherwise proper. It is therefore clear that while the power of dismissal is vested in the Lambardar & the Punches & while that dismissal does not require the confirmation or approval of the revenue officer & is not open to appeal or revn. as such, the revenue officer has the right & the duty to examine the dismissal when his jurisdiction is invoked for the purpose of ejecting the village service tenant from his service land. It has been sought to be argued on behalf of the Govt. that though the Wazib-Ul-urz (Ex. 2) records the custom that the Nariha may be dismissed by the Lambardar & the Punches, it cannot be accepted as a correct record of the then existing customary right. Reference has been made to the settlement reports of Russel, Nethersal, Dewar & Hamid. Russel's settlement report mentions in a general way with reference to village servants other than Jhankar & Ganda that the general control was given to the Gountia. Nethersal's report has nothing specific to say about it. Dewar's settlement report contains the note that such village servants may be dismissed & deprived of their service land by the Gountia & the Punches for failure to render due service. Hamid's settlement report states the same, but with the change that the word "Lambardar" is substituted in the place of "Gountia". It was therefore argued that there was nothing more than the general control at the start & that too was given only to Gountia & that later on the power of dismissal was being exercised by the Gountia & the Punches & at a later date the power was being exercised by the Lambardar & the Punches. It is suggested that this indicates that the practice was varying from time to time & that therefore the wazib-ul-urz (Ex. 2) cannot be taken to be the evidence of a definite & settled customary right which vests in the Lambardar & the Punches. I do not think this argument is permissible in view of the statutory presumption arising in favour of the entries in the Wazib-ul-urz under S. 82, C. P. L. R. Act as pointed out by my learned brother. The weight to be given to the wazib ul-urz cannot be whittled down by reference to the entries in the earlier settlements & by taking them as disproving the correctness of the entry which shows the existence of the right. Indeed the revenue authorities themselves have, throughout the course of the dispute relating to this very Nariha from 1922 to 1938, consistently recognised that the power of dismissal was not vested in themselves, but that it was vested in the Lambardar & the Punches. As early as in 1922, it has been stated in the report (Ex B dated 15-11-1922) that the decision of the Gountia & the Punches relating to dismissal is final & not open to revn. by the revenue Ct. In the order of the Revenue Comr. dated 7-7-1932 (Ex. B-3), the correctness of the note in the wazib-ul-urz vesting the power of dismissal in the Lambardar & the Punches for failure to render due service was recognised & it was stated that while that power did not mean that the dismissal would be arbitrary, unquestionably the power of dismissal did vest in the Lambardar & the Punches. This position has also been recognised in the order of the Revenue Comr. dated 15-9-1933 (Ex. B 4), in which it was specifically stated that in legal theory, the village officials had the right to dismiss the Nariha. Therefore it is impossible to uphold the extreme contention raised on behalf of the Govt. that the ultimate power of dismissal was vested only in the Govt. officials on the ground that the service lands are the lands granted by the Govt. It is equally impossible to uphold the contention urged on behalf of the Lambardar & the Punches that they have the sole & unfettered right to exercise the power of dismissal in such manner as to compel the revenue authorities to eject the village service tenant from his service holding on a bare production of their order of dismissal. The position may be summed up as follows :

[13] The power of dismissal is vested in the village officials. The revenue officials are not in any sense either the confirming or the appellate authority in respect of such dismissal. They are, however, not merely an executing Ct. to give effect to the orders of dismissal passed by the village officials. When approached for ejectment, they have the right & the duty to examine the factum & the legal validity of the dismissal. It is neither feasible nor possible for this Ct. to lay down the exact scope of the authority of the revenue officials in such circumstances excepting to indicate the above broad limits. Since however the whole history of this litigation at least from 1930-1938 has turned on the question as to whether the Nariha has or has not failed to render due service, it is necessary to state that on the question as to what is due service, the village officials have not the final voice. The revenue officer as part of his jurisdiction, to determine whether there has been lawful dismissal, can also determine whether there has been failure of due service & as incidental to that can also determine whether the view of the village officials as to what is due service is correct. He can therefore determine what all comes within the scope of due service. For that determination he must investigate what the custom is. While he cannot have the power to vary the custom, he has the normal power of a judicial tribunal to interpret it with reference to considerations of practicability under changed circumstances. But it must also be clearly stated that the revenue officials cannot shirk this duty of ascertaining & interpreting the custom & determining what amounts to failure of due service on considerations of difficulty as has been done by the revenue Comr. Sir John Dain in his order dated 13-3-1938 (Ex. B 8), wherein he stated:

"I am not prepared to pass any orders in this case. The whole arrangement is an anachronism & no longer workable."

When the power of dismissal is vested by law in the village officials & the village officials have properly & lawfully dismissed the village servant, the revenue authorities are bound to give effect to it by ejecting the tenants from the lands subject to their jurisdiction as above stated of finding whether the dismissal is lawful. If as Sir John Dain says the arrangement is no longer workable, that can be no ground for their refusal to exercise their power of ejectment. It has been suggested in the course of the arguments that the wording of S. 58, C. P. Tenancy Act, leaves a discretion with the revenue officials to refuse to eject a village service tenant even if any of the grounds mentioned in the section are made out. I am not prepared to construe S. 58 as vesting a mere discretionary power in the revenue officials. The negative working of S. 58, sub-s. (1) is that "a village service tenant shall not be ejected from his holding except in execution of an order of ejectment on one or the other of the grounds specified" cannot be construed as vesting an overriding discretion in the revenue officer to refuse ejectment even when those grounds are made out. It is merely a prohibition against ejectment by any other machinery. If as Sir John Dain says the arrangement is an anachronism & is not workable the remedy probably lies in the hands of the revenue authorities themselves who may terminate the anachronism by enfranchising the land from the service tenure & getting other arrangements made for the service if required.

[14] The learned counsel for the applts. in both the appeals have raised a number of other technical objections to the suit, out of which it is necessary to notice only the plea as to limitation. The history of this dispute from 1922-38 shows that there have been attempts at dismissal of the Nariha on a number of occasions & the revenue officials dealt with the question of ejectment arising from all such dismissals from time to time in different ways. There was first a dismissal in 1922 & the appointment of another person by name Braj Bagar. But the Nariha Baladev Bagar appears to have been reinstated by amicable settlement vide Ex. B. There was again another dismissal in or about 1930 & the appointment of another person by name Nitai Bhoi. On this occasion again the Nariha Baldev Bagar was put back in possession & was found to be doing his duties; vide order (Ex. B-1) dated 12-12-30. There was again a fresh dismissal in or about 1931 & the appointment of one Kasiram Bagar. The Revenue Comr. by his order dated 7-7-1932 (Ex. B-4) recognised the right of the Lambardar & the Punches to dismiss a Nariha for failure to render due service, but held that it could not be arbitrary & unreasonable & that the dismissal must be for specific neglect of duty & for reasons to be formally recorded. He, therefore, declined to make an order of ejectment & reinstate the Nariha Baldev Bagar on the above grounds. This was followed up immediately by another dismissal by the village officials & this time they appear to have formally prescribed the duties of the Nariha & formally dismissed him for not performing those duties. The revenue authorities thereupon attempted to consider the question what were the services to be performed by the Nariha. The various attempts to determine the scope of those services have gone on from 1932-1938. The Revenue Comr. by his order dated 16-9-1933 (Ex. B 4) declined to give effect to the order of dismissal of 1932 by making an order of ejectment & directed that the village officials & the Nariha should if possible, be made to agree about the scope of the duties & if they could not agree that a responsible officer should decide the same. His order is a reinstatement of the Nariha Baldev Bagar probably pending a final determination of the scope of the duties with a view to furnish the standard with reference to which the lawfulness & the validity of the dismissal may be judged. At any rate it does not appear very clearly from the subsequent record whether there has been any further dismissal, but it does appear that there have been further attempts by the revenue officials either to bring about an agreement between the parties as to the scope of duties & failing it an attempt to determine the same by themselves. This appears from the various orders, Exs. 4, 5, 6, B 5, B-6 & B-7. These attempts appear ultimately to have been given up & the order of the Revenue Comr. Sir John Dain dated 13-3-38 (Ex. B 8) closed the matter with a refusal to pass any further orders.

[14] The contention of the applts. is that the history of the dispute as above set out shows that at various stages the order of dismissal was not given effect to by the revenue authorities & in that sense the alleged unfettered right of dismissal has been challenged or infringed with, on successive occasions & that, therefore, the present right which is beyond six years from the earliest challenge of that right is time-barred. I agree with my learned brother that this contention is untenable. It appears to me that the real & effective interference with the right of dismissal during the whole course of the dispute from 1922-1938 was only when the Revenue Comr. Sir John Dain by his order dated 13-3-38 totally declined to give effect to the order of dismissal by refusing to go into the questions which were involved in the dispute on the ground that the arrangement was an anachronism & not workable. Until then the revenue authorities did not in terms either challenge the pltfs'. right of dismissal, nor did they refuse arbitrarily to give effect to the dismissal, but were only concerned to examine the grounds of dismissal at each stage. It appears to me that merely because the pltfs. submitted to such examination at the previous stages, they cannot now be considered to be too late in approaching the Ct. for a declaration of their alleged unfettered right if in fact & in law they have got it & have not lost it.

[15] The question of limitation applicable to such class of cases has been the subject-matter of a number of conflicting decisions which it is unnecessary to examine for the purpose of this case. It has been laid down by the P. C. in Mt. Bolo v. Mt. Koklan, A. I. R (17) 1930 P. C 270 at p. 272 : (11 Lah. 657) as follows :

"There can be no right to sue until there is an accrual of the right asserted in the suit & its infringement or at least a clear & unequivocal threat to infringe the right by the deft. against whom the suit is instituted."

In the case in Jalandhar Thakur v. Jharula Das, 42 Cal. 244 : (A. I. R. (1) 1914 P. C. 72) each infringement of the right was held to give a fresh cause of action. With reference to mere denials or hostile assertions short of infringement or ouster, some cases have held that it is open to the pltf. concerned to treat each denial as giving a fresh cause of action vide Appa Rao v. Secy. of State, A. I. R. (25) 1938 Mad. 193 : (181 I. C. 688), but other cases have held that unless the latter denials or infringements are of more serious nature than the earlier ones it is only the earlier denial or infringement that furnishes the only cause of action see Ponnu Nadar v. Kumaru Reddiar, A. I. R. (22) 1935 Mad. 967 : (59 Mad. 75) This last decision does not appear to have been fully approved in the F. B. case in Annaswami Ayangar v. Adivarahachari, A. I. R. (28) 1941 Mad. 81 at p. 83: (I. L. R. (1941) Mad. 275 F.B.). It appears to me that in this case even if Ponnu Nadar v. Kumaru Reddiar, A. I. R. (22) 1935 Mad. 967 : (59 Mad. 75) is accepted as correct, the order of Sir John Dain in 1938 arbitrarily refusing to pass any orders, is a denial of the right of a character totally different from the previous orders of the Revenue Comrs. & clearly furnishes a fresh cause of action. To my mind that is the real & effective cause of action in this case. I might, however, state that, as at present advised, I am inclined to agree with the views of Venkata Subba Rao J. in Appa Rao v Secy., of State, A. I. R. (25) 1938 Mad. 193 : (181 I. C. 688), to the effect that each successive denial will furnish a fresh cause of action for a suit for declaration, so long as the substantive right itself is not lost, & that the party is not bound on peril of losing his remedy to take every denial or infringement seriously & to rush to Ct. I, therefore, agree that the plea of limitation is not maintainable in this case.

[16] In view of the fact that the pltf. has come to Ct. for a declaration that he has the unfettered right of dismissal & this has been negatived by us, the proper course to adopt is to dismiss the pltf's. suit. It is unnecessary to grant a limited declaration of his right of dismissal formally since the same has been clearly recognised throughout by the revenue authorities & has also been specifically decided by us now in this judgment. The result will be that the appeals will be allowed & the suits will be dismissed. In the circumstances of this case, the proper order as to costs will be that all the parties should bear their respective costs throughout.

R.G.D. Appeals allowed.

RAY C. J. & NARASIMHAM J.

Anangabhusan — Pltf. — Petnr. v. Ghanashyam Patro & another — Defts. — Opposite Party.

Civil Revn. No. 129 of 1948, D/- 5-8-1949.

†(a) Civil P.C. (1908), O. 33, R. 9—"Means"—Meaning of—Civil P. C. (1908), O. 33, R. 7, S. 11.

The word 'means' referred to in cl. (b), of O. 33, R. 9 must be the 'means' that should have been acquired by or otherwise come to the possession of the pltf. after adjudication of the petn. for leave, under O. 33, R. 7. [Para 3]

Any order, either interlocutory or final in its nature, passed in presence of the parties, should be taken as closing the controversy once for all for the purposes of the proceeding or the suit in which it is passed & so far as it goes. The order may or may not be such on which a plea of res judicata can be based, but in order to avoid multiplicity of proceedings, some sort of finality, limited within the scope of the suit or the proceedings in which it is passed, has to be attributed to it. [Para 2]

Where the deft. in spite of notice to him. does not appear at the date of hearing of the appln. of pltf. for leave to sue as a pauper, & the Ct. passes an order under O. 33, R. 7, granting such leave, the deft. will not be allowed subsequently to come to Ct. with an appln. under O. 33, R. 9. for dispaupering the pltf. on the ground that the "means" of the pltf. at the commencement of the suit were such as to enable the pltf. to continue the suit. Such an appln. is maintainable only when the pltf. acquires such means subsequent to the order under R. 7. [Para 3]

Anno. Civil P. C., S. 11 N. 22; O. 33 R. 9 N 1, 3.

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 33, R. 9 (a)—Concealment or omission.

Some omission of certain properties from the inventory submitted by the pltf. will not necessarily amount to active concealment & thus to vexatious & improper conduct in the course of the suit. Whether it is a concealment as distinguished from mere omission is a question of fact. [Para 6]

Anno. Civil P. C, O. 33 R. 9 N. 2.

S. Monhanty—for Petnr.; D. Mohanty—for Opposite Party.

Ray C. J.—This is revn. directed against an order passed by the Subordinate Judge of Puri dispaupering the pltf. under O. 33, R. 9, Civil P. C. The pltf. admittedly is a member of a Hindu Mitakshara Joint family & his father is one of the defts. in the suit. The suit is for setting aside certain alienations, made by his father & for recovery of the properties so alienated. The attack on those alienations is based upon immorality & illegality of the transactions. The pltf. applied for leave to sue in forma pauperis. Of his appln. due notices were given to the Crown as well as, to the defts opposite party. They filed their objections challenging the plea of pauperism but none of the contesting parties appeared at the date when the matter was heard by the Ct. The Ct. purporting to act under O. 33, R. 7 granted the pltf leave to sue as a pauper on which his appln. for leave was registered as a suit & was to proceed as such, in the ordinary way except that he should be exempted from paying any further Ct.-f. on his applns. to be filed in course of the suit. At a later stage, the opp. party filed an appln. under R. 9 (b) of the Order alleging that the pltf's means were such that he ought not to be continued to sue as a pauper. The Ct. below, without making any enquiry as to whether the appcts. before him were prevented, by any sufficient cause, from appearing at the date of hearing of the pltf's. appln. for leave to sue as a pauper, & without making any sort of enquiry whatsoever which would as a matter of principle, entitle the appcts. to reopen the order passed under R. 7, entertained the appln. & enquired into its merits. After such enquiry, he has believed the opp. party's case & has come to the conclusion that the pltf. is possessed of means, such as would enable him to pay the requisite C.-f. & that, therefore, he has no right to continue to sue as a pauper.

[2] The pltf. has come up in revn. against this order & his point is that the Ct. had no jurisdiction to entertain the appln. so far as it did not disclose that the means referred to were such means as came into the pltf's possession later than the disposal of his leave appln. under R. 7; in other words, the contention is that the matter could have been urged before the Ct. at the stage when the leave was granted & could not be the subject-matter of discussion at a later stage. This contention is based on the principle that any order, either interlocutory or final in its nature, passed in presence of the parties, should be taken as closing the controversy once for all for the purposes of the proceedings or the suit in which it is passed & so far as it goes. The order may or may not be such on which a plea of res judicata can be based, but in order to avoid multiplicity of proceedings, some sort of finality, limited within the scope of the suit or the proceedings in which it is passed, has to be attributed to it. In the present case, the means that were alleged to have been in pltf's. possession were the family properties which admittedly were not acquired subsequent to either his filing the appln to leave or to the registration of that appln. as a suit. Reliance, in support of the order, is placed upon the terms of R. 9 which, so far as material for purpose of this revn. read:

"The Ct. may, on the appln. of the deft., of which seven days' clear notice in writing has been given to the pltf. order the pltf. to be dispaupered if it appears that his means are such that he ought not to continue to sue as a pauper."

[3] Mr. Mohanty, appearing for the opp. party, says that there are no such words of limitation as will compel the interpretation that "the means", referred to in cl. (b), must be "the means" that should have been acquired by or otherwise come to the possession of the pltf. after adjudication of the petn. for leave. But such limitation inheres in the word 'continue'. If we assign the plain grammatical meaning to the word 'continue', it will appear evident that it assumes the fact that he was an adjudged pauper at the date of commencement of the suit & the question arose if he should be allowed to continue as such. This rule is framed to operate not in derogation of the finality or validity of the order already passed as between the parties but enabling the Ct. to dispauper the pltf. on the basis of events happening subsequently. This view appears to us to be very clear & convincing. When pushed to its logical conclusion, Mr. Mohanty's contention if accepted, would lead to what is absurd on the face of it. That is, throughout the progress of the suit, the deft. may go on without any rest whatsoever agitating & re-agitating the question of pltf.'s pauperism for times without number. This could never be the intention of the framers of the Rules.

[4] Mr. Mohanty contrasts the provisions of R. 9 with the one appearing in the same Order of the Code giving finality to an order disallowing leave to sue as pauper. That is because the pltf.'s liability for c.-f. is a continuing liability & he can be ordered to pay whenever he comes by means to pay. On the other hand, if he had means enough to pay the requisite c.-fs. at the commencement of the suit, he should be liable to pay notwithstanding subsequent change of his financial position reducing him to poverty.

[5] The question can be viewed from another aspect, namely, that R. 9 makes it not obligatory but discretionary on the Ct. to dispauper a pauper pltf. In exercising this discretion, the Ct. certainly will not be indulgent to the party who chose at his own risk not to appear on the date when he was called upon to appear & contest, if he liked but to come at any moment & compel the Ct. to reopen the matter. The rule, in matters of procedure too, that orders passed or deemed to have been passed in presence of the parties will not ordinarily be reopend for the mere asking of them, is fundamental. The party asking for such indulgence must lay a foundation of sufficient grounds so as to entitle him to ask the Ct. to recall his order. Under the circumstance, we are bound to hold that in the circumstances of the present case as the alleged means have not been acquired later, deft. 1 should not have been heard to say what he ought to have said much earlier at the stage when the order under R. 7 was to be passed. We have no direct authority on the point either way. There are some observations here & there which may, to some extent, lend support to our view. In the case of Mumtazan v. Rasulan, 23 ALL. 364, it was laid down that the validity or finality of an order granting a petn. for leave to sue as pauper could not be challenged in an appeal from the decree passed in the suit. The learned Judges who decided the case have observed that order pased at that stage is not an order affecting the decision of the suit & is an independent order prior to the suit &, therefore, not challengeable collaterally in the manner in which it was sought to be done in that case. The case of Agent, B. N. Rly. Co. Ltd. v. Venkateswami, 49 C. W. N. 551, by implication, supports our view. It says that means coming to the possession of the petnr. subsequent to his filing of his appln. for leave can be considered in a proceeding initiated under R. 9. Here, in the present case, it is not said that the means, referred to in the deft.'s petn. were acquired later than the filing of the leave appln. These cases do attribute finality to the order so far as it embraces adjudication of matters that could be urged by the parties at that stage.

[6] Mr. Mohanty, as a last recourse, relies upon the case of Sanker Bharati v. Narasimha Bharati, 47 Bom. 106 : (A. I. R. (9) 1922 Bom 383), with a view to bringing the case within Cl. (a) of R. 9. He contends that the pltf. is, at any rate, guilty of vexatious & improper conduct in the course of the suit for deliberate concealment of his means from the Ct. The clause, standing by itself, would refer to guilty conduct in course of the suit, that is, after the appln. is registered as a suit. Whether the suit will have the extended meaning so as to include the proceedings based on the leave appln. is a question which is not free from difficulty. Had the Bombay case, referred to, decided the point, we might have taken any other views. But that question has there been left open. That case is no authority for the proposition urged. Over & above, the plea was never advanced in Ct. below. Some omission of certain properties from the inventory submitted by the pltf. will not necessarily amount to active concealment & thus to vexatious & improper conduct in the course of the suit. Whether it is a concealment as distinguished from mere omission is a question of fact. It appears from the facts of the present case that the pltf. is but a junior member of the family & a wireless-operator, his father being alive. We do not know whether the father has any sympathy with his launching of this litigation. Under the circumstances, it is not necessarily probable that he had knowledge of the properties. Besides, it may be consistent with the honesty that as a junior member of the joint Mitakshara family, he did not consider that he had such disposing power over the joint family properties as to constitute 'means' in his hands. For the purpose of a speculative suit involving a protracted course for recovery of properties wrongfully alienated by a Hindu father is hardly a justifiable ground for alienating joint family properties over which a member's power of disposition is very limited. I shall not be understood to say that in my view a member of a joint family shall be always considered a pauper even if he has interest in substantial family property. I am considering whether omission thereof from the inventory attached to an appln. for leave to sue as pauper is necessarily vexatious. In these circumstances, we cannot take notice of this plea as one available to Mr. Mohanty under Cl. (a) of R. 9 of the Order at this stage.

[7] We, therefore, hold that the order of the learned Subordinate Judge was without jurisdiction & should be set aside. In the result the Civil Revn. is allowed with costs. Hearing is assessed at one gold mohur.

A. F. A. D. No. 186 of 1945, D/- 2-9-1949.

Specific Relief Act (1877), Ss. 24, 27 — Contract of sale by guardian on behalf of minor — Effect.

A contract for sale entered into on behalf of a minor by his guardian cannot be specifically enforced, even though it may be for legal necessity or for the benefit of the minor.

In respect of dealings by a guardian on behalf of a minor, the law has recognised for very salutary reasons, the broad distinction between the binding character of a completed alienation by way of a sale or charge & an executory contract which merely imposes an obligation to alienate. In the former, the validity is recognised as much in the interests of the minor as in the interests of the bona fide purchaser for value. But in the latter, if for any reason, the guardian declines to complete the transaction by actual transfer there is no interest of a bona fide purchaser to be protected, & the fact that the guardian has resiled from the executory arrangement is itself a reason why the Ct. should not enforce it against the minor's estate. Jagannadhadas J.—The pltf. is the applt. in this second appeal. It arises out of a suit for specific performance of a contract for the sale of 35 decimals of land which belonged to defts. 1 & 2. Defendants 1 & 2 are minors & the suit contract is one entered into on their behalf by their mother as guardian. The contract was for selling the property for a sum of Rs. 75 out of which Rs. 35 was paid as advance & the balance was to be paid later. Defendant 3 who is the sister's husband of defts. 1 & 2 has purchased the suit property on 3-2-1943 subsequent to the agreement in favour of the pltf. The genuineness of the consideration alleged to have been paid thereunder were denied by the defts. & contested in the Cts. below. It has been found by the trial Ct. that the agreement was true & that a sum of Rs. 35 was paid as an advance under it. It was also found that the agreement was executed in order to raise money to repay a decretal debt for Rs. 60 against the minors in respect of which there was an execution pending at the time. It was further found that deft. 3 was fully aware of the agreement & took the sale deed in his favour with notice of the same. These findings of the trial Ct. were not challenged in first appeal before the learned Subordinate Judge. It is not clear from the judgments of the Cts. below whether the decree-debt for the discharge of which money was sought to be raised by the suit agreement was one binding on the minor's estate or not. The Cts. below have been assumed that the agreement was entered into by the guardian for legal necessity & the case must be dealt with on that footing.

[2] The argument that has been advanced on behalf of the defts. is that no specific performance can be decreed against the minors (& against the subsequent purchaser) on the basis of a contract entered into on their behalf by their guardian even though it may be for legal necessity or for the benefit of the minor. This contention has been accepted by both the Cts. below & the suit has been accordingly dismissed. Hence this second appeal.

[3] The same question of law is urged in this second appeal & in view of the conflict on this matter, between the view taken by Das J. in Abdul Hoq v. Md. Yakya Khan, A.I.R. (11) 1924 Pat. 81 : (78 I. C. 483) that of Wort J. in Brahamdeo v. Haro Singh, A. I. R. (22) 1935 Pat. 237 : (157 I. C. 327), this appeal has been referred to a Bench. The matter has been fully argued before us. On a consideration of the argument, we have no hesitation in agreeing with the view of Das J. expressed in Abdul Haq v. Md. Yahya Khan, A. I. R. (11) 1924 Pat. 81:(78 I. C. 483) to the effect that a contract for sale entered into on behalf of a minor by his guardian cannot be specifically enforced.

[4] This view is now almost unanimously held in all the H. Cs., & the reasons, therefor, do not require to be elaborated. The crucial question in such a case is whether a contract entered into by a guardian on behalf of a minor is binding on the minor's estate. It is said that it would be binding if it is for necessity or benefit. It is urged by the learned Advocate for the applts., that just as the sale of a property of the minor by his guardian for legal necessity is valid & binding, so also the antecedent contract to sell the property is eqully binding on minor. It is stated that a contrary view would produce anomalous results & would not be in the interests of the minor himself. The question, however, turns on the powers of a minor's guardian. In Hanooman Persaud v. Mt. Babooee Munraj, 6 M. I. A. 393 : (18 W. R. 81 P. C.) which is the foundation of judicial decisions relating to the guardian's powers, their Lordships at p. 423 state as follows :

"The power of the Manager for an infant heir to charge ancestral estate by loan or mortgage, is, under the Hindu law, a limited & qualified power. It can only be exercised rightly in a case of need, or for the benefit of the estate."

[5] It will be noticed that what is recognised here is the power to charge an estate and not the power to bind the estate by a mere personal covenant. In a later P. C. case in Waghela Rajsanji v. Masludin, 11 Bom. 551 P. C., their Lordships dealing with the question of the powers of a guardian state at p. 561 as follows :

"Now it was most candidly stated by Mr. Mayne, who argued the case on behalf of the resp., that there is not in Indian law any rule which gives a guardian & manager greater power to bind the infant ward by a personal covenant than exists in English law.

In point of fact, the matter must be decided by equity & good conscience, generally interpreted to mean the rules of English law if found applicable to Indian society & circumstances. Their Lordships are not aware of any law in which the guardian has such a power, nor do they see why it should be so in India. They conceive that it would be a very improper thing to allow the guardian to make covenants in the name of his ward so as to impose a personal liability upon the ward & they hold that in this case the guardian exceeded her powers so far as she purported to bind the ward."

[6] Since that decision, it has been taken as settled law that a mere executory contract entered into by a guardian on behalf of a minor imposing a personal obligation on the minor's estate is not valid & binding & it makes no difference that it is for necessity or benefit. Indeed the P. C. in a later case appear to have recognised this principle even to the extent of saying that not only can such a contract not be enforced against the minor, but that the minor cannot even take advantage of it in his own favour & enforce it against the other party to the contract. That was what was held in Sarwarjan v. Fakhruddin, 39 Cal. 232: (39 I. A. 16 P. C.). That was a case of a contract for purchase of lands entered into by a guardian on behalf of a minor. It was found as a fact in the case that the contract was intended to bind the minor's estate & that it was for his advantage. All the same, it was held by their Lordships that the minor could not take advantage of the contract & enforce it specifically as against the other party thereto, & they give their reasons for the conclusion as follows:

"Their Lordships are of the opinion that it is not within the competence of the guardian of a minor to bind the minor or the minor's estate by a contract for the purchase of immovable property & they are further of the opinion that as the minor in the present case was not bound by the contract, there was no mutuality & that the minor who has now reached his majority cannot obtain specific performance of the contract."

[7] This is an unequivocal recognition by the P. C. of the position that a contract by a guardian on behalf of the minor seeking to bind the minor's estate is invalid. It has been suggested that the unenforceability of the contract in this case was assumed by the P. C. on account of the fact that it was a contract of purchase which prima facie cannot be one for the necessity or the benefit of the minor's estate & that therefore this does not militate against the view that a contract for legal necessity is binding. But this suggestion ignores the facts of that case which show clearly that the P. C. recognised the contract to be for the advantage of the minor & therefore for his benefit & yet held it to be unenforceable, obviously on the same principle as has been laid in the prior case of Waghela Rajsanji v. Masluddin, 11 Bom. 551. The case, therefore, in Sarwarjan v. Fakhruddin: 39 Cal. 232: (39 I. A. 16 P. C) is clear authority for the position that a contract by a minor's guardian for his benefit (or necessity) is not binding & it is only in that view that the scope for the application of the principle of mutuality arose. The question has been considered by a F. B. of the Madras H. C. in Ramajogaya v. Jagnanadham, 42 Mad. 185: (A. I. R. (6) 1919 Mad 641 F. B.) & it has been there pointed out that the effect of the P. C. decision in Waghela Rajsanji v. Masluddin, 11 Bom. 551, is that a decree cannot be passed against the minor or his estate on a covenant entered into by his guardian for his benefit. That F. B. decision deals with the further question as to whether this principle would affect the liability of the minor's estate under S. 68, Contract Act, if it is also secured by a personal bond executed by the guardian on behalf of the minor; but that is a question with which we are not concerned in the present case.

[8] Even on principle, apart from authority, the contention of the applt's advocate that since the sale by the guardian on behalf of the minor for necessity or benefit is binding, the prior contract to sell must also be equally binding, has no force. In respect of dealings by a guardian on behalf of of a minor, the law has recognised for very salutory reasons, the broad distinction between the binding character of a completed alienation by way of a sale or charge & an executory contract which merely imposes an obligation to alienate. In the former, the validity is recognised as much in the interests of the minor as in the interests of the bona fide purchaser for value. But in the latter, if for any reason, the guardian declines to complete the transaction by actual tranefer there is no interest of a bona fide purchaser to be protected & the fact that the guardian has resiled from the executory arrangement is itself a reason why the Ct. should not enforce it against the minor's estate.

[9] Before the decision of the P. C. in Mohri Bibi v. Dharmadas, 30 Cal. 539: (30 I. A. 114 P.C.), holding that a minor's contract is absolutely void & not merely voidable, & before the later decision of the P. C. in Sarwarjan v. Fakhruddin, 39 Cal. 232: (39 I A 16 P. C.), importing the principle of mutuality with reference of contracts, there were undoubtedly a number of decisions in the H. Cts., that a contract for sale by a guardian on behalf of the minor if for necessity or benefit, is valid & binding. But it has been recognised in subsequent decisions that the earlier decisions are no longer good law. Some of the later decisions have, however, attempted to distinguish the case of a contract for sale of minor's property by a guardian for necessity or benefit from the case of a contract for purchase of property by a guardian on behalf of a minor. They have accordingly attempted to distinguish the case in Sarwarjan v. Fakhruddin, 39 Cal. 232: (39 I. A. 16 P. C.) on that ground. Those cases have however, failed to appreciate that the decision in Sarwarjan v. Fakhruddin, 39 Cal. 232 (39 I. A. 16 P. C.) is based on the view, firstly, that the contract by the guardian though for the benefit of the minor is not enforceable & secondly, that since it is not enforceable against the minor's estate, it cannot be enforced in his favour for lack of mutuality. Subsequent decisions have therefore recognised that there is no scope for this distinction. It is enough to refer to the cases in Srinath v. Jatindra Mohan, A.I.R. (13) 1926 Cal. 445: (89 I. C. 892); Ramkrishna v. K. Chidambara, A. I R. (15) 1928 Mad. 407: (108 I. C. 282); Venkatachalam v. Sethuramrao, A.I R. (20) 1933 Mad. 322: (56 Mad. 432 F. B.); Swaathram Ramsaran v. Ramballabh, A. I. R. (13) 1935 All. 595: (47 All. 784) & Krishnachandra v. Rishabha Kumar, A. I R. (26) 1939 Nag 265: (I. L. R. (1940) Nag. 551. There have been some exceptions recognised to this principle such as in the case of a contract by the manager of a joint Hindu family consisting of some minors & it is unnecessary to notice them in this connection.

[10] We are, therefore, satisfied that the contract in this case which the pltf. seeks to enforce is not specifically enforceable.

[11] Learned counsel for the applt. has further urged that the pltf. would at least be entitled to a decree for the refund of the sum of Rs. 35 advanced by him, since it has been found that it was raised for legal necessity, that is, to discharge the decree debt in respect of which an execution was pending against the minors' estate at the time. But this would depend upon whether as a fact the amount has been utilised for the discharge of the debt. This is a question of fact which has not been raised in the Cts. below. If it were absolutely clear on the evidence that the pltf.'s money has been in fact utilised for the partial discharge of the decree-debt, we might have inclined to consider this request. The learned advocate has drawn our attention to certain portions of the pltf.'s evidence as P. W. 1 to substantiate that his amount was in fact utilised for partial discharge of the decree debt. But on a perusal of the record, it is found that the defts. who had denied the advance in their defence, have given evidence that the decree debt was satisfied with the money supplied by the third deft. That is what the guardian of the minors, D. W 2, states in her deposition. In this state of conflicting evidence, we do not consider that we will be justified in acceding to the request of the applt's. Advocate that there should be a decree for refund of the amount advanced. The second appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

B. K. Pal—for Applt.; Advocate-General — for the King.

Narasimham J.—Applt. Sudhu Kumbhar was convicted for the murder of his own father Pahalu Kumbhar & sentenced to transportation for life by the Ses. J. of Sundergarh, Sambalpur.

[2] The offence was said to have been committed on 31-8-1947 in village Hamirpur P S. Raghunathpali in Gangpur State. That day was a day of of festivity for the villagers being the Rakhi Purnima & it appears that most of the males of the village including the applt. & his father Pahalu took considerable quantities of rice-beer (Handia). At about noon Pahalu after performing the usual worship & taking Khichiri meals lay down for rest on the verandah of one of the rooms of his house. The females went to neighbouring houses for taking their food. Just then the applt. returned from somewhere, went inside the kitchen & finding no rice or Handia came out & asked his father as to why no food or drink was kept for him. Thereupon Pahalu rebuked him for being a glutton (Ranka). This remark was said to have so much enraged the applt. that he ran towards his father, dragged him from the verandah to the courtyard & attempted to throttle him by pressing his neck. His elder brother Budhu (P. W. 1) immediately ran to the spot & separated the two. But the father Pahalu was also so much enraged at this conduct of the applt. that he wanted to assault him & rushed towards him. But Budhu again intervened & separated the two. Then the father returned to the court-yard & the applt. went away & Budhu (P. W. 1) thinking that nothing further would happen returned to the cow-shed in front of the house & lay on his cot. Soon afterwards he heard beating sound & a cry raised by his father. He ran to the court-yard & found his father lying with a bleeding injury on his face & the applt. running away. Immediately an alarm was raised & Pahalu's brother Ajit Kumbhar (P. W. 2) came running there. An attempt was made to give first-aid to Pahalu but it was unsuccessful. In the meantime a search was made for the applt. & he was found in a ditch close to river Koil which flows by the side of the village. He was immediately taken into custody & he admitted the crime before the villagers. He was found to be heavily drunk at the time of his arrest. In due course F. I. R. was lodged in the police station at about 7 p. m. that day & the case was investigated by the S. I. Sri Kheradhar Naik (P. W. 7). Pahalu's corpse was also brought to the thana & the S. I. sent it to the Medical Officer for post mortem examination. A thicken wooden post (Kunchi) (Ex. 1) 4"-10" long & $6\frac{1}{2}$" girth stained with some blood was also produced before the S. I. This post was recovered from a place close to the place where Phalu fell.

[3] The post-mortem examination on the corpse of Pahalu was made by Dr. S. C. Naik (P. W. 8) on the next day. He found a lacerated wound $1\frac{1}{4}" \times \frac{1}{2}"$ bone deep on the middle part of the vault of the scalp. Another lacerated wound $\frac{3}{4}" \times \frac{1}{3}"$ skin deep was found on the right temporal area of the head. The frontal & both the parietal bones were found to be smashed like a cocoanut shell. The membranes of the brain were torn. The brain was also severely lacerated & a portion of the brainmatter protruded through the sites of the fractures. The stomach contained some undigested food with smell of liquor. Death was caused by shock & heart-failure resulting from the injury to the skull & the brain. A log of wood like Ex. 1 might have caused the injury on the head. The second lacerated injury on the head which was skin deep might have been caused by a blow or a fall on the ground.

[4] From the nature of the injuries found on the head of Pahalu Kumbhar there can be no doubt that his assailant gave him a terrific blow on the head in consequence of which the skull got fractured like a cocoanut shell and the unfortunate man died. Ordinarily the only inference that can be made is that the person who gave such a blow on the head either intended to cause Pahalu's death or else intended to cause such bodily injury as would be sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.

(5) So far as the identity of the assailant is concerned there is undoubtedly no eye-witness. The applt's brother Budhu (P. W. 1) is a witness to the incidents that took place immediately before & immediately after the giving of the blow. (His Lordship reviewed his evidence & proceeded). There seems to be absolutely no reason to disbelieve the evidence of Budhu in its essentials. Though this witness did not actually see the giving of blow on the head of his father, from the facts as deposed to by him the only reasonable inference is that it was the applt. who gave the fatal blow. His conduct in quarrelling with his father & attempting to throttle him & his subsequent conduct in running away from the spot when Budhu came there on hearing the cry leave no room for doubt as to his participation in the attack on his father.

[6] The prosecution led evidence to prove the extra-judicial confession made by the applt. when he was arrested soon afterwards while concealing himself in a ditch close to the river Koil. This confession has been proved by his own father's brother (P. W. 2), & by other villagers, namely, Sana Kumbhar (P. W. 3), Gama Kumbhar (P. W. 4) & Bhuja Kisan (P. W. 6). I would not however attach much importance to the extra judicial confession. But the accused's statement under S. 342, Cr. P. C before the committing Mag. incriminates him beyond any doubt. In that statement which was taken as evidence under S. 287, Cr. P. C. he admitted that he gave one blow on the head of his father with the wooden post (Ex. 1) & that he was drunk at that time. There seems to be absolutely no reason for not believing this statement. Doubtless in the Ses. Ct. he has resiled from it & stated that as he was drunk at that time he did not know what happened. But I see no reason to reject the statement made before the committing Mag.

[7] The next question for consideration is as to wherefrom the applt. seized the wooden post (Ex. 1). It was not in his hand during his first struggle with his father & he must have picked it up during the short interval between Budhu's premature retirement to the cow-shed after separating the two, & his return to the spot on hearing the cry of the father. The log (Ex. 1) was identified by a neighbour named Biswanath Kumbhar (P. W. 5) to be one of the posts of his fence near his gate. He noticed the post missing from his fence when he went to the spot soon after the commission of the crime. From the sketch map (Ex. 5) it appears that the place from where the post was removed was about 32 cubits south-west of the post. From these facts the only reasonable inference that can be drawn is that the applt. pulled out the post from the fencing, ran back to the court-yard & gave the fatal blow on the head of his father.

[8] That the applt. was then in a drunken condition admits of no doubt whatsoever. Apart from his own statement there is the evidence of his brother P.W. 1 & P.W. 5 to show that at about 10 a. m. that day the applt. & other persons of the village had taken Handia after performing their usual Puja to the diety. The applt's uncle P. W. 2 also stated that when the applt. was arrested he was found to be heavily drunk. It is thus well proved that in a drunken condition the applt. picked up a quarrel with his father, pulled out a big wooden post (Ex. 1) from a place about 32 cubits from the place of the quarrel & gave a terrific blow & thereby smashed the skull of his father & killed him.

[9] The main question for consideration in this case is whether drunkenness is a sufficient ground for reducing the offence to one under S. 304, I P. C. On behalf of the applt. Mr. Pal relied on S. 86, I. P. C. & urged that though the necessary guilty knowledge may be inferred against the applt. by virtue of that section, guilty intention cannot be so inferred & that consequently all that can be said in the circumstances of the case is that the applt. knew that his act was likely to cause death. This would reduce the offence to one under S. 304, I. P. C.

[10] Section 86, I. P. C. says :

"Where an act done is not an offence unless done with a particular knowledge or intent, a person who does the act in a state of intoxication shall be liable to be dealt with as if he had the same knowledge as he would have had if he had not been intoxicant."

Here there is no question of the intoxicant being administered to the applt. without his knowledge or against his will & consequently it is unnecessary to discuss the remaining part of that section. The omission of any reference to 'intent' in the second part of the section as quoted above though it is expressly referred to in the first part, has caused some difficulty & has been the subject of several judicial decisions. I would however, with respect, agree with the observations in J. M. v. Emperor, 11 Cr. L J. 659 : (8 I. C. 469 U. B.) & In re Mandru Gadaba, 38 Mad. 479 : (A. I. R. (3) 1916 Mad. 489 : 16 Cr. L. J. 627) to the effect that the omission was deliberate. The result is that though by virtue of the said section a Ct. may presume guilty knowledge, the Ct. cannot presume guilty intention in judging the nature of the offence committed by a drunken person. But the guilty intention which is the ingredient of several offences in the Penal Code is obviously not capable of direct proof & is generally inferred from the proved facts & circumstances of each case. There is the general presumption that every man intended the natural consequences of his act & as pointed out by Ayling J. In re Mandru Gadaba, 38 Mad. 479 : (A. I. R. (3) 1916 Mad. 489 : 16 Cr. L J. 627) :

"If the accused knew what the natural consequences of his act were, he must be presumed to have intended to cause them."

In other words, intention, may ordinarily be inferred from knowledge & if guilty knowledge can be presumed by virtue of S. 86, I. P. C., it necessarily follows that guilty intention may also be reasonably inferred unless there are some other facts & circumstances to repel such an inference.

[11] Section 86, I. P. C. was fully considered by a F. B. of the Chief Ct. of Lower Burma in the case reported in Nga Tun Baw v. Emperor, 13 Cr. L. J. 864 : (6 L. B. R. 100) which was followed in Naga Sein Gale v. Emperor, 12 Rang. 445 : (A. I. R. (21) 1934 Rang. 361). There is also a Madras decision reported in Public Prosecutor v, Budipiti Devasikamanni, 55 M. L. J. 238 : (A.I.R. (15) 1928 Mad. 196 : 29 Cr. L. J. 63) following an earlier Madras decision reported in re Mandru Gadaba, 38 Mad. 479 : (A I. R. (3) 1916 Mad. 459 : 16 Cr. L. J. 627). The same question came up for decision before the Calcutta H. C. in Manindra Lal v. Emperor, 41 C. W. N. 1187 : (A. I. R. (24) 1937 Cal. 432 : 38 Cr. L. J. 868). The Patna H. C. also considered the question in two decisions reported in Jhiktu Bhogta v. Emperor, 23 P. L. T. 763 : (A. I. R. (29) 1942 Pat. 427 : 43 Cr. L. J. 544) and Dilmohammad v. Emperor, 23 P.L.T. 725 : (A.I R. (29) 1942 Pat. 420 : 43 Cr. L. J. 883). The English law on the subject has been authoritatively laid down in the decision of the House of Lords in Director of Public Prosecutions v. Beard, (1920) A. C. 479 : (89 L. J. K. B. 437). According to Lord Birkenhead L. C.:

"The evidence of drunkenness which renders the accused incapable of forming the specific intent essential to constitute the crime should be taken into consideration with other facts proved in order to determine whether or not he had this intent.

The evidence of drunkenness falling short of proved incapacity in the accused to form the intent necessary to constitute the crime, & merely establishing that his mind was affected by drink so that he more readily gave way to some voilent passion, does not rebut the presumption that a man intends the natural consequences of his acts."

This principle of English law has been applied in construing S. 86, I. P. C. See Bishan Singh v. Emperor, A. I. R. (16) 1929 Lah 637 : (30 Cr. L. J. 662), Bishan v. Emperor, 33 Cr. L. J. 378 : (A.I.R. (19) 1932 Lah. 244) and Nga Sein Gale v. Emperor, 12 Rang. 445 : (A.I.R. (21) 1934 Rang. 361).

[12] It seems to be thus well established that where a drunken person commits an offence, there will be no presumption of guilty intention under S. 86, I. P. C., & such intention must be proved like any other fact in issue. But the Ct. may, after presuming the necessary guilty knowledge from that section on the assumption that he committed the act while in a sober condition, infer the guilty intention also if the other proved facts & circumstances justify the same. There may be different degrees of intoxicantion & if the evidence merely shows that the accused more readily gave way to violent passion because of his drunken condition it may be reasonably inferred that he intended the natural consequences of his acts. If, however, the evidence shows that he was in such a state of intoxication as to be incapable of forming the specific intent, drunkenness may be ground for altering the nature of the offence.

[13] In this case, however, the evidence on record does not justify the conclusion that the applt. was in such a state of intoxication as to be incapable of forming the specific intent essential to constitute the offence of murder. He came home, demanded food & drink, then quarrelled with his father, dragged him down & tried to throttle him. At that time he had no weapon in his hand. When his brother intervened & separated the two his father tried to assault him but his brother again intervened. Then the applt. ran to a place about 32 cubits away, pulled out a heavy wooden post (Ex. I) which had been fixed to a fence & gave a terrific blow on the head of his father & ran away. These acts indicate much deliberation on his part & they are incompatible with the alternative theory that due to his intoxicated condition he was incapable of forming the specific intent necessary for the commission of the crime. On the contrary this case comes within the second proposition of Lord Birkenhead L. C. i. e., the applt's mind was so much affected by drink that he more readily gave way to violent passion in consequence of the taunting word 'glutton' used by his father. When he gave such a blow he intended to cause such an injury as was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death & his action would come within clause '3rdly' of S. 300, I. P. C.

[14] It also appears, for the reasons fully discussed in Dilmahmad v. Emperor, 23 P. L. T. 725 : (A. I. R. (29) 1942 Pat. 420 : 43 Cr. L. J. 883), that the applt's act also comes within clause '2ndly' of S. 300, I. P. C. That clause refers both to intention & knowledge & an intention to cause bodily injury to a person may be sufficient to constitute murder under that clause if the offender knows that such an injury is likely to cause the death of the person to whom harm is caused. In the present case it cannot be said that the applt was in such a state of intoxication as to be incapable of forming any intent at all. When he gave the blow on the head of his father he intended to cause him an injury. As to his knowledge about the effect of such an injury on his father a presumption may be made by virtue of S. 86, I. P. C. on the assumption that he committed the act as a sober person. Any sober man would surely have known that the giving of such a blow with a thick wooden post on the head of an old man of 55 years was likely to cause his death. Therefore the applt was guilty of murder under clause '2ndly' of S. 300, I. P. C.

[15] None of the Exceptions to S. 300, I. P. C. applies to the facts of the present case & the applt. was rightly convicted under S. 302, I. P. C. His drunkenness & the absence of premeditation were sufficient to justify the imposition of the lesser penalty.

[16] I would therefore affirm the conviction & sentence passed on applt. Sudhu Kumbhar & dismiss his appeal.

[17] Jagannadhadas J.—I agree with my learned brother that the conviction & the sentence passed on the applt. should be confirmed.

[18] On the evidence in this case, it is clear that though the applt. was drunk, he deliberately intended causing bodily injury to the deceased. The deceased was assaulted with the wooden post, Ex. 1, which has been identified by P. W. 5 as one of the posts of his fence near his gate. The place wherefrom the post must have been removed was about 32 cubits away from the spot where the deceased fail down. The act of the applt. in running up to the place 32 cubits away, pulling down a post from the fence & beating the deceased with it, cannot but be held to be intentional & the intention must have been at least to inflict bodily injury. The actual injury inflicted was a very severe one as appears from the evidence of the Doctor, P. W. 8, & was one which would necessarily have caused death. It may or may not be that in his state of drunkenness, the accused knew that the injury would result in death. But it is just at this point that the presumption under S. 86, I. P. C. comes in & that knowledge must be imputed to the accused. There is no doubt that if the accused intentionally caused bodily injury & knew that the bodily injury was such as was likely to cause the death of the person injured, the case would be covered by the second clause of S. 300. It is contended that in view of the fact that the instrument used was only a wooden pole & not any weapon like a sharp knife the requisite intent cannot be ascribed to the assailant & that he would be guilty only under S. 304, I. P C., for culpable homicide not amounting to murder. But in this case having regard to the fact that the pole used was a stout & strong one of $6\frac{1}{2}''$ in girth & $10''$ in length, as appears from the seizure list, Ex. 2 & in view of the fact that the bones of the brain were found smashed like a cocoanut shell, the fact that the weapon used was a wooden one, does not negative the requisite intent.

[19] The only hesitation that I felt in this case was due to the fact that there is complete lack of evidence as to what exactly happened at the point of time when the fatal blow was dealt on the deceased. But in the circumstances & on the evidence there can of course be no reasonable doubt that the assailant was the applt. & that the weapon used Ex. 1. It is possible, however, that the blow may have been given on account of grave & sudden provocation offered afresh by the deceased or on account of circumstances which impelled the accused to act in self defence. The evidence of P. W. 1, with reference to the previous stage of the quarrel indicates that after he separated the deceased & the accused the deceased become aggresive & attempted to catch hold of the accused & that he had to intervene a second time to get the accused released from the hold of the deceased. He also says that the accused went out of the courtyard towards the village lane while his father was standing there. It is therefore not altogether unlikely that something else in the nature of fresh provocation or aggression on the part of the deceased happened which gave rise to the second stage of the occurrence leading to the fatal blow. What exactly happened, however, can only be a matter of bare conjecture & there are no sufficient circumstances to enable us to come to any definite conclusion as to what exactly happened. According to the terms of S. 105 Evidence Act, the Ct. must presume the absence of circumstances bringing a case within any of the general exceptions or special exceptions or provisos. There is no scope for the accused being given the benefit of doubt as to the existence of such circumstances.

[20] The case raises the question as to the exact scope of S. 86, I. P. C. It is unnecessary to discuss the matter at length as my learned brother has dealt with the same. I accept the view taken in Dilmahomed v. Emperor, 21 Pat. 250 : A. I. R. (29) 1942 Pat. 420 : (43 Cr. L. J. 833); Manindralal v. Emperor, 41 C. W. N. 1187 : (A. I. R. (24) 1937 Cal. 432 : 38 Cr. L. J. 868) & Ngatun Baw v. Emperor, 13 Cr. L. J. 861 : (6 L. B. R. 100 F. B), that under S. 86, a presumption arises only in respect of knowledge but not in respect of intent. In such cases the usual inference that a person is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his act where he knowingly does an act which normally produces such consequences, does not necessarily follow from this statutorily presumed knowledge. The requisite intent is to be gathered from all the circumstances of the case & not on the basis of the mere presumed knowledge.

[21] We must acknowledge the help given to us in this case by Mr. Pal who has appeared amicus curiae.

Makar Bhoi & others — Accused-Petnrs. v. State—O. P.

Cr. Rev. No. 246 of 1950, D/- 4-4-1951.

Orissa Kendu Leaves (Control & Distribution) Order (1949), Para VII—Essence of offence under — Places in same unit but route passing through another unit.

The essence of the offence under Para VII is carrying from one place in one unit to another place in another unit. If, therefore, stations, A and B are within the same unit then under the para. it is not an offence to carry kendu leaves from A to B as both the places are within one unit. It would be reading something into the para. to hold that if the route from A to B lies within a different unit, the man transporting shall be held to be guilty of an offence in the same manner as if he takes it from a place in one unit to a place in another unit. [Para 3]

V. Pasayat—for Petnrs.; Advocate-General—for the State.

Ray C. J.—The petnrs. have been convicted under S. 10 (1) of the Orissa Essential Articles Control and Requisitioning (Temporary Powers) Act, 1947, & sentenced to pay a fine Rs. 25 each, in default to suffer R. I. for 6 weeks' each. The prosecution case is that on the night of 16-5-49, the petnrs. were carrying loads of Kendu leaves from Bolangir district into Sambalpur district within the limits of Agalpur police outpost under Leisinga P. S. without a permit authorising them to move Kendu leave from one unit to another or from one district to another. This is said to be an offence against R. VII (1) of the Orissa Kendu Leaves (Control & Distribution) Order, 1949. This Order was made by the Govt. of Orissa in exercise of the powers conferred by sub-s. (1) of S. 3, Orissa Essential Articles Control & Requisitioning (Temporary Powers) Act, 1947. Para. VII of the said order runs as follows:

"VII. (1) No person shall move or transport or attempt to move or transport Kendu leaves by rail, road, water or in any other manner from any place in the unit to any place outside the unit within the province except under & in accordance with a permit issued in the behalf by the authority specified hereunder:

(a) outside the unit within the district — Divisional Forest Officer of the Unit.

(b) Outside the district — Dist. Mag. of the district.

(2) The authority specified above may at any time in his discretion cancel a permit granted by him under sub-cl. (1) of this clause."

[2] In the facts of this case, it appears that it is not known from where the kendu leaves were being moved or transported or attempted to be moved or transported. The learned trying Mag. observes:

"In this case it is not known from where the accused persons were carrying the kendu leaves. They were stopped just at the point of crossing the boundary of this district into the limits of Sambalpur district."

It is admitted that the petnrs were moving in a route passing through Bolangir to their destination in Sambalpur; but as already observed by the learned Mag. it has not been established from what place they started. Whether they started from a place inside the unit of Sambalpur or from a place inside the unit of Bolangir is a matter of doubt. The prosecution has adduced no evidence either direct or circumstantial to establish that they were moving kendu leaves or transporting them from a place in the district of Bolangir. The petnrs. belong to the place of Jamutbahal & they were going to Tahilamal. Both these places are within the unit of Sambalpur district. They were arrested at the place Gudimunda which is in the district of Bolangir. The learned trial Mag. says that the fact that they were proceeding at night while the distance of the route that they had to pass over is only five miles is proof presumptive that they must be committing an offence. From that he jumps to the conclusion that the place from where they were bringing the kendu leaves must be one within the unit of Bolangir. I cannot understand his judgment to mean anything other than this. He does not mean to say that even if they brought kendu leaves from a place in Sambalpur district, they shall be held liable for the offence, defined in paragraph VII, simply because they were passing through a route which lies in another unit. The learned Advocate-General, who opposes this petn. on behalf of the State, urges that it was for the defence to establish, in view of the fact that they were caught in a place within the district of Bolangir while their destination was at a place in the district of Sambalpur that they were bringing the kendu leaves either from their native village or from any other place within the unit of Sambalpur within which lies the admitted destination of their movement. This argument, when properly analysed, tantamounts to say that whenever any person is found at a place in course of his journey, he must be in the absence of anything else, presumed to start from that place. As this assumption or the supposition is involved in this contention with which I do not agree, I will reject this contention as completely without any substance. He has again invited my attention to para. III of the Order. This para. 3 is of a comprehensive character. According to this no person other than a licensee shall engage in any undertaking which involves the collection, purchase, sale or storage of kendu leaves for sale, provided that the owner of a private tree or forest may collect himself or through pluckers & store his own kendu leaves but he shall not sell them to anybody except to a licensee. After referring to this para. it is contended that the owner of a private tree is by necessary implication prevented from transporting. The submission is that assuming that the petnrs. were the owners of the kendu trees & the head-loads of kendu leaves which they were carrying were their own, yet they were committing an offence by transporting. This argument is not at all relevant, firstly for the reason that the petnrs. have not been convicted far less charged for an offence against this para. & secondly, that had they been authorised to pluck & store, the authority for transport must be assumed to have been granted. Otherwise, every owner of kendu trees will be required to have a storage-house at the roofs of the trees. This submission, therefore, is without any substance.

[3] The fundamental principle of criminal law is that apart from such presumptions of facts as arise u/s. 114, Evidence Act, all other facts have to be established by the prosecution in order to bring the charge home to the accused. The essence of the offence in this case is carrying from one place in one unit to another place in another unit Suppose, stations, A & B are within the same unit. Under the para. it is not an offence to carry kendu leaves from A to B as both the places are within one unit. It would be reading something into the para. to held that if the route from A to B lies within a different unit, the man transporting shall be held to be guilty of an offence in the same manner as if he takes it from a place in one unit to a place in another unit. I do not think this is the meaning of the para. VII of the Order. I would, therefore, hold that the prosecution has failed to bring the charge home to the accused petnrs. The order of convictions & sentences is, therefore, quashed. They are acquitted, of the charges & fines, if paid, must be refunded.

S. A. No. 350 of 1947, D/- 16-3-1951.

Tenancy Laws—Orissa Tenancy Act (II [2] of 1913), S. 26 (2) — Nature of right or interest under — Purchase at revenue sale.

Under S. 26 (2) the co-sharer purchaser has only a mere possessory right & not any interest in the land by way of tenancy or otherwise. The possessory right ceases when the proprietary right ceases & there is no revival of the occupancy right on the cessation of the proprietary right. The co-sharer continuing in possession would, in the eye of the law, be a trespasser by such continuance.

The purchaser at a revenue sale gets only the defaulter's share in the estate & not the right title & interest of the defaulter. The purchaser is not entitled on account of his revenue purchase to step into the shoes of the defaulter in respect of the land held by him u/s. 26 (2).

The purchaser however, as a co-sharer, though he may not have acquired the right which the defaulter has u/s. 26 (2), would still be entitled to get a decree in ejectment against him, in a properly constituted suit. The pltf. has either to file a suit in ejectment of the defaulter from entirety of the suit lands but for the benefit of the whole body of co-sharers, or in the alternative a suit for ejectment from his own share & for joint possession along with the defaulter. The suit filed on the footing that the pltf. has acquired the right u/s. 26 (2), to khas possession of the suit lands, by his purchase is not such a suit. Case law discussed. [Paras 7, 8, 9]

Jagannadhadas J. — The deft. 2 is the applt. before us, the resps. being the pltf. & deft. 1. During the pendency of these proceedings in the lower appellate Ct. the matter appears to have been compromised between the pltf. & deft. 1 & that is apparently the reason why the present second appeal is only by deft. 2. The appeal arises under the following circumstances.

[2] Defts. 1 & 2 were the proprietors of a residuary Touzi No. 2463/R of the Cuttack Collectorate. This residuary Touzi was put up for sale for arrears of revenue & purchased by the pltf. on 11-9-44. The suit is by the said purchaser for recovery of Khas possession from the defts. of certain lands of the extent of 1.90 acres within the Touzi which have been recorded in the current settlement khatain Ext. 3 as being in the Khas possession of the father of defts. 1 & 2 u/s. 26 (2), Orissa Tenancy Act. The pltf's. case is that as a result of his purchase in Ct. auction, he has obtained also the right to the Khas possession of the suit lands. Admittedly, the suit lands constituted at one time a raiyati holding. They have been purchased by the defts'. father & have been since then in the possession of the family. The contention of the pltf. is that u/s. 26 (2), O. T. Act, these lands were held by the father of the defts. & thereafter by the defts. as mere proprietors & that therefore such interest as they had in it passed on to him on his purchase of their proprietary interest in the revenue sale. This contention has been upheld by both the Courts below & hence this second appeal.

[3] The Bench had occasion to consider recently in Nilmoni v. Govinda Chandra, I. L. R. 1950 Cut. p. 526 the effect of such a purchase when it was made prior to the Orissa Tenancy Act of 1913 & when the Bengal Tenancy Act was in force in this Province. We held that the result of such a purchase was the creation of an intermediate status for the purchasing proprietor which was neither that of an occupancy tenant or of a tenant-at-will. It was a tenancy right nevertheless which did not merge with the proprietary right. The question that arises for consideration in the present case is what would be the legal position when the purchase of the occupancy holding by the co-sharer proprietor was subsequent to the passing of the Orissa Tenancy Act of 1913. It may be mentioned that the record in the present case did not make it clear as to whether the purchase of the occupancy holding by the father of the defts. in this case was before 1913 or thereafter. We therefore adjourned the case on a previous hearing to enable the advocates on both sides to ascertain what the fact was. We have been informed that the purchase in this case was after 1913.

[4] The question at issue turns upon the proper construction of S. 26 (2), O. T. Act. The argument for the pltf. is that the defts. were in Khas possession of the land only as proprietors & that when he purchased their proprietary interest at the revenue sale, he obtained also the right to such Khas possession as was comprised within the proprietary right which he has purchased. The argument on behalf of the defts. is that the pltf. by his purchase obtained no more than the right to the defts.,' share in the estate as it originally stood & did not obtain the right to the additional advantage of Khas possession of certain lands which they had purchased, with their own money. They also maintain that S. 26 (2) has not the effect of entirely nullifying the purchase of the occupancy right made by them but that it merely imposes a disqualification on their holding the land as a raiyat, which disqualification continues only so long as they are proprietors. They contend therefore that having now ceased to be proprietors, there is nothing in law to prevent their getting the benefit of their original purchase of the occupancy right. They urged, therefore, that they are in the posision of occupancy raiyat of the land after they ceased to be cosharer-proprietor.

[5] No decided case dealing with this specific question has been brought to our notice. We have been told that the question has not come up for direct decision in this form which is rather surprising in view of the fact that the contingency which has arisen in this case is not at all an uncommon one.

[6] The view taken by the Cts. below relying on Bambhadur Lal v. Mt. Gungra, A. I. R. (12) 1925 Pat. 547; Gopi Singh v. Jagdeo Singh, A. I. R. (14) 1927 Pat. 172 and Sukhdeo Pandey v. Rameshwar Prasad, A. I. R. (23) 1939 Pat. 522, is that the right u/s. 26 (2) of the Orissa Tenancy Act which defts. 1 & 2 had in the suit lands was a right which they had as proprietors of the Touzi & that by the revenue sale they lost the same & that the pltf. as the purchaser got it. The determination of the point at issue involves an answer to two questions (1) What is the nature of the right or interest which cosharer proprietor has u/s. 26 (2)? (2) Does a purchaser at a revenue sale get, by his purchase that right or interest also?

[7] It would be convenient to take the second question first. Under S. 26 (2), it is no doubt true that the purchaser-proprietor has the right to hold the land only as a proprietor & not as a raiyat. But the right or interest so acquired by purchase is not a part of the estate itself which he holds in common with other co-proprietors, but is one outside it & is held by an independent source of title. Such a right is not comprised in, nor is it incidental to the co-proprietary interest. The statutory declaration that his right to hold it is as a proprietor is only a limitation of the rights which he would otherwise have had under the purchase enacted on consideration of public policy. There is therefore prima facie no reason to think that the purchaser at a revenue sale will be entitled to get .the benefit of this additional right of the defaulting proprietor unless his revenue purchase can be said to be a purchase of the right, title & interest of the defaulting proprietor himself. That a revenue sale has not that effect is well settled by the decisions of the P. C. & of the various H. Cs. In Surja Kanta v. Sarat Chandra, A. I. R. (1) 1914 P. C. 82, it has been laid down that "On the failure of an owner to pay the Govt. assessment his estate or interest in the land is forfeited or rather determined & under such a sale what is sold is not the interest of the defaulting owner, but the interest of the Crown subject to the payment of the Govt. assessment."

This view has been reiterated by their Lordships in Narayan Das v. Jatindra Nath, A. I. R. (14) 1927 P. C. 135, In Khemesh Chandra v. Abdul Hamid, A. I. R. (3) 1916 Cal. 184 it is laid down that :

"What passes at a revenue sale is not the right, title & interest of the defaulting proprietor, but the share as recorded in the Collector's book on which the revenue is assessed."

In Afzul Hussain v. Raj Buno Sahai, 30 Cal. p.1071, it has been held that the sale of the share of an estate for arrears of revenue under the provisions of Act XI [11] of 1859 does not affect wholly or in part a valid Mokarari lease of the land comprised in the estate notwithstanding the fact that the lease is held by some of the defaulting proprietors of the share sold, having fractional proprietary interest therein. These authorities are clear & decisive & it is the view so well-settled in these cases that has been adopted by my learned brother Panigrahi J. in I. L. R. (1950) Cut. 526, to which I was also a party. The cases in A. I. R. (12) 1925 Pat. 547 : A. I. R. (14) 1927 Pat. 172 & A. I. R. (26) 1939 Pat. 522 reld. on by the Cts. below do not conflict with this view. It has no doubt been stated broadly in these cases that the interest of a cosharer proprietor u/s. 26 (2), O. T. Act which is some what peculiar & anomalous one ceases when his proprietary interest is lost & that it would pass on to the person who acquires the interest of that cosharer. But an examination of the facts of these three cases would show that the sales with which the Ct. was concerned therein were probably either private sales or sales in Ct. auction of a Civil Ct. decree. At any rate, it is not clear that those decisions were concerned with the rights of the purchaser at a revenue sale. There is an obvious & clear distinction between the right obtained under a private sale or a Civil Ct. sale & those under a revenue sale. In the former, the purchase is of the right, title & interest of the vendor or of the J. D., but in the latter, as has been pointed out above, the purchaser gets only the defaulter's share in the estate & not the right, title & interest of the defaulter. This distinction has been overlooked by the Cts. below. I am therefore of the opinion that the pltf. is not entitled on account of his revenue purchase to step into the shoes of defts. 1 & 2 in respect of the lands held by them u/S. 26 (2), O. T. Act, whatever the nature of their right or interest may be in the lands.

[8] This, however, does not conclude the matter. If as has been suggested in some of the cases, the co-sharer proprietor loses his rights u/S. 26 (2) the moment he ceases to be a proprietor, then it may follow that he has no longer any right to hold the land at all & he may, therefore, be in the position of a trespasser liable to be ejected. In reply it has been contended on behalf of the applt. that the effect of S. 26 (2) is merely to impose a disqualification which subsists only so long as he is a proprietor & that his right under the original purchase of the occupancy right is revived the moment he ceases to be a proprietor. This requires a consideration of the nature of the interest of the purchasing cosharer-proprietor u/S. 26 (2). That interest is a right to hold the land as a proprietor but not as a raiyat. It is clearly, therefore, not a tenancy right at all. The tenancy right must be taken to have become merged in the proprietary right & that is what has been incidentally pointed out in the judgment of my learned brother Panigrahi J. in I. L. R. 1950 Cut. 526 at p. 530. The merger of the tenancy right on such a purchase is in accordance with the law propounded by the P. C. in Midnapore Zamindari Co. v. Naresh Narayan Roy, A. I. R. (11) 1924 P. C. 144 at p. 146 (2). In spite, however, of the merger, S. 26 (2) gives the purchasing proprietor one individual advantage, viz., the right to hold the land as against the other co-proprietors merely paying to them a fair & equitable sum for use and occupation. That is, he gets the sole benefit of the cultivating possession by his purchase & does not share this benefit with the other co-proprietors. To this extent only the Statute law in S. 26 (2) appears to have modified the law as laid down in A. I. R. (11) 1924 P. C. 144 at p. 146 (2). A consideration of the various legislative changes with reference to the rights of a co-sharer-purchaser who purchases the holding of an occupancy-raiyat is instructive. Sub-s. (2) of S. 22, Bengal Tenancy Act, as it stood before the amendment in 1907 was as follows :

"If the occupancy right in a land is transferred to a person jointly interested in the land as a proprietor or permanent tenure holder, it shall cease to exist, but nothing in this sub-section shall prejudicially affect the rights of any third person."

After the 1907 amendment, the same sub-section in the B. T. Act stood as follows :

"If the occupancy right in the land is transferred to a person jointly interested in the land as proprietor or permanent tenure holder, he shall be entitled to hold the land subject to the payment to his co-proprietors or joint permanent tenure-holders of the shares of the rent which may be from time to time payable to them, & if such transferee sublets the land to a third person, such third person shall be deemed to be a tenure-holder or a rayat, as the case may be in respect of the land."

The corresponding present provision in the Orissa Tenancy Act of 1913 which is S. 26 (2) thereof is as follows :

"If the occupancy right in the land is transferred to a person jointly interested in the land, as proprietor or permanent tenure-holder, such person shall have no right to hold the land as a raiyat, but shall hold it as a proprietor or permanent tenure-holder as the case may be, & shall pay to his co sharers a fair & equitable sum for the use & occupation of the same."

The position of the cosharer-proprietor u/S. 26 (2), B. T. Act, both before & after 1907 has been fully dealt with, in the F. B. judgment in Upendra Pratap v. Ishwarwati Koer, A.I.R. (37) 1950 Pat. 115. In the majority view the right of the co-sharer-proprietor is an intermediate tenancy of some sort (see p. 126, col. II). In the view of Narayan J. in the same F. B. as expressed at p. 134, col. I, this anomalous tenancy right can last only so long as the proprietor continues to possess his proprietary interest, a view for which his Lordship derives support from the decision in A. I. R. (12) 1925 Pat. 547. That is also what is laid down in A. I. R. (14) 1927 Pat. 172 & A. I. R. (26) 1939 Pat. 522. The difference of views reflected in the above F. B. case in A. I. R. (37) 1950 Pat. 115 turned only on whether the right ceased on partition & allotment of the lands to another sharer. But there was no difference in the view that the right to hold ceases when the proprietary right itself ceases. If that is the correct legal position, as regards the right or the interest of the co-sharer proprietor, with reference to the provisions of S. 22 (2), Bengal Tenancy Act, it appears to me that the position of the co-sharer-proprietor is definitely weaker u/s. 26 (2), Orissa Tenancy Act, having regard to the difference in the wording. Under the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act, as it stood in 1907, all that is provided, is that the occupancy right ceases to exist. This was held to mean that the holding continued & that the purchasing proprietor has some sort of a tenancy right. This view was recognised by the 1907 amendment by specifically providing that what the co-sharer was to pay was a proportionate share of the rent to other co-proprietor. Therefore, under these provisions, there was definite scope for holding that the purchasing co-proprietor had an interest by way of a tenancy right. But the present provision in the Orissa Tenancy Act makes it quite clear that the purchasing co-proprietor shall have no right to hold the land as a raiyat. Therefore, any tenancy right in the purchase is ruled out & as has been pointed out above it is merged in the proprietary right. He has the right to hold the land only as a proprietor. The sub-section, therefore, recognises nothing more than his right to hold possession, & gives him the right to keep that possession as against the other co-proprietors, who cannot call upon him to share the benefits of the cultivating possession, but are only entitled to a fair & equitable sum for the use & occupation of the land. It appears to me, therefore, quite clear that under the present provision of S. 26 (2), what the co-sharer-purchaser has, is only a mere possessory right & not any interest in the land by way of tenancy or otherwise. It may be that this possessory right is heritable & transferable along with the proprietary right; but the question is whether it continues if the proprietary right ceases. In my view, the only reasonable construction of the phrase "shall hold it as a proprietor" occurring in S. 26 (2), Orissa Tenancy Act, is that the possessory right given thereby ceases when the proprietary right ceases. There appears to me to be absolutely no justification for reading into the sub-section a revival of the occupancy right on the cessation of the proprietary right. S. 22 (2), Bengal Tenancy Act, as it stood prior to 1907 categorically said that "the occupancy right shall cease to exist" & not merely that it shall be suspended. It is to my mind the same idea, of extinction & not suspension & something more that is conveyed in S. 26 (2), Orissa Tenancy Act, when it says "such person shall have no right to hold the land as a raiyat but shall hold it as a proprietor." It is not possible to read these words with the qualification that the right to hold as a raiyat would be revived on the cessation of the proprietary right & as implying any limitation on the prohibition confined to the period of the subsistence of the proprietary right. In my view, therefore, defts. 1 & 2 have lost the right to continue in cultivating possession of the suit-lands & would, therefore, in the eye of law be trespassers by such continuance.

[9] Learned counsel for the applt. (sic) argues that in this view, he, as a co-sharer, though he may not have acquired the right which defts. 1 & 2 had, u/s. 26 (2), would still be entitled to get a decree in ejectment against them. In support of this position, he relies on the cases in Ahmad Sahib v. Magnesite Syndicate Ltd., A. I. R. (2) 1915 Mad. 1214, Maganlal Dulab Das v. Budhar Purshotam, A. I. R. (14) 1927 Bom. 192, Currimthoy & Co. Ltd. v. L. A. Creet, A. I. R. (17) 1930 Cal. 113 and Sambhu Gosain v. Piyari Mian, A. I. R. (28) 1941 Pat. 351. While no doubt these cases show that one co-sharer can maintain ejectment as against a trespasser, without impleading the other co-sharers, they also show that he can do so only, for the benefit of the entire group of co-sharers. This is made clear in A. I. R. (14) 1927 Bom. 192 at p. 195, where their Lordships say as follows:

"It may be pointed out, however, though it should hardly be necessary to do so, that the pltf. could get possession in the suit, not only for himself alone, but really for the benefit of the co-owners."

In such a suit by one co-sharer for ejectment, it would be open to the deft.-trespasser to show that he is in possession with the consent of the other co-owner. If he shows the same, the pltf. co-owner will be entitled to get a decree in ejectment only to the extent of his own share & will be entitled only to joint possession. This was clearly laid down in Hira Lal v. Bhairon, 5 ALL. 602, Radha Proshad v. Esuf, 7 Cal. 414 and Harendra Narain v. Moran, 15 Cal. 40. Such possession, however, to the extent of his own share, he can get only in a properly constituted suit. The pltf. has either to file a suit in ejectment of the defts., from entirety of the suit-lands but for the benefit of the whole body of co-sharers, or in the alternative a suit for ejectment from his own share & for joint possession along with the defaulter defendants. The suit as filed & as appears from the plaint, is on the footing that the pltf. has acquired the right u/s. 26 (2) to khas possession of the suit lands, by his purchase. It is not a suit for possession either for the benefit of the entire body of co-sharers or one for joint possession with defts. 1 & 2 to the extent of his own share. It would, therefore, be unfair to the defts. to give a decree in ejectment in favour of the pltf. on a footing different from what the plaint has asked for & on a title & cause of action which is different depriving the defts. of the defence which they may have in a properly constituted suit.

[10] In the circumstances, therefore, the pltf.'s suit has to be dismissed leaving it open to him to obtain ejectment of the defts. from the suit lands either wholly or partially in a separate & properly constituted suit.

[11] In the result, therefore, the appeal must be allowed with costs throughout.

A. F. A. D. No. 162 of 1946, D/- 30-4-1951.

† (a) T. P. Act (1882), S. 58 (c), Third condition — Sale or mortgage — Postponement of mutation — Covenant for refund on dispossession — Construction in case of ambiguity — S. A. 41 of 1946 overruled.

Where the mortgagor ostensibly sells the mortgage property on condition that on such payment being made the buyer shall transfer the property to the seller and the condition is embodied in the document which effects or purports to effect the sale in accordance with the proviso added to S. 58 (c) by the T. P. Amendment Act, 1929, it is to be presumed a mortgage, and the party, who asserts to the contrary, must have to prove it. This proof will consist of the provisions of the document, the necessary legal implications thereof, and such surrounding circumstances as are admissible to prove how the language of the deed is related to the existence of real facts. This rule of admissibility of evidence is subject to the exception that, only in case of fraud, the oral evidence of real intention may be admissible. But in the conditional sales, effected by one or more documents prior to the 1929 amendment with the above condition there is no presumption either way. Their nature and character are to be determined irrespective of the form according as the parties intended. This intention has to be ascertained by construing the provisions of the deed, interpreting the language thereof in the light of the surrounding circumstances bearing upon it and their necessary implications with reference to either forthright conveyance of absolute rights to the buyer or their postponement by withholding from him, till expiry of the time for fulfilment of the condition, various rights, privileges and interests inherent in the absoluteness of proprietary rights or by imposing timely restrictions upon such privileges and the like. Express provision for postponement of mutation of the grantee's name in the landlord's papers till after the time for repayment expires is decisive of the transaction being a mortgage; but in cases of transfer of occupancy holdings before they were made freely transferable by the Orissa Tenancy Amendment Act, 1938, postponement of mutation is rather inconclusive and the nature of the transaction will have to be decided on construction of the deed in the light of the surrounding circumstances. Covenant for refund of consideration money with interest on dispossession or disturbance of possession of the grantee not attributable to grantor's defective title is indicative of a mortgage rather than a sale, while, on the other hand, such a covenant in case of dispossession due to grantor's defective title is inconclusive. In case of ambiguity or doubt, ex facie import of the tenor of the document affecting the transaction shall prevail. The ambiguity or the doubt must, in each case, be inherent in the provisions of the deed and not dissoluble by reference to the surrounding circumstances. Case law discussed. S. By its very terms, it is made clear that the sale is not a completed and absolute one from the beginning but has the contingency of either becoming final and absolute or becoming void. (Para 13)

Per Das, J.: A transaction by way of an ex facie sale which contains a stipulation, rendering the sale absolute in default of payment or avoiding the sale on payment, cannot be 'ipso facto' held to be a mortgage without any consideration of the intention to be gathered from the other terms of the document and of the surrounding circumstances. Per Das, J.: Delay in seeking redemption is a circumstance which must call for scrutiny. Unexplained delay must receive its due weight as one of the relevant circumstances, by way of conduct where such conduct is admissible. (Para 45)

RAY, C. J.: This appeal was heard by Das, J. & Narasimham J. In view of the four unreported decisions of this Court in Second Appeal No. 10 of 1945, Second Appeal No. 192 of 1946, Second Appeal No. 86 of 1944 & Second Appeal No. 41 of 1946 giving rise to conflicting opinions on some vital aspects of the question as to certain distinctive features of a transaction of "mortgage by conditional sale" as distinguished from "a sale out & out", they have referred it to a Full Bench. The divergence of view, that according to them was of a serious character, was regarding the burden of proof, & besides, it also related to the effect of

"(1) the insertion of a penalty clause in such document for return of the consideration money plus interest if the vendee is dispossessed from the lands through defect of title of the vendor or otherwise; & (2) the insertion of an express provision postponing mutation of the name of the vendee in the landlord's sherasta till expiry of the stipulated period."

(2) The conflict of opinion, as to the burden of proof, arose in the following manner: In the unreported decision of a Division Bench of this Court consisting of myself & brother Panigrahi in Second Appeal No. 10 of 1945, it is held that in a case where the distinctive condition of a "mortgage by conditional sale" is embodied in the document, that effects or purports to effect the sale, the transaction is prima facie a mortgage. A contrary view was given in Second Appeal No. 86 of 1944 in their decision by my learned brothers Das & Narasimham, JJ., to the effect that

"inasmuch as the ex facie import of such a document is that of an out & out sale, the burden is upon the person asserting that it is a mortgage, to make it out to be so."

For this, it is said, they relied upon the Privy Council decisions, reported in 'Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhagwan Din', (12 All 387; 'Jhanda Singh v. Wahiduddin', (38 All 570), & the Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court in 'Muthuvelu Mudaliar v. Vythilinga Mudaliar', (42 Mad 407). Similarly, in Second Appeal No. 10 of 1945 it was held that

"(1) postponement of vendee's right to record the sale in the landlord's paper & (2) consequent freedom from obligations to pay rent or other public charges on the holding sold, & (3) the covenant for refund of the consideration money with interest at a stipulated rate in the event of the grantee's dispossession not attributable to defect in grantor's title" are circumstances that impart to it features decisively distinctive of the transaction as a mortgage rather than a sale. On the other hand, in Second Appeal No. 86 of 1944, Das & Narasimham, JJ., have taken the view that both the aforesaid circumstances are inconclusive.

(3) In this context, the question that arises for consideration is whether the case of 'Gouri Pradhan v. Bhagaban Pradhan', in Second Appeal No. 10 of 1945 has been correctly decided. The propositions for solution may be formulated as follows: Firstly, whether if "the condition is embodied in the document which effects or purports to effect sale" as prescribed in the proviso to S. 58 (c), T. P. Act, it gives rise to a presumption that the transaction is a mortgage; Secondly, whether the express provision for postponement of mutation of the grantee's name in the landlord's papers till after the time for repayment expires is decisive of the transaction being a mortgage; Thirdly, whether the covenant for refund of the consideration money with interest from the date of grantee's dispossession, if any, either attributable to defects of grantor's title or otherwise, is a circumstance decisive of its character as a mortgage; & Fourthly, in view of Das, J's expression of doubt about the correctness of certain observations of Panigrahi, J., in Second Appeal No. 41 of 1946, with which I did not go to the full length of concurring at the time, the further question that arises for solution is whether in case of ambiguity or doubt, the construction should lean in favour of a mortgage & not of a sale, or, whether, on the other hand, ex facie import of the tenor of the document or documents shall prevail.

(4) I have studied carefully a very long catena of decisions, cited at the Bar, bearing on the topic, always bearing in mind to make out, if I could, any general rule of construction out of them. To put it broadly, it will not be far from correct to say that, excepting a few fundamentals that underlie, it is too hazardous to make out any inflexible rule of construction.

(5) It should also be noticed that, in the Indian decisions of the earlier ages, the Judges were confused between the English law of equity & the India law, as it then stood (before the T. P. Act), in the matter of determination of the nature of the transactions which had all the appearance of conditional sales or sales subject to the condition of repurchase. Some of the elements of confusion were also due to the tendency in India to make out a rule of general application of the observations of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee occasioned by the particular facts & circumstances of that case.

(6) I shall first review the relevant decisions of the Privy Council, that have either been cited at the bar, or otherwise come to my notice, from earliest to the later — they cover the period beginning with December, 1849, & ending with June, 1924. The Indian decisions of different High Courts have been based upon either one or the other of such decisions according as the facts of the case bore resemblance to the facts & circumstances appearing in the cases decided by the Board.

(7) I shall, however, allow my review of the Board's decisions on the subject to be preceded by a few introductory remarks collected from the commentaries on mortgage by conditional sale, or sale with a condition of retransfer. In the equity jurisdiction in England, the following tests were applied in distinguishing a mortgage by conditional sale from a sale with a covenant for reconveyance; (i) the existence of a debt; (ii) the long period for repayment; (iii) the continuance of the grantor in possession; (iv) stipulation for interest on repayment; (v) price below the true value; & (vi) contemporaneous deed stipulating for reconveyance. The characteristic feature of a sale with a condition of retransfer (not amounting to a mortgage) was that it was a transfer of all rights in a property reserving only a personal right of repurchase. This distinction was emphasised in the case of 'Alderson v. White', (1850-44 E R 924) — a decision that afforded the foundation for negativing a mortgage & upholding a sale of transactions in large number of cases, both in India & England, including cases decided by their Lordships' Board in the Privy Council. 'Alderson's case', however, was held in England as not in any way interfering with the trend of decisions in the equity jurisdiction in England which granted relief against time being of the essence of the contract & allowed equity of redemption to be exercised. It has almost been unanimously accepted that the Law of mortgage by conditional sale enacted in the T. P. Act was the statutory recognition of the principles of the equity of redemption that obtained in England. This statutory adoption of the law of equity conferring right of redemption upon the mortgagors gave a quietus to the confusion that prevailed in India. The question since then reduces itself to one of construction of the deed or deeds evidencing a transaction of mortgage by conditional sale.

(8) The earliest Privy Council case on the point is that of 'Muttyloll Seal v. Annundo Chunder', 5 M I A 72. The question which arose in appeal before the Supreme Court at Fort William in Bengal was whether the dealing with certain real estate (a conveyance of which was made in fee by way of Lease & Release) constituted, under the circumstances, an absolute & unconditional sale, or, whether it was not in the nature of a mortgage transaction, & liable to a defeasance. Sir Lawrence Peel, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, relying mainly on the circumstances that the grantor continuing in possession of the property demised agreed to pay as rent reserved under the lease a sum of Rs. 425 per month — a sum equal to the interest as stipulated on the principal sum advanced, subject to reduction according as payment towards principal was made from time to time, & secondly, that the sum advanced was a very inadequate price for the whole property, & thirdly, that the seller stipulated to do expensive repairs & to pay all the costs of the covenant & finding that no other explanation except if the transactions were one of security was afforded of these circumstances, held that the transaction was a security & not a sale. This action had been started on the equity side of the Supreme Court, & was decreed declaring that the transaction was a mortgage, & that on payment of the principal money & the interest due on accounting, the defts. be called upon to reassign & reconvey to the pltf. (the seller) the real estate concerned. Lord Langdale, delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, observed:

".....our opinion, if given in detail, might not have been altogether in accordance with the decision of the Court below, yet, giving our best consideration to the whole matter, we do not find any reason which appears to us sufficient to alter that decision."

As it appears very clearly from the report, the consideration of this case was based entirely on the law prevailing in equity jurisdiction in England which evidently was applicable to the circumstances of the case. (b) 1865: The next in point of time is that of 'Forbes v. Ameeroonissa Begum', 10 M I A 340. This was a case from the High Court at Calcutta. Since the case of 'Muttyloll Seal', several Regulations had come into operation in Bengal, namely, Bengal Regulations Nos. I & XV of 1793 & No. XVII of 1806. The case arose from a proceeding for foreclosure of a mortgage by conditional sale (Bye-bilwuffa). The case related to the respective rights of the parties (mortgagor & mortgagee) in relation to right of redemption, foreclosure & completion of mortgagee's title. The difficulty, such as we are concerned with, did not arise in the case. From this, it is, however, clear, as a matter of history, that anterior to the year 1806, the rights of a holder of a Bye-bil-wuffa were enforceable according to the strict terms of the agreement. Time was of the essence of the contract which executed itself on its expiry. The Regulations, however, conferred upon the debtor the equity of redemption by way of relief against the condition of time. (c) 1870: The case of 'Pattabhiramier v. Vencatarow Naikan', 13 M I A 560, was a case from Madras whereto the Bengal Regulation of 1806 had not been extended. Their Lordships said, that this form of security had long been common in India as stated in the preamble to Bengal Reg. No. I of 1798; that such contracts were recognised & enforced 'according to their letter by the ancient Hindu Law as it appears from several passages' in Colebrooke's Digest Vol. I, pp. 183, 187, 188 & 193; that they were equally recognised & enforced by Mohammedan law is shown by Mr. Baillie in his introduction to the Mohammedan law of sale; that in cases to which Beng. Reg. XVII of 1806 (which allowed a mortgagor who had executed such a security as that now in question to redeem at any time before the mortgagee had finally foreclosed the mortgage by taking the proceedings which the Regulation made essential to foreclosure) does not apply, the interest of a mortgagee under a deed of conditional sale becomes absolute, according to the terms of the contract, by the mere failure of the mortgagor to redeem within the stipulated period & it has been so decided by a Full Bench of the High Court of Bengal in the case of 'Sarifunnisa v. Enayet Hossein', 5 W R 88; that the point so decided is also assumed to be the law in the judgment delivered at their Lordships' Board in the case of 'Forbes v. Ammeroonisa Begum'; that in the absence of any positive legislation or established practice modifying ancient law of the country it was erroneous for the Sadar Court of Madras to lay down that the mortgagee was under the obligation of taking any proceeding in law for foreclosure; that the "equity of redemption", owed its existence to the doctrine established by the British Courts of Equity that the time stipulated in a mortgage deed is not of the essence of the contract; & that such a doctrine was unknown to the ancient law of India. (d) 1875: The case of 'Thumbasawmy Mudelly v. Mohomed Hossain', 2 I A 241, laid down most emphatically, approving the decision of the Board in the case of 'Pattabhiramier', that mortgages by conditional sales were to take effect strictly according to the letter in Madras & other parts of India where Bengal Regulation XVII of 1806 was not in force, that is, that in default of payment within the time fixed, the mortgagee becomes the absolute owner of the property. But that with regard to the transaction in the case, they held that it was a mortgage usufructuary & not a mortgage by conditional sale, & accordingly, the case stood clear of the decision in 'Pattabhiramier's case'. They, however, made a very important observation, namely, that since 1858, in Madras & 1871 in Bombay, the Judges of Sadar Adawlats were in error in administering the law of India in conformity with the established practice of the Court of Equity in England, thereby recognising in the mortgagor a right of redemption notwithstanding the time for foreclosure may have passed by. In applying this principle in India, their Lordships said, the Judges of the Sadar Court took upon themselves, in contravention of the law of India, to apply to this class of security for the first time the principle which the English Courts of Equity have for centuries applied to mortgages in that country. They concluded their judgment with a recommendation that:

"An Act affirming the right of the mortgagor to redeem until foreclosure by a judicial proceeding, & giving to the mortgagee the means of obtaining such a foreclosure, with a reservation in favour of mortgagees whose titles, the law as understood before 1858, had become absolute before a date to be fixed by the Act, would probably settle the law, without injustice to any party".

(9) Shortly, after this, the T. P. Act (IV (4) of 1882) was enacted. In conformity with the recommendation of their Lordships of the Privy Council, the Act (S. 2) left undisturbed the previous legal relations constituted before the Act came into force. S. 2(c) provides:

".....But nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect any right or liability arising out of a legal relation constituted before this Act comes into force, or any relief in respect of any such right or liability:....."

The word 'relief', in this clause, like the words "right & liability", denotes "substantive right". There is a clear distinction between "a relief" & "the procedure for obtaining that relief". A mortgagee, coming into Court after the commencement of the Act to enforce a mortgage, must follow the procedure enjoined by the Act, even though the mortgage be before the Act (See 'Bhobo Sundari v. Rakhal Chunder', 12 Cal 583). The same has also been the view in the High Court of Allahabad & Madras.

(10) 1890. (e) The first case that came before the Board after the passing of the T. P. Act was that of 'Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhagawan Din', 12 All 387. The transaction, which gave rise to this case, was effected by two documents, dated, 20-2-1835. The pltfs. in the case, in claiming right of redemption, asserted that the transaction sale (sic.) within Reg. XVII of 1806, which gave the mortgagor a right of redemption. The question, with which their Lordships were concerned, was one of construction. They found that the first document was one of absolute sale. In the second document of the even date, the purchaser asserted that he had purchased the property, but, however, as a matter of favour & mercy, stipulated that if within a period of 10 years, the vendor would pay back in a lump sum & without interest the whole amount, he should accept the same & cancel the valid sale & that during the aforesaid time he should remain in possession, enjoy the profits & 'be liable for the loss & the vendor should have no concern whatsoever'. In case the principal was not paid (according to the terms of the document), the vendor should not be able to cancel the sale by payment of the principal. Their Lordships of the Privy Council, following the case of 'Alderson v. White', held that it was a case of absolute sale with a covenant for reconveyance & not a security. In 'Alderson's case', the Lord Chancellor observed:

"The rule of law on this subject (whether in view of Court of Equity the transaction ought to be treated as a mortgage) is one dictated by commonsense, that prima facie an absolute conveyance containing nothing to show that the relation of debtor & creditor is to exist between the parties does not cease to be an absolute conveyance & become a mortgage merely because the vendor stipulates that he shall have a right to repurchase.....In every such case, the question is, what upon a fair construction is the meaning of the instruments?.....I think that the Court after a lapse of 30 years ought to require cogent evidence to induce it to hold that an instrument is not what it purports to be; & I see but little evidence to that effect here."

The rule of presumption, that the party, asserting that an instrument is not what it purports to be, has the onus on him, owes its authority to this case, as it will be noticed presently. Their Lordships of the Privy Council, in the premises of the case, made no distinction between the law of India & of England. (f) 1899. The next case, that came before the Board, was that of 'Balkishen Das v. Legge', 27 I A 58. Here too, the transaction was anterior to the T. P. Act. Their Lordships, while noticing that, according to the ancient law in India, a mortgage by conditional sale was enforceable according to the letter under which time was of the essence of the contract, on construction of the two deeds before them, came to the conclusion that it was a security. This, they did, firstly, on account of a provision in the second deed (that if the vendee objects to receive money & relinquish the property, the vendor may deposit the amount in the treasury, by virtue of this agreement, & obtain possession over the 'ilaka'), & this provision, according to their Lordships, at once suggested a reference to Regulation I of 1798 as being in the opinion of the parties applicable to the case, it being assumed that there was no other statutory provision or practice by which such deposit could be made; secondly, on account of the condition that the estate was redeemable not only on payment of the stipulated sum, that is, the price for sale, but also of an amount which should be found due at the time of redemption on account of another loan; & lastly, that the transaction having the character of a mortgage, so far as the loans on the factory accounts were concerned, it may be held to be so entirely. 'Bhagwan Sahai's case' was distinguished as it was decided on the language of the deeds there in question. Accordingly, their Lordships declared that the pltf. was entitled to redemption. Their Lordships, however, laid down certain propositions which made a departure from the decisions of anterior dates of the Indian High Courts. These propositions are: (i) that it may be assumed that the framers of the T. P. Act, in defining in Cl. (c) of S. 58, intended to state the existing law & practice in India; (ii) that the case in the English Court of Chancery had not, in the opinion of their Lordships, any application to the law of India as laid down in the Acts of the Indian Legislature; (iii) that oral evidence, prohibited as it is by S. 92, Evidence Act, was inadmissible for the purpose of construing the deeds or ascertaining the intention of the parties unless any such evidence could be brought within the exceptions, contained in the several provisos to the section; & (iv) finally that the case must, therefore, be decided on a consideration of the contents of the documents themselves, with such extrinsic evidence of surrounding circumstances as may be required to show in what manner the language of the documents is related to existing facts. (g) 1916. Then came the case of 'Jhanda Singh v. Wahiud-Din', 38 All 570. The decision, in this case, is seemingly in conflict with the case of 'Balkishen Das & others', inasmuch as, the provision in the deed of covenant for repurchase (that in the event of vendee's refusal to receive the money, the vendor shall have power to deposit it into the treasury) — a provision exactly similar to the one in the 'Balkishen Das & others' case' — could not persuade their Lordships to hold that the transaction, under their consideration, was one of security. But on close examination, their Lordships did not appear to override the legal effect of that sort of provision as will appear from the observation to the effect that the fact that the machinery provided for deposit under the provisions of Reg. I of 1798 & XVII of 1806, is made applicable to the case 'might disclose to some extent the intention of the parties to create a mortgage'; but that the clause having been extremely ill-drawn & its provision being self-contradictory, their Lordships said "the clause so obscure & contradictory cannot furnish any true guide to the intention of the parties". In view of the close resemblance which the case of 'Bhagawan Sahai', 12 All 387, had with the case before their Lordships & relying upon Lord Cranworth's observation in 'Alderson v. White', (that prima facie an absolute covenant containing nothing to show the relation of debtor & creditor does not cease to be an absolute conveyance & become a mortgage merely because the vendor stipulates that he shall have a right to repurchase), they held that the transaction before them was one of security. They also made a reference to the provisions of the deed incorporating covenant for repurchase in 'Bhagawan Sahai's case' in order to show how it was expressly provided that time was of the essence of the contract. Their Lordships laid much stress upon the circumstances that the deed incorporating the covenant for repurchase was not the result of any contemporaneously contemplated or antecedently arrived at agreement of resale or repurchase. On the other hand, they decided that the contract for repurchase was an afterthought. I would quote the passage bearing on it;

"This deed upon its face purports to be an absolute deed of sale. It does not refer to any contemplated or antecedent agreement of resale or repurchase, & does not disclose any intention whatever to treat the disposal of the property mentioned in it as anything other than an absolute transfer on sale for certain definite sum.....The recital in the bond is certainly more consistent with the contract for repurchase being an afterthought than the contrary."

In the result, this case reiterates the proposition laid down in 'Bhagwan Sahai's case', viz., that, in distinguishing security from an absolute sale with a condition of repurchase, the intention of the parties was the real test & the same must be gathered from the language of the documents themselves viewed in the light of the surrounding circumstances. (h) 1917: The next case is that of 'Maung Kyin v. Ma Shwe La', 44 I A 236. This case is not so much in point for our purpose. It decides that a third party can adduce oral evidence of intention of the parties to a document, S. 92, Evidence Act notwithstanding, as the ban is confined to the parties only. To this extent, Bhagawan Sahai's case' is distinguished. (i) 1924: The last case of the series is that of 'Narasingerji Jyanagerji v. Parathasaradhi Rayanim Garu', 47 Mad 729. This decision is of very far reaching importance. This was a case from Madras. The learned Chief Justice of the Madras High Court had held that though the findings of fact, in the case before him, would support the inference that the covenant was originally intended as a security for money & must be treated as a mortgage, he was not at liberty to hold that it was so on account of certain dicta of the Privy Council, viz., that the equitable decisions of England are inapplicable in India ('Balkishen Das v. Legge', 27 I A 58), that the case must be decided on the consideration of the contents of the documents themselves with such extrinsic & surrounding circumstances as may be required to show in what manner the language of the documents is related to the existing facts & that no evidence is admissible under the proviso (of S. 92, Evidence Act) for the purpose of contradicting the terms of the documents (vide ,27 I A 58, 38 All 570 & 44 I A 236). He regretted that strict application of this rule (that the extrinsic evidence admissible for construction of the document should be of a limited character as laid down by the Privy Council) may have the effect of excluding most of these transactions from the class of mortgages by conditional sale. To such a feeling of disappointment expressed by the learned Chief Justice, their Lordships replied:

"They would only observe before parting with it that, as at present advised, they must not be taken to subscribe to the view that there has been introduced into the law of India such a radical change in the laws of evidence as is suggested by the learned Chief Justice, a change which would have the effect of excluding from the class of mortgages by conditional sale many transactions which before the Evidence Act would have been held to be within that class."

Their Lordships, at the outset, made it clear that in disposing of the case they made no reference to the oral evidence (as to the intention) other than that of surrounding circumstances, such as, in Lord Davey's words '27 I A 58', may be required to show in what manner the language of the document is related to the existing facts. What their Lordships decided may be thus summarised: Notwithstanding that the appearance of an absolute sale & a right of repurchase within the time limit is laboriously maintained in the document, the surrounding circumstances & necessary implication from the provisions of the deed should be closely examined to reveal the real nature of the transactions. Such implications & circumstances were, according to their Lordships, indicated by (i) inadequacy of price, (ii) absence of any bargaining as to the price, (iii) the vendor indemnifying the vendee against loss for entering into the transaction, (iv) the vendee's right to enforce the covenant for repurchase, & (v) reservation of certain rights in the covenant itself, namely, reserving of minerals & other restrictions on the vendee's usufructuary privileges, inconsistent & almost unintelligible provision as to the time limit for the exercise of the vendor's right of repurchase.

(11) Amongst other cases of the Indian High Courts to be noticed presently, the case of 'Muthuvely Mudaliar v. Vythilinga Mudaliar', 42 Mad 407, is of the greatest practical significance. The question, referred to the Full Bench, was

"whether where in one & the same transaction, land is sold absolutely but with right of repurchase to be exercised before a certain date, the transaction necessarily becomes by virtue of S. 58, T. P. Act, a mortgage by conditional sale, whatever the intention of the parties might have been....."

Occasion for this reference arose from difference of views between Sadasiv Aiyar, J. & Napier J., the former having pronounced in 'Palaniappan v. Subbaraya Goundan', 1 M L W 80, that after the passing of the T. P. Act whatever the intention of the parties was, if there was a single settlement out of which arose either one or two documents both connected & interdependent in which there was a sale with a condition of repurchase, the transaction must be that of a mortgage. The Full Bench overruled this decision & Allis C. J. observed:

"There is, in my opinion, nothing in the definition in S. 58 (c) which favours the view that, wherever the sale deed & the agreement to reconvey from one transaction, it must necessarily be a mortgage & not a sale."

The learned Chief Justice further said, with reference to the decision of the Privy Council,

"It is true that all these cases dealt with transactions before the passing of the T. P. Act, but I do not think that Act made any difference in the law on the subject in the part of India. In 'Balkishen Das v. Legge', 22 All 149, their Lordships observed that it might be assumed that the framers of the T. P. Act intended in S. 58 to state the existing law & practice in India."

Seshagiri Ayyar, J. summarised the position in the following words:

"All that was said in 38 All 570 was that an essential requisite for construing such document as a mortgage is that they should be dependent upon a single arrangement & not that such a test is a conclusive criterion of the transaction being a mortgage."

He further said:

"A party who wishes the document to be understood as being different from what the words suggest should show the form in which the language is clothed does not express the real intention of the parties & that, in substance, the parties intended that there should be a transaction different from what the language imports."

(12) I shall pause here for a moment & try to put in a nut-shell the result of the decisions, already referred to. In my view, they represent, as between themselves, all the various & varied aspects from which the question, at issue, may be approached. Besides, my attention has been drawn to a considerable number of decisions of various High Courts in India, which I have closely examined, & I do not think that I shall be justified in dealing with them all except a very few which bear upon the special features of the present case, or demonstrate the practical application of the general & fundamental rules laid down by the Privy Council from time to time. The ancient law of India, both in the Hindu & Mohammedan jurisprudence, recognised the conditional sale as a kind of mortgage. The transaction of this kind of mortgage passed by various names, viz., Bye-bil-wuffa, Gahan-Lahan, Kut-kabala, Kut-Bandhak, Sarti-Kabala, & Sarti-Bikraya-Kabala. The equitable doctrines prevailing in the equity jurisdiction of England that evolved out of the decisions of the Chancery Courts, in granting relief against forfeiture of penalties or defeasance clauses, in order to relieve the debtors against the oppressing & grasping creditors, had no application to these mortgages prevailing in India where equity of redemption, suits, or proceedings for foreclosure, or the like were unknown. The contracts of mortgage by conditional sale by whatever designation known used to execute themselves by their very letter, or, in other words, time was of the essence of the contract. Before this was quite apparent to the English Judges, they fell into error, both in India as well as in England, to bring the equitable rules of relief against forfeiture of penal clauses to apply to Indian mortgages by conditional sales. Such cases, however, were very few in the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court & its successor, the High Court of Judicature at Calcutta.

(13) The Legislature stepped in & introduced legislation conferring equity of redemption on the mortgagors & setting up machinery for enabling them to enforce it. They thus were relieved against time as of the essence of the contract, & the creditors were required to have to take recourse to foreclosure proceedings for completion of their title by various Regulations commencing with one of the year 1793 & later supplemented by Regulations of 1798 & 1806. The Regulation XVII of 1806 achieved the culmination by full statutory recognition of the rules of equity of the Chancery jurisdiction of England. This Regulation took a long time before its several sections were extended by piecemeal legislation to other parts of British India. In Madras & Bombay jurisdictions, as I have already pointed out, the Judges of the Supreme Courts & the High Courts applied the doctrines obtaining in equity jurisdiction of England to transactions of conditional sales in their respective Presidencies until the decisions were held to be erroneous being, as they were, in violation of the law of the forum in India. In the year 1875, in the case of 'Thumbaswamy Mudely', 2 I A 241, their Lordships' Board suggested legislation to be undertaken for the purpose of affirming the right of mortgagor to redeem until foreclosure & giving to the mortgagee the means of obtaining such foreclosure. The T. P. Act took its place in the statute book of India in this historical background. It was assumed in the case of 'Balkishen Das v. Legge', 27 I A 58. that the framers of the T. P. Act. in S. 58 (c), intended to state the existing law & practice of India. This section gives an exhaustive definition of "mortgage by conditional sale". According to the definition, the transaction — in reality a mortgage — has to be expressed in terms of a conditional sale. The conditions laid down in the section are: that (i) on default of payment of the mortgage money on a certain date, the sale shall become absolute; (ii) or (in the alternative) on such payment (payment of mortgage money being made) the sale shall become void; (iii) or, on such payment being made the buyer shall trasfer the property to the seller. So far as the third alternative is concerned, its incorporation in one document, or in more contemporaneous documents of sale (ostensible), gives the transaction a close resemblance to a transaction of an absolute sale with a covenant of resale or repurchase, as the case may be. In cases of the latter kind, the difficulty of construction, in order to discriminate a mortgage from a sale, presented itself from time to time. Almost the entire body of decisions, making up the case law on the subject, owe their existence to this difficulty. Various tests, borrowed from the decisions in the equity jurisdiction of England, have been laid down as applicable to cases arising in India involving determination of the question, while a particular transaction, evidenced by a deed which contains either the first or the second condition, presents in my judgment no difficulty whatsoever. Such a transaction, answering strictly to the definition, must be one of mortgage. By its very terms, it is made clear that the sale is not a completed & absolute one from the beginning but has the contingency of either becoming final & absolute or becoming void. Through the courtesy & kindness of my learned brother Narasimham, J., my attention has been drawn to at least two decisions which, it is said, stand out of the general run of the cases & indicate that even in cases where the condition, on which the mortgagor ostensibly sells the mortgage properties, is either

"that on default of payment of the mortgage money on a certain date the sale shall become absolute, or that on such payment being made the sale shall become void," the Court should have to apply the same consideration as would apply to transactions of ostensible sales on condition of repurchase by the seller from the buyer. The cases are 'Narayan Ramakrishna v. Vigneswar', A I R (3) 1916 Bom 215 & 'Shambhu Singh v. Jagadish Baksh', A I R (28) 1941 Oudh 582. I have carefully read the two decisions, & in my opinion they do not strictly conflict with my view. The documents in either of the cases are not without the condition of being repurchased. I would quote passages from the judgments of the aforesaid cases to show that one of the conditions, if not sale, was that on payment being made, the buyer shall transfer the property to the seller. In the 'Bombay case', at p. 215, Col. (ii), the passage that makes this position clear reads:

"After referring to the terms providing for the condition to repurchase the property after the lapse of twenty years, the Judge says:", and at page 217 Col. (i), the concluding portion of the judgment runs

"I am of opinion that in this particular case upon these particular documents it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the transaction must be accepted as being in reality that which in the plainest language both parties declared it to be, viz., a transaction of sale with 'an option to the plaintiffs to repurchase'."

These two passages make it clear to my mind that the third of the conditions enumerated in S. 58 (c), T. P. Act, was the condition subject to which the ostensible sale had been made. Batchelor, J., however, quotes a passage from the judgment of the lower Court which indicates that the condition that in the eventuality of payment the sale shall become void was also inserted in the sale deed. The passage is:

".....the Judge says:

'But for the addition of these terms the deed (Ex. 25) would have been a sale. But with the addition of the terms the deed becomes a mortgage by conditional sale, because there is a condition in Ex. 25 that the sale should become void on payment of Rs. 13,000 by instalments or in a lump sum within twenty years'."

The document was, therefore, of a heterogeneous character. The conditions of different kinds were mixed up together. If I were asked to follow this decision, I would, with respect, differ from it. This very reasoning will apply 'mutatis mutandis' to the Oudh case. I would place certain passages quoted from the judgment of the Court side by side to illustrate my point. At p. 583, Col. (ii):

"Towards the end of the deed, it was added that it had 'also' been agreed upon between the executant & the vendees that after the expiry of nine years, that is from the beginning of the tenth year up to its end, if he paid the entire consideration money to the vendees the sale would become null & void: otherwise it would take absolute effect as a sale deed."

This may be contrasted with the following passages from p. 584 Col. (ii) & p. 585 Col. (i):

"There is, however, one distinguishing feature of some importance between the Allahabad case & the case we have under consideration. We have referred to the period during which the property might be repurchased as one of the tests laid down in that case. In that case however the period for re-purchase was one year only & with regard to this it was said:

'If the period of time given to the vendor during which he can repurchase is a short one, it does suggest that it is an out & out sale with a right to repurchase, but on the other hand where a long period of time is given to the vendor to repurchase it does suggest that there is no out & out sale at all, but merely a transfer of the property as a security'. In the case under consideration 'the transferor is allowed to repurchase' at any time during the tenth year, while in 'Bishanlal v. Banwarilal', A I R (26) 1939 All 713, the executant could repurchase within a year after the execution of the deed."

The document that was propounded in this case too was of a heterogeneous character in relation to the sale conditions. The above decisions do not, therefore, conflict with the view that I am inclined to take. But however, at present advised, I will leave it as an opinion of mine. This aspect of the question particularly does not pointedly arise for decision within the scope of this reference. I would accordingly confine my answer to the first question proposed to a transaction in which the sale has been subjected to the condition of repurchase within the meaning of the third of the three conditions enumerated in S. 58 (c). It is not necessary that the deed itself will contain the words "mortgagor, mortgagee & mortgage money or security for the loan". If such words were expressly entered in the deed, the transaction would hardly be an ostensible sale (See 'Jagannath v. Gauri Shankar', A I R (13) 1926 All 670). The case, however, is different where the sale is subjected to a condition of resale on account of the fact, as I have said, that it bears resemblance to a case in which the sale & the condition of resale are otherwise independent of each other. It has been authoritatively laid down by the Privy Council & has never been departed from in any of the decisions bearing on the subject, either in India or in England, that in order to constitute a mortgage, the covenant for sale & repurchase must have been thought of contemporaneously as a single arrangement. Whatever might happen to the applicability or otherwise of various other tests none of which can be said to be conclusive, it is that particular test which is not only fundamental but also implicit & essential in a mortgage as distinguished from a sale. This is sufficiently borne out from the Privy Council decision '38 All 570' already referred to, as has all along been followed in the Courts in India. Whenever a transaction has been accomplished to two deeds, it cannot constitute a mortgage, if the second deed incorporating the condition of repurchase is not interdependent with the first & the terms do not form integral parts of one single contract or arrangement. In order to achieve this clarity & to simplify litigation, the Legislature came forward with an amendment to the S. 58 (c) by insertion of a proviso. After the amendment, wherever & whenever it occurs that the sale is effected or purports to be effected by one document, & the covenant of repurchase or resale, as the case may be, is embodied in another, the relation between the parties can no longer be said to be that of mortgagor or mortgagee. Notwithstanding the amendment, however, the question still remains that though the sale & the condition are both embodied in one document it may be intended to be a sale out & out with an agreement for resale on conditions incorporated therein. But for the very fact that the parties have decided to evidence the transaction by one document rather than by two, they shall be presumed to have done so by way of compliance with the proviso, & thereby may have apparently intended to create a mortgage. The onus, in such cases, should always be on one who wants to prove that it is a sale out & out. In order to be a mortgage, the transaction should have the statutory appearance of being expressed in one document. The general principle of law that one who asserts that the apparent is not the real has to prove it would not apply. No doubt, cases may arise in which the language used in a single document may lend support to the appearance of an out & out sale followed by an agreement for reconveyance; but the statute-enjoined-appearance & the necessary prima facie legal implications attached thereto ought to have more weight than the appearance created otherwise in the deed, particularly so, because this statutory appearance always ensures that the sale & covenant for resale were simultaneously & interdependently agreed upon — a circumstance which is inherent in & inseparable for, the transaction of mortgage. This is basically the reason, why incorporation of all the terms & conditions in one single document gives rise to a presumption.

(14) My answers to the first question are:

(i) Where the mortgagor ostensibly sells the mortgage property on condition that on such payment being made the buyer shall transfer the property to the seller & the condition is embodied in the document which effects or purports to effect the sale in accordance with the proviso added to the section by the T. P. Amendment Act, 1929, it is to be presumed a mortgage, & the party, who asserts to the contrary, must have to prove it. This proof will consist of the provisions of the document, the necessary legal implications thereof, & such surrounding circumstances as are admissible to prove how the language of the deed is related to the existence of real facts. This rule of admissibility of evidence is subject to the exception that, only in case of fraud, the oral evidence of real intention may be admissible — vide '44 I A 236; &

(ii) The conditional sales, effected by one or more documents prior to the 1929 amendment of the T. P. Act in which the condition embodied is condition of transfer by the buyer to the seller may be classified as belonging to another group. In this class of cases, there is no presumption either way. Their nature & character are to be determined irrespective of the form according as the parties intended. This intention has to be ascertained by construing the provisions of the deed, interpreting the language thereof in the light of the surrounding circumstances bearing upon it & their necessary implications with reference to either forthright conveyance of absolute rights to the buyer or their postponement by withholding from him, till expiry of the time for fulfilment of the condition, various rights, privileges & interests inherent in the absoluteness of proprietary rights or by imposing timely restrictions upon such privileges & the like.

(15) The answers to the other questions posed proceed as corollaries from the premises aforesaid. The answer to the second question would be in the affirmative. Postponement of the rights to mutate his name in substitution for that of the seller is denial, for the time being, of a proprietary privilege. This denial carries with it the continuance, in the vendor, of the obligations of payment of rent and public charges of the property. Loss, if any, on account of non-payment is assumed to fall on the vendor. There is implied predication of his subsisting ownership. Failure or omission to mutate attributable to an economical device is one thing, but absence of the right to mutate is another. Different considerations, however, will arise in cases of transfer of occupancy holdings before they were made freely transferable by the Orissa Tenancy Amendment Act, 1938, inasmuch as either the transferee had no right to claim mutation or the same was expensive & uneconomical in view of the fact that on payment of the consideration money the transferee will have to abandon the land & the transferor may unnecessarily have to pay more than the mortgage money by way of compensating the former. In those cases, postponement of mutation is rather inconclusive & the nature of the transaction will have to be decided on construction of the deed in the light of the surrounding circumstances. I answer the question accordingly. The third question — In the case of a mortgage with possession, the mortgagor is bound to guarantee quiet possession during the subsistence of mortgage as it is in lieu of interest, while in the case of sale, the purchaser is to suffer the loss without any guarantee of indemnification provided he has been delivered possession along with completion of sale & the disturbance of possession is not attributable to the defect of title in the vendor. The vendor contracting for warranty of title undertakes to refund the consideration money with interest if his title is found defective & there is consequent loss of possession. In the case of mortgage, mere disturbance of possession will entail the loss upon the mortgagor (vendor) & the mortgagee is not bound to seek for possession though in certain circumstances he may have the right. My answer, therefore, is that covenant for refund, on dispossession or disturbance of possession of the grantee not attributable to grantor's defective title is inconclusive. My answer to the fourth question is wholly covered by the answer proposed to the first question, that is in case of ambiguity or doubt, ex facie import of the tenor of the document effecing the transaction shall prevail. The ambiguity or the doubt must, in each case, be inherent in the provisions of the deed & not dissoluble by reference to the surrounding circumstances.

(16) Before proceeding to examine the merits of the Second Appeal, placed before us for decision, the trend of the authorities of this Court, which stand unaffected by the decision of the Full Bench, has to be kept in view.

(17) In Second Appeal No. 192 of 1946, my learned brother Narasimham, J., addressing himself to the question whether a transaction was a mortgage by conditional sale or a sale out & out, observes:

"The very definition of a mortgage by conditional sale as given in Cl. (c) of S. 58, T. P. Act shows that the transaction is ostensibly a sale. Therefore, the use in the deed of such expressions as "Kabala", "buyer & seller" & similar expressions usually found in a deed of absolute sale, cannot in itself be a valuable guide. Even a mortgage by conditional sale may have all the appearance of a sale & the Court should not be guided by mere appearance but should scrutinise the terms of the document and ascertain the true intention of the parties."

Two circumstances, appearing in the document, under consideration, in that case, namely, that (i) the document confers on the executant (the vendor) right to deposit, under S. 83, T. P. Act, money in Court if there is a refusal by the deft. (vendee) to accept the sum when tendered; & (ii) the money to be paid was described as 'asule asal" which means "principal" indicating that the parties thought of the sum as a 'loan' & not as a 'price', were held decisive of the transaction being a mortgage. I am a party to this decision by which I am bound & I still adhere to the view expressed therein.

(18) Another decision was that of Second Appeal No. 32 of 1948. Three circumstances appearing in that case were considered decisive of the transaction being one of mortgage. The circumstances were: that (i) there was no mention of reconveyance but of delivering back the lands to the pltfs. (vendors) on payment of the consideration within the stipulated period; (ii) the right of the defts. (vendees) to get their names mutated in the landlord's sherasta & "to possess the lands as they like" were expressly mentioned in the document to arise only on the pltfs' failure to repay the consideration within the stipulated period. Postponement of the right to mutation, according to Narasimham, J., who delivered the leading judgment, was an unmistakable indication that the pltfs' (vendors') liability to pay rent would continue until the end of the stipulated period. This was described by the learned Judge as inconsistent with an out and out sale which should always (sic.) in extinguishment of the pltfs' interests in the property, & (iii) the consideration for the transaction was a sum of Rs. 240 as against its minimum price of Rs. 500 in the year of the transaction. I was a party to this decision too & find no reason to change the view I then took.

(19) The only other decision was one in Second Appeal No. 41 of 1946. The document, in question, in that case, was described as Sarti-Kabala. Panigrahi, J. observed that the term literally translated means "conditional agreement". The learned Judge, relying upon the case of 'Singaram Chettiyar v. Kalyanasundaram Pillai', 26 I C 1 (Mad), laid down a general rule of construction that in case of ambiguity or doubt, the construction would lean in favour of a mortgage & not of a sale. This is directly against ex facie import theory of presuming the apparent until it is proved to be unreal. This has formed the question No. 4 above & will be no longer a good law. The main theme of the decision was that the document was described as a Sarti-Kabala which it was conceded at the Bar meant nothing more nor less than what was popularly known as Kantakabala & on reference to this, the learned Judge observed:

"It may be that in a particular case, a document purporting to be a Kantakabala may really be an absolute sale with a condition of repurchase, but without anything more the description by itself would indicate that the transaction between the parties was intended to be a loan rather than an absolute sale."

Contrary view, expressed in relation to the aforesaid features in the deed in S. A. 88/44 was distinctively dissented from by Panigrahi, J., but myself, as a concurring party to the decision, did so qualifiedly dissented from by Panigrahi, J., but myself, as a concurring party to the decision, did so qualifiedly observing that Second Appeal No. 86 of 1944 had been correctly decided & that it was always some dominating features that determine the real character of the transaction. The two theories thus expressed rather broadly were, however, not decisive as there were two circumstances affording dominating features lending support to the conclusion arrived at, viz., (i) (to put in the language employed by Panigrahi, J.) that the registration of the deft. as an absolute proprietor was to follow the expiry of the period fixed for payment, & that the clause relating to the warranty of title would come into operation only after such registration as proprietor; & (ii) that the document, in question, was by way of renewal of a previous transaction evidenced by the document of 1935 couched in identical terms & the possession had also been with him under the said document & that notwithstanding this the vendees agreed to the recital in the said document to the effect that the title was with the vendor.

(20) Now I shall proceed to deal with the merits of the Second Appeal placed before us for decision in the light of the conclusions reached above.

(21) The appeal arises in a suit for redemption of mortgage by conditional sale executed in favour of the defts. for a consideration of Rs. 186 said to have been borrowed by the late father of pltfs. 1 & 2 & the late father of pltfs. 3 & 4 from the late husband of deft. 1, on 25-6-1917. The pltfs' claim is contested by the defts. They contend that the transaction, in question, was not a mortgage, but a sale out & out, with a condition of repurchase, a contract of which time was of the essence. On this basis, it is claimed that the condition not having been fulfilled within the appointed time, the right of repurchase has been defeated. The defts. further contend that in case the transaction is held to be a mortgage, the pltfs. will be liable to pay, besides the principal advanced, a sum of Rs. 57/14 as mutation fee, & Rs. 120 being the rent paid by them (the defts.) during their occupation, as condition precedent to redemption.

(22) The learned Munsif dismissed the suit holding that the document was an out & out sale with a condition of repurchase. The learned lower appellate Court reversed the decree of the learned Munsif holding that the document was, in substance & reality, a mortgage. As this is of a date prior to T. P. Amendment Act, 1929, there will be no presumption in favour of its character as a mortgage. As observed before, the question shall not be approached with any leaning to either view.

(23) In the judgment of the learned lower appellate Court, this is a translation of the text of the document. Its correctness has not been challenged at the Bar. The document can be divided into three parts: (i) the first part comprises the terms of ostensible sale; (ii) the second part contains provision relating to condition within the meaning of S. 58 (c), T. P. Act, & (iii) the last part contains the terms & conditions to follow in the eventuality of default of the stipulated condition.

(24) The condition embodied here is not a condition of "transfer by the buyer to the seller" in default of payment, or, in other words, "condition of repurchase". The condition is expressed in the following terms:

".....But upon condition, namely, that in case we repay the consideration money given by you in one instalment, at the end of Magh 1327 next, you will return to us the aforesaid land together with the kabala therefor....."

This tantamounts to, in the language of the section, a condition that on such payment being made, the sale shall become void (vide 'Madhab Charan Das v. Rajani Mohan', 64 I C 583 (Cal). The agreement that the lands & the Kabala therefor will be returned is not consistent with the hypothesis that the title to the lands had absolutely become vested in the buyer; &, in such a case, that the seller will get his property back, it will have to be effected only by an act of transfer required under the law by the buyer to the seller. Mere return without any other formality will not effectuate it. This document does not bear any resemblance to the document incorporating the terms of a sale & a covenant for reconveyance. Therefore, the well known difficulty of construction does not present itself for solution. Even if the question of construction would arise, it is clear from what follows that the transaction accords only with a mortgage & not at all with a sale. The other condition enumerated in S. 58 (c) of the Act, namely, that in default of payment, the sale shall become absolute, has also been embodied in the document. The condition is expressed in the following words:

".....Should we fail to repay the consideration money in one instalment within the time fixed as above, you shall possess & enjoy as before or your sons & heirs shall possess & enjoy from generation to generation till the sun & the moon endure & after making payment of the jama(rent) in the sherista of zamindars of the mouza from year to year & getting your name duly mutated in their sherista on cancellation of Krushna Padhan's name in respect of the property sold, you yourself 'can use the land in any way you like'....."

These provisions expressing the full & absolute character of the proprietary right & enjoyment to accrue to the vendee after & only after default of repayment should bear contrast with their earlier counterpart. The earlier provisions, appropriate to the status anterior to the stipulated time, are expressed as:

".....After having counted & received the full consideration money in cash, we divest ourselves, our heirs & successors of all our rights & interests in the property sold & make you owner & possessor of our rights & interests, but upon the condition....."

It will be noticed that the terms aforesaid are conspicuous by the absence of the following, viz.,

"(i) the right to possess & enjoy till the sun & the moon last; (ii) the devolution of such rights on the sons & heirs of the vendee from generation to generation; (iii) the right to mutate in the landlords' sherista on cancellation of the name of Krushna Padhan (admittedly the predecessor-in-interest of the sellers); (iv) the right to pay rents to the landlords from year to year; & particularly (v) the right to use the land in any such manner as he or his successor likes to do."

These are invitably the attributes of an absolute proprietary right. They have been withheld from the vendee till after the condition fails. The most significant of all the aforesaid conditions is the one that centres round withholding from the vendee the right of using the land in any such manner as he desires to do. These, according to the Privy Council, are restrictions upon the usufructuary & proprietary privileges, &, as such, are decisive of his being a mortgagee. With regard to the postponement of the right of mutation, I will refer to the decision of the Calcutta High Court in the case of 'Ali Sheik v. Imam Ali', 35 I C 102 (Cal). There the vendor's agreement to have the vendee's name mutated on the execution of the deed of Kut-Kabala, & his liability to pay arrears of rent arising immediately thereafter were held conclusive of the transaction being one of sale. In the case of 'Maung Shwe Min v. Mang San Syun', 22 I C 806 (L B), it was found that the buyer did not apply for mutation of names in the Revenue Register till two years after the transaction. It was considered as a compelling circumstance to hold that the intention of the parties was to create a mortgage. The weight of authorities is also in favour of this construction.

(25) It has been strenuously contended by Mr. H. Mohapatra, the learned counsel for the pltfs., that the words

"we divest ourselves, our heirs & successors of all rights & interests in the property sold & make you owner & possessor of our rights & interests. You do become the owners of the rights & interests" in the first part of the document are themselves sufficient to effect an absolute sale, & the further provisions, in the latter part of the document, are either mere repetitions or surplusages. This argument overlooks that, according to the definition, the document must be one of ostensible sale, that is, the appearance of a sale shall be maintained. But the contrast between the description of his status before time for fulfilment of the conditions arrives, & after the time expires is distinction to prove that the sale becomes absolute only after the stipulated time. In the case of 'Balkishen Das v. Legge', their Lordships have very expressly pointed out that the appearance of a sale having been laboriously maintained throughout in the document, it does not affect its character as a mortgage in case such an intention is clear from its provisions considered as a whole.

(26) Mr. Mohapatra further argues that in view of its being stated in the document, in its latter part, that ".....from today we or our heirs shall have no right or interest whatever in the aforesaid land sold....." it is not permissible to hold that it was not intended to convey absolute proprietorship immediately on execution of the document. The words "from today" must, in the context, mean "with effect from today", that is to say, in case the condition of repayment is not fulfilled, the absolute proprietary right of the buyer shall be deemed to have accrued not from the date of default but from the date of execution of the document.

(27) For the reason aforesaid, I am definitely of opinion that this is a case of mortgage. No doubt, there has been long delay in the pltfs' coming into Court for enforcement of the equity of redemption. This, it has been argued, is a circumstance indicative of subsequent conduct of the vendors consistent with the transaction being one of sale. This delay, however, has been sufficiently explained by the pltfs in their evidence that they could not afford to come to Court earlier for want of means & having learnt that a new law has been enacted which would absolve them from making any payment whatsoever for redeeming the mortgage, they were encouraged to sue for getting back the property. On the other hand, the conduct of the buyer in not getting his name mutated till long after the transaction indicates the contrary. Delay in launching the suit, will not make the transaction a sale which from its very inception was a mortgage, whatever other equitable considerations might arise therefrom. Once a mortgage is always a mortgage.

(28) I would, therefore, uphold the decree passed by the learned lower appellate Court. The pltfs., however, must, on account of the delay, lose their costs of the suit throughout, that is each party should bear his own costs throughout. The time, fixed for payment of the sum due, according to the decree of the learned lower appellate Court, will be extended to six months from the date of the decree of this Court.

(29) DAS, J.: This reference arose on account of the difference of opinions reflected in the judgment of the two cases of this Court in S. A. No. 10 of 1945 & S. A. No. 86 of 1944. The divergence of views was with reference to certain points usually arising in the determination of the question whether a document by way of conditional sale is a sale or a mortgage. The specific points which are the subject matter of the reference are the following: (1) Whether such a document is to be taken prima facie as a mortgage by conditional sale, the burden of proof lying on the opposite party to show that it represents an out and out sale or whether the ex facie import of such a document which is that of a sale is to be presumed to be true the burden being upon the person asserting it to be a mortgage to make it out to be so. (2) Whether the insertion of an express provision postponing mutation of the name of the vendee in the landlord's sherista till expiry of the stipulated period is an indication of its being a mortgage & not a sale. (3) Whether the insertion of a penalty clause in such a document for the return of the consideration money plus interest, in case the vendee is dispossessed from the lands either through defect of title of the vendor, or otherwise, is an indication of its being a mortgage & not a sale.

(30) I have had the advantage of reading the judgment of my Lord the Chief Justice in this case furnishing answers to the reference.

(31) As regards question No. 3 above, I agree with my Lord in thinking that a covenant for refund, on dispossession or disturbance of possession of the grantee not attributable to grantor's defective title is a fair indication of the transaction being a mortgage rather than a sale. I agree also that such a covenant in case of dispossession due only to grantor's defective title is inconclusive. But it may be some indication of its being intended to be a sale.

(32) As regards question No. 2 above, I agree that a condition postponing the right to mutation is an indication of the transaction being a mortgage & not a sale. This answer is confined to transactions relating to classes of property which were at the date of the transaction freely transferable, such as occupancy holdings of raiyats subsequent to Orissa Act VIII (8) of 1936. In other cases, the postponement of right of mutation is no indication either way, because in such cases there was normally no right to transfer without the landlord's consent & hence no right of mutation. Accordingly the consent of the landlord for mutation was sometimes to be obtained only at exorbitant price. That may itself therefore furnish, in respect of such transaction, a good reason for postponing mutation. Question No. 1 above formulated is the more general & important question that has been raised on this reference & that question, in substance, is whether there is any presumption arising from the ex facie import of a disputed transaction in favour of its being a sale or whether on the contrary there is a presumption in such cases of the transaction being a mortgage when there is a doubt.

(33) As regards the existence of a presumption in favour of a transaction of this kind being a mortgage, there is, no doubt, the authority of Doctor Ghose, the reputed Author of Tagore's Law Lectures on mortgages, in his work, Edn. 5, p. 92. He cites two cases in support of the proposition — an English case 'Longuet v. Scawen', (1749) 1 Ves Sen 402: 27 E R 1106 & an American case 'Trucks v. Lindsey', 18 Iowa p. 504. This is also in consonance with what has been stated in Coote on mortgages, Vol. I, p. 31 citing the same English case above quoted. This rule has been adopted by my learned brother Justice Panigrahi on the strength of a casual expression of opinion without discussion in '26 I C 1: A I R (2) 1915 Mad 656. But I have been able to find no other Indian authority for this of the High Courts or the Privy Council where this question has been raised & decided & none has been brought to my notice in the course of the argument. It would therefore appear that the only basis for this presumption is the case in '(1749) 27 E R p. 1106. But the facts in that case indicate that it was a case which arose in exercise of the equity jurisdiction of the English Courts. A passage at page 41 of Coote on Mortgages, Vol. I also shows that the actual decision in the case on the facts thereof is rather out of date. It is to be noticed also that it is an old decision of the year 1749-50. The importation of principles of equity with regard to such transactions has been disapproved by the Privy Council as early as in 'Pattabhiramier's case', 13 M I A 560, & it seems to me that it is not open to us now to import any presumption based on equitable considerations into such transactions excepting in so far as they have been definitely embodied into the statutory provisions of the T. P. Act.

(34) On the other hand, the case in 'Alderson v. White', (1850) 44 E R 924, decided in 1850 i.e. about a century later than that in 'Geerish v. Donaccon', (1740) 27 E R 706, clearly lays down the presumption arising from the ex facie import of a transaction as being applicable in such cases & this has been specifically followed by the Privy Council in '12 All 387' & '38 All 570'. It appears to me, therefore, that in all cases of doubt, it is this presumption of the correctness of the ex facie import of the document that must ultimately weigh in favour of a disputed transaction otherwise ambiguous being a sale rather than a mortgage. Some attempt has been made to distinguish the above Privy Council cases & other cases following them on the ground that in those cases the transaction in question was to be gathered from two separate documents & it was urged that the same presumption would not apply if the whole transaction was to be found in a single document. I have examined all the cases bearing on the point that have been cited at the Bar & it is not necessary to notice them at length. It is enough to say that a close examination of those cases does not appear to me to support any such distinction on principle. The only relevant matter that was adverted to in all such cases was whether or not it was a single transaction. If the sale & the condition do not form a single transaction, no question at all would arise because a subsequent & independent condition cannot have effect of converting a sale into a mortgage. It is only when the sale and the condition are found to form one transaction that any doubt arises & any question for construction presents itself. It appears to me to make no difference at all for the application of the principle laid down by the Privy Council in '12 All 387' & '38 All 570', that the transaction is embodied in one document rather than many. I therefore agree with the view expressed by my Lord that in cases of ambiguity or doubt there is no presumption in favour of such a document being a mortgage but that the presumption in favour of the ex facie import of the document by which the transaction is effectuated should arise. The ambiguity or the doubt however must in each case, as stated by my Lord, be inherent in the provisions of the deed & not resolvable by reference to the surrounding circumstances.

(35) This answer, however, may require to be modified to some extent in respect of transactions entered into subsequent to the amendment of S. 58, T. P. Act, in 1929. That amendment has provided that no such transaction shall be deemed to be a mortgage unless the condition is embodied in the document which affects or purports to affect the sale. From that date therefore whenever the sale & the condition are in two separate documents, such a transaction must necessarily be taken to be an out & out sale with the condition attached, & cannot be treated as mortgage. This is irrespective of the question whether the sale & the condition constitute inter-dependent or independent transactions. Of course, this amendment does not imply the contrary, that is to say, it has not the effect of legislating that wherever the sale & the condition are embodied in one document, it must necessarily be taken to be a mortgage. That is still a matter to be decided—on the determination of the intention of the parties in the light of the contents of the document & the surrounding circumstances. But while this may be so, so far as the legal aspect is concerned, it is reasonable to suppose that after 1929 when parties to a conditional sale intend it to be in fact a sale & not a mortgage, they are much more likely than before to embody the transaction in two separate documents, one for the sale & the other for the condition. The vendee in such circumstances may be expected not to take the risk of the transaction being construed to be a mortgage by agreeing to the condition being incorporated into the same document as the sale. I therefore, entirely agree with my Lord the Chief Justice in his view that in respect of documents executed after the amendment in 1929 containing both a sale & a condition, there is a greater likelihood of the transaction embodied in the single document being a mortgage. Therefore to that extent the presumption in favour of the ex facie import would be weakened & a presumption would arise in favour of its being a mortgage.

(36) The question has been debated before us that in case of conditional sale deeds which contain the first or second conditions in Cl. (c) of S. 58, T. P. Act, i.e., a condition, that on default of payment within stipulated time the sale shall become absolute, or that on such payment the sale shall become void, (sic.) such distinction between the condition for resale & other two conditions, as has been assumed by my Lord the Chief Justice in his answers to the reference in this respect. But that distinction may, for the present, be kept aside in considering the question whether S. 58, sub-s. (c) is in the nature of a definition, in the sense in which it is sought to be used. Having gone through a large catena of cases cited at the Bar, bearing on the matter, I find that only two learned Judges of other High Courts specifically put forward this view & held that a sale subject to a condition falling under one or other of the three categories specified in S. 58, sub-s. (c) is ipso facto a mortgage without any further investigation of the intention of the parties. They are Justice Sulaiman of the Allahabad High Court & Justice Sadasiva Aiyar of the Madras High Court. Justice Sulaiman gave expression to this view in 'Raja Mohindramansingh v. Maharaj Singh', A I R (10) 1923 All 48; 'Mathura Kurmi v. Jagdeo Singh', A I R (14) 1927 All 321; 'Man Singh v. Guman Singh', A I R (16) 1929 All 619 & 'Ramdhani Ram v. Ram Rikh Singh', A I R (18) 1931 All 548, but the other Judges who were also parties to the above decisions do not appear to have gone the length to which His Lordship was prepared to go. This view of Justice Sulaiman, however, appears to have been throughout contested in that very Court from 1923 itself.. In 'Bishambar Nath v. Md. Ubaidullah Khan', A I R (10) 1923 All 586, a Bench consisting of Ryves & Daniels JJ. specifically criticised the view adumbrated in 'A I R (10) 1923 All 48', in the following terms at page 587.

"Dr. Sen in one portion of his very able argument on behalf of the appellant took the position that any deed which professes to be a sale-deed with a condition allowing the vendor to repurchase, came within the definition of a mortgage by conditional sale contained in S. 58 (c), T. P. Act & must be presumed to be such unless the surrounding circumstances were such as absolutely to exclude the possibility of a mortgage having been intended. This idea is supposed to derive some support from the decision in 'A I R (10) 1923 All 48'. A reference to S. 58 (c) is sufficient to show that this is a misreading of the law.....The repetition of the terms "payment of the mortgage money", or "such payment" in each clause of the definition makes it clear that before a document can be a mortgage by conditional sale it must first be a mortgage, i.e., the property must be transferred as security for a debt. The definition of a mortgage is given in Cl. (a) of the section & the subsequent clauses are merely particular cases of this definition. The neglect to this obvious fact has in some cases led to serious confusion. The view suggested by Dr. Sen was rejected by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court in 'Muthuvelu Mudaliar v. Vythilinga Mudaliar', 42 Mad 407."

(37) Later decisions of the Allahabad High Court, also do not appear to have followed the view of Justice Sulaiman. In 'A I R (24) 1937 All 724', Harries J. referred to the case in 'A I R (14) 1927 All 321', & pointed out that in that case one of the two Judges of the Bench, Justice Lindsay, did not appear to agree with the view taken by Justice Sulaiman & held that the case in 'A I R (14) 1927 All 321', did not compel him to decide that the particular transaction in question before him was a mortgage by conditional sale merely because there was in the same document a sale with a covenant for resale on payment. His Lordship preferred to follow the view of the Bench in 'A I R (10) 1923 All 586', which held that in all such cases the matter has to be determined by ascertaining the intention of the parties as one of construction of a document with the surrounding circumstances. In 'A I R (26) 1939 All 713', it was ruled that whether a deed is a mortgage by conditional sale within the meaning of S. 58 (c), T. P. Act, or an out & out sale is a question which falls to be determined on a consideration of the terms of the deed itself & of the surrounding circumstances. It was pointed out that the amendment of S. 58 (c) in 1929 did not provide that if a transaction is embodied in one document, it must, of necessity, be regarded as a mortgage by conditional sale & not as an out & out sale, & that therefore the Court is thrown back on the principle that the intention of the parties to a document must be decided having regard to the terms of the document & from the surrounding circumstances. Again in 'Thakrasingh v. Sheonath Singh', A I R (27) 1940 All 227, the case in 'A I R (10) 1923 All 586', which expresses a view contrary to that taken by Justice Sulaiman was cited in extenso & approved. As recently as in 'Bidha Ram v. Chhidda', A I R (37) 1950 All 430 the proposition was accepted that the mere language of such a document does not settle the matter & it was in every case a question of intention to be gathered from the document & the surrounding circumstances. So far as the Madras High Court is concerned, Justice Sadasiva Aiyar specifically put forward the same view as that later on propounded by Justice Sulaiman, in a case reported in 'A I R (1) 1914 Mad 37', & again in the referring judgment which gave rise to the Full Bench decision reported in 'A I R (6) 1919 Mad 1'. The learned Judges in the Full Bench case expressly overruled the view taken by Justice Sadasiva Aiyar in 'A I R (1) 1914 Mad 37', & stated it to be bad law. The opposite point of view was clearly & succinctly explained by Justice Napier in his judgment in 'Maruthai Goundan v. Dasappa Goundan', A I R (4) 1917 Mad 368 & in his referring judgment in 'A I R (6) 1919 Mad 1'. The same view has been taken in Bombay in 'Kasturchand Lakhamji v. Jakhia', A I R (2) 1915 Bom 229 and in 'A I R (3) 1916 Bom 215'. In the latter case Justice Batchelor explains the position very succinctly in the following passage.

"It seems to me clear that the question, whether Ex. 25 effects a mortgage or a sale is not to be answered by mere reference to the Cl. (c), S. 58, T. P. Act. And if I am not mistaken, to decide the point upon this view is to assume what is really in dispute. S. 58 T. P. Act, defines what a mortgage is & Cl. (c) of the section describes one method of effecting a mortgage, viz., the method of mortgage by conditional sale, but the words of Cl. (c) are to be read not in an isolated manner, but in reference to para 1 of the section, & when they are so read, it will be manifest that Cl. (c) comes into play only when there is a mortgage, as that term has been defined."

The same is the view adopted in 'Kuppa Krishna v. Mhasti Goli Naik', A I R (18) 1931 Bom 371. The argument that a sale with a covenant to repurchase embodied in one document would be a mortgage by conditional sale within the meaning of S. 58 (c) especially where it is one document after the 1929 amendment has been specifically noticed & negatived. There are similar decisions in the Calcutta High Court. In 'Azizar Rahman v. Rabatannessa', 21 I C 19 (Cal), a document of sale with a condition of repurchase though embodied in the same document was held not necessarily to be a mortgage by conditional sale, but that the question would depend on the construction of the terms of the document taken with the surrounding circumstances & in the particular case on such construction it was held to be not a mortgage but a sale out-right. In a very recent case of 'Mahabir Singh v. Bigan Sabun', A I R (36) 1949 Pat 508, Justice Manoharlal held the particular document before him as being a mortgage on a construction of the terms of the document & the circumstances. His Lordship did not view it as a matter to be settled by treating S. 58, Sub-s. (c), as a mere definition. Justice Mahabir Prasad however was inclined to think that the transaction fell within the definition itself. That the matter is one of intention, not of definition was also held in the only Privy Council case dealing with this question with reference to a document of a date subsequent to the T. P. Act in 'A I R (11) 1924 P C 226'. The Privy Council in that case proceeded to determine the question not on the view that the sale subject to a condition was ipso facto a mortgage by conditional sale but proceeded to determine the question on a consideration of the surrounding circumstances. That, no doubt, was a case where the sale & the condition were in two separate documents. But this cannot make any difference on principle since it was definitely found that they constituted one transaction. In fact in that case, though the details of the condition are in a separate document, the sale-deed itself expressly states that the sale was subject to reservation of conditions embodied in another document. The Privy Council refers to this reservation as only one of the relevant circumstances to reinforce the view they were inclined to take on a consideration of the rest of the document & other circumstances. At any rate, the settled view of all the High Courts excepting for some isolated views to the contrary in a few cases, is to the effect that questions relating to transactions covered by S. 58, Sub-s. (c) T. P. Act are to be treated not merely as a matter falling under a definition but as a matter of intention to be gathered from the language & the surrounding circumstances. In 'A I R (6) 1919 Mad 1', Chief Justice Wallis delivering the judgment in a Full Bench went so far as to say:

"It is in my opinion, 'not open to us' to answer the question referred to us in the affirmative consistently with the decisions in the Privy Council"

& refers to a number of Privy Council decisions & concludes that all these decisions lay down that transactions of this kind are to take effect according to their tenor, unless it appears from the terms of the instrument or the surrounding circumstances, excluding oral evidence of intention ad (sic) inadmissible, that the intention was to effect a mortgage.

The very question which was answered in the negative in that Full Bench reference was, whether where in one & the same transaction land is sold absolutely but with a right of repurchase to be exercised before a certain date, the transaction necessarily becomes by virtue of S. 58 T. P. Act, a mortgage by conditional sale, whatever the intention of the parties might have been.

(38) It appears to be, therefore, that the weight of authority is absolutely clear against treating S. 58, Sub-s. (c) as a mere definition clause & as excluding investigation of intention to be gathered from the terms of the document & the surrounding circumstances. Indeed I would venture to say that even treating it as a definition, the result is the same. If Cl. (c) of S. 58 is a definition of a mortgage by conditional sale, it is essential for that definition that the sale indicated by the transaction should be made out to be an 'ostensible' sale, that is, that it is a cloak for what in fact is a mortgage. To say that a document which ex facie is a sale is an 'ostensible' sale in the sense that the form is a cloak & not a reality is with great respect begging the question & in the words of Justice Batchelor in 'A I R (3) 1916 Bom 215 is "to assume what has to be proved". It appears to me, therefore, quite clear that the language of S. 58, Cl. (c) cannot be treated as mere definition dispensing with an independent consideration of the intention of the parties to be gathered on a comprehensive view of the terms of the transaction & of the surrounding circumstances.

(39) It is true that most of the cases that have been noticed above & particularly the Privy Council case in 'A I R (11) 1924 P C 226, are cases where the condition was a condition of repurchase & not any of the other two conditions specified in S. 58, Sub-s. (c). But the discussion in all the cases where the matter has been specifically adverted to is perfectly general & is applicable to the entire Sub-s. (c) of S. 58 & is not restricted to any particular portion thereof & as already stated in some of the cases conditions (1) & (2) in S. 58 (c) are referred to as condition of resale. Nor can I see any reason for the distinction sought to be made between the effect of one kind of condition & another with regard to its constituting a mortgage by conditional sale when incorporated with a transaction of sale. In the course of the arguments at the hearing of this reference, it was suggested that there is a difference on principle. It was said that in a transaction which was by way of a sale subject to a condition of repurchase, there was a completed sale by itself with a personal covenant for resale attaching thereto & that it may, therefore, in fact, be either a mortgage or an out & out sale, but that where the transaction is a sale with a condition that on repayment of the price within a stipulated period the sale must become void or where the transaction is a sale with a stipulation that in default of repayment within a stipulated period the sale must become absolute, there is by the very terms of the transaction a deduction from the quality of the sale itself & that therefore it ceases to be a sale having regard to the definition of a transaction of sale in S. 54, T. P. Act. With great respect, I am unable to appreciate the suggested distinction. "Sale" is defined as "a transfer of ownership in exchange for a price". A sale which becomes defeasible on the happening of a condition or a sale which becomes absolute on the happening of a condition is as much a sale as a sale subject to a covenant for repurchase. In each one of these cases it is the full ownership as distinguished from the mere interest therein (as for instance, in the case of a mortgage or lease) that is transferred. What is required to constitute a sale is not the absolute or unconditional transfer of ownership but only the transfer of 'full' ownership. I am aware of no principle which enables one to think that the fact of a sale being subject to any of the three conditions specified in S. 58, Sub-s. (c) detracts from the concept of full "ownership" whose transfer is required to constitute a sale under S. 54, T. P. Act.

(40) Apart however from any consideration of the question based on the notions of a sale or a mortgage there is abundant authority for saying that even in a case where the condition in a transaction was not a condition for repurchase the question has to be determined on a consideration of the intention to be gathered from the document & the surrounding circumstances.

(41) In '12 All 387', the condition was that on payment within a stipulated period the vendees will 'cancel' the sale. There was no specific stipulation to 'retransfer'. The principle of ex facie import was applied & the transaction was held to be a sale & not a mortgage. The condition was no doubt in a separate document executed on the same day, but it was held to constitute along with the sale a single transaction. In 'Situl Purshad v. Luchmi Purshad', 10 Cal 30, there were two documents executed at the same time, one a mokurari patta in acquittance of a pre-existing debt & at the same time an ekrarnama with the stipulation that if the grantor or his heirs (sic.) the amount of the original debt without interest the patta should be 'returned', the grantor having no claim to mesne profits during the possession of the mokuraridar (See page 35 of the report). There was no stipulation for a re-conveyance or a regrant of the mokorari patta. It was held by the Privy Council that having regard to the terms of the instruments & the circumstances relating thereto, the transaction was not a contract of mortgage but was evidence of a sale in acquittance of a debt. In 'Kinuram Mandal v. Nityechunder', 6 C L J 208, the stipulation was "on your giving me back the sum of Rs. 375/- within seven years, I shall return the holding". There was no stipulation for reconveyance. It was held on construction that it was an out & out sale. In 'A I R (4) 1917 Cal 565', a kot-kabala was construed on its terms & other circumstances to be a sale. Similarly in '21 I C p. 19 (Cal)', there was a stipulation in the same document that if the transferor can pay the consideration money within one year the transferee shall be bound to release the property. It was held on a construction that it was a sale. In 'Altapali Khan v. Uzirali Khan', A I R (20) 1933 Cal 381, (there was?) an ex facie sale with the stipulation in the same document that "if the said principal amount & equal amount of profit be paid to you within the period of 8 years then you shall return back the said lands with the kabala. Under these terms, I execute this absolute sale-deed." It was held on a construction of the terms that it was an out & out sale & not a mortgage. An argument was raised in the case to the effect that since there was no express stipulation for conveyance, the actual condition to which the transaction was subject imported a mortgage. But this was negatived relying on 'Ayyavayyar v. Rahimansa', 14 Mad 170.

(42) In '14 Mad 170', an ex facie sale with a stipulation that if the amount be repaid in cash on 27-5-1875, the vendee shall put the vendor in possession & return the sale deed & that in default the sale deed shall become permanent, was held as a matter of construction to be a sale & not a mortgage. It was expressly ruled therein that the absence of a clause for reconveyance was not material. In 'A I R (28) 1941 Oudh 582', there was an ex facie sale with a stipulation in the same document that after expiry of 9 years & during the 10th year if the vendor paid the entire consideration, the sale deed would become null & void & that otherwise it would take absolute effect as a sale deed. It was held as a matter of construction of the document & on consideration of the circumstances that it was a sale. The proposition that such a transaction was a mortgage by virtue of the definition on the basis of an annotation to that effect in Mukherji's T. P. Act citing 'A I R (24) 1937 All 724', as authority therefor (sic.), was expressly an ex facie sale with the following recital:

"The sale has become absolute & final. The contracting parties have no right to cancel the sale & to demand restitution of the consideration money. The vendor has no right to any share in the property."

But it contained a further stipulation whereby the vendee gave a right to the vendor to take back the property if within the period of 10 years they should pay the amount. The above stipulations taken together meant that the vendee had no right to cancel the sale & call for the payment of money at any time, but that the vendor had the right to pay within 10 years & cancel the sale. There was no express stipulation for reconveyance. The transaction on a consideration of all the circumstances was said to be an out-right sale. In 'Ahmed Hussain v. Azhar Ali', A I R (31) 1944 Oudh 305, there was an ex facie sale with a clause in the same document which gave a right to the executant to take back the sold property from the vendee within five years after paying in the month of October in a lump sum the entire consideration money plus some other incidental items with a further stipulation that if the said money was not so paid within the time fixed & if the executant did not take back the property the deed shall be deemed to be absolute & the right of the executant shall be extinguished. The Court went into the evidence of intention & held that the document was a sale & not a mortgage. In most of the above cases the sale & the condition were embodied in a single document & in some of these cases the conditions which merely stipulated for cancellation of the sale on payment of money or for return of the deed on payment of money have been merely referred to "as a condition of repurchase" treating them to be such though not in terms so. There are a number of other cases of the various High Courts where the transaction or the document contained stipulations of the nature specified in S. 58, Sub-s. (c), conditions (1) & (2) but the question at issue was determined as one of the construction & intention & not of definition & the particular transaction in question was held to be a mortgage. To notice all the cases in detail will unnecessarily lengthen this judgment. It is sufficient to say that my attention has been drawn to no decided case wherein a transaction by way of an ex facie sale which contains also a stipulation, rendering the sale absolute in default of payment or avoiding the sale on payment, has been ipso facto held to be a mortgage without any consideration of the intention to be gathered from the other terms of the document & of the surrounding circumstances.

(43) My answer on this part of the case would be that in the cases of all transactions subsequent to the amendment of 1929 by way of a conditional sale incorporated in a single document, there may arise a presumption in favour of its being a mortgage, but that in the case of transactions prior to 1929 whether by means of one document or more than one document, constituting a single transaction, there is no such presumption but that on the other hand there is a presumption in favour of the ex facie import of the document as a sale.

(44) Before closing I would like to add a word of caution. We have dealt, in this case, with only a few out of the variety of circumstances or stipulations, arising in cases of this kind. But the judgment is not to be understood as laying down that the particular presumptions or stipulations that we have dealt with, are of over-riding importance, when there are other stipulations & circumstances to enable a Court to come to a fair & reasonable conclusion. The one & the only crucial criterion in all such cases is the intention of the parties. That intention is to be judged from a full consideration of the contents of the document & the surrounding circumstances. Every other rule that has been laid down in the decided cases are (sic.) only aids to such consideration. Even the rulings regarding the presumptions arising in such cases are not to be treated as in the category of rules relating to onus of proof. Rules relating to onus of proof enable the Court to say that a person who has not discharged the burden of proof on a particular issue must fall on that issue. But the presumptions dealt with as regards construction of documents of this kind are only aids to such constructions. The Court may use all available material including the presumptions, but must arrive at a definite conclusion whether in its view the transaction in question is a mortgage or a sale. It cannot merely absolve itself of its function of construction by saying that a particular party must fail because he has not discharged the onus.

(45) I would also add that the delay in seeking redemption is a circumstance which must call for scrutiny in such cases. Unexplained delay must receive its due weight as one of the relevant circumstances, by way of conduct where such conduct is admissible — See 'Alderson v. White' & '38 All 570'.

(46) On the merits of the appeal before us, I am not prepared to differ from the decision of my Lord the Chief Justice that the suit document is a mortgage & not a sale, though at first inclined the other way on account of the long delay.

(47) Apart from the ex facie import of the document, there are no outstanding circumstances showing it to be a sale. There is no clear & positive evidence that the consideration was substantially fair & adequate as price. The finding of the trial Court in this behalf is rather negative & halting. The styling of the document as Sharti Bikraya Kabala is, if any, a weak aid to the construction. There was undoubtedly very considerable delay of about 24 years in the pltf. coming forward with this claim for redemption & that may be indicative of the consciousness of the parties about the absence of the right of redemption & it is this that has caused hesitation in my mind. But there are terms in the document which seem to indicate that the document was meant to be a mortgage. There is the provision for paying back the money with interest on disturbance of possession — not necessarily due to defect in vendor's title. There is the fact that though the vendee could have obtained mutation, even on the terms of the document, in 1920 under S. 31, Orissa Tenancy Act, he did not choose to assert his position as a vendor & obtain mutation till 1927. What however is the significant & turning factor in this case is, as stated by my Lord, the marked difference in the operative words of conveyance of ownership used in the earlier portion & later portion of the document implying thereby that in the consciousness of the parties there was detraction from full ownership prior to the stipulated time. For the above reasons I agree with the order proposed by my Lord, as regards the disposal of the appeal on its merits.

(48) NARASIMHAM J.: I respectfully agree with my Lord the Chief Justice regarding the answers to the four questions, referred for decision to the Full Bench. I also agree with the order which he intends passing in Second Appeal No. 162 of 1946. My learned brother Justice Das also agrees with my Lord the Chief Justice regarding the said answers & the order proposed to be passed in S. A. No. 162 of 1946. It is thus clear that there is complete unanimity on all the points that have arisen for decision before this Full Bench.

(49) My Lord the Chief Justice & my learned brother Justice Das have however differed in respect of the construction of conditions 1 & 2 of Cl. (c) of S. 58, T. P. Act. My Lord has taken the view that if a document contains either the first or the second of the said conditions the transaction evidenced by the document must conclusively be held to be one of mortgage by conditional sale & not a out & out sale. My learned brother Justice Das however seems to think that such a document executed after 1929 may raise a presumption in favour of a mortgage but that to ascertain its true nature the intention of the parties would be found out. Both of them have however recognised that this point does not directly arise for decision in this reference. I would therefore reserve my opinion on that question.

Second Appeal No. 97 of 1946, D/- 9-2-1951.

† (a) Interpretation of Statutes — Construction harmonising with subject and object of enactment — Preference to.

The words of a statute, when there is a doubt about their meaning, are to be understood in the sense in which they best harmonise with the subject of the enactment and the object which the Legislature has in view. Their meaning is found not so much in a strictly grammatical or etymological propriety of language, nor even in its popular use, as in the subject or in the occasion on which they are used, and the object to be attained. (Para 4)

Anno: Civil P. C. Pre. N. 7.

(b) Interpretation of Statutes — Remedial Acts — Beneficial construction.

'Per Narasimham, J: Even where the usual meaning of the language falls short of the whole object of the Legislature a more extended meaning may be attributed to the words of a remedial Act, if they are fairly susceptible of it. The construction must not, of course, be strained to include cases plainly omitted from the natural meaning of the words. (Para 4)

'Per Das, J.: Even in the case of a remedial statute it is the language of the statute that must govern and there is no warrant for any construction which cannot reasonably be deduced from a fair construction of the Act. (Para 43)

Anno: A. M. Int. of Statutes, N. 2.

'Per Narasimham, J.: It is a well-known rule of statute drafting that a statute is to be regarded as always speaking. (Para 6)

'Per Das, J.: The Rule that a statute is to be regarded as always speaking does not mean that the statute is to be construed as operative with reference to the past as much as with reference to the present and the future: it only means that, with reference to any particular case that falls within the scope of the wording of the statute, the statute must be taken to be speaking with reference thereto — and it is not to be regarded as a rule of guidance as to the retrospective or prospective operation of the statute. (Para 38)

Anno: C. P. C. Pre. N. 7.

(d) Hindu Women's Right to Property Act (1937), Preamble — Act whether remedial.

The Act, as its Preamble shows, is a remedial Act seeking to remove or to mitigate what the Legislature presumably regarded as a mischief; and as such it ought to receive beneficial interpretation. A.I.R. (29) 1941 F. C. 72, Rel. on. (Paras 4, 43, 59)

(e) Hindu Women's Right to Property Act (1937), Ss. 3, 4 — Applicability of S. 3 (2) to widow whose husband has died before the Act.

('Per Narasimham, J., and Ray, C. J.; Das, J., dissenting): Taking into consideration the rule of drafting regarding the use of the tense and mood and the implications arising out of the language used in Sub-sections (1) and (2) of Section 3 read with Section 4 of the Act it seems clear that there is nothing in Sub-section (2) of Section 3 to limit its application to the widow of a Hindu who dies after the commencement of the Act. Even on a fair construction of S. 3 (2), there is no indication barring its application to the widows of those Hindus who have died before the commencement of the Act and hence there is no reason as to why the benefit of Sub-section (2) should be denied to persons who became widows prior to the commencement of the Act, so long as the interest which their husbands had in the joint family property at the time of their death has not vested in any other individual. Such a construction is, strictly speaking, not giving a retrospective effect to the Act; it is applying the Act prospectively though a part of the requisites for its action is drawn from the time antecedent to its passing. (1848) 116 E R 811, Ref. (Paras 6, 8, 15)

'Das', J: The meaning of the relevant provisions of the Act is clear and does not admit of the suggested benevolent construction. Sub-sections (2) and (3) of S. 3 show that the widow's interest accrues by devolution at the moment of husband's death and such devolution adversely affects the rights of each coparcener vested in him from the moment of his birth, defined and determined with reference to fixed Hindu Law Rules and may also have the effect of adversely affecting past transactions. The widow, while introduced as a sharer of the family property, is not made a statutory grantee, but a statutory heir, of the coparcenary interest therein of her husband. It is therefore impossible to extend the benefit of the Act to a pre-Act widow except by giving the Act retrospective operation.

The principle of prospective operation of rights founded partly on past events is inapplicable to the case in view of the nature of the interest created in favour of the widow by the Act. (Para 45)

Anno: H. W. R. P. Act, S. 3, N. 1.

(f) Hindu Women's Right to Property Act (1937), S. 3 (2) — 'Dies' — Whether refers to past.

'Narasimham, J.: The tense and the mood of the verb used in the Act are such that whenever the Act is taken up for consideration it should appear as if the Act is then speaking. Therefore merely because the verb 'dies' in S. 3 (2) is in the present tense it is not correct to say that the Act refers to the present and to the future and not to the past, as such construction would overlook the well-known rule that a statute is to be regarded as always speaking. (1848) 116 E R 811; (1889) 58 L J P C 158 and A I R (37) 1950 Mad 321, Rel. on. (Para 6)

'Per Das, J.': It is not enough that the word 'dies' may be capable of being construed as applicable to the case of death prior to the Act. Every other requirement flowing from the wording of the Sub-sections must also be equally applicable to such a case and nothing which is not in it can be imported into it. One cannot shut his eyes to the inescapable implication of the Act that the right accrues by devolution at the moment of husband's death and no other. (Para 26)

Anno: H. W. R. P. Act, S. 3, N. 1.

(g) Hindu Women's Right to Property Act (1937), S. 3 (12) — 'When' — Whether indicates time factor — Words and Phrases.

'Per Narasimham, J.': It is true that the word 'when' may sometimes be indicative of the time factor, but in S. 3 (2) it has been used as indicating a condition and not the time factor and has the same meaning as 'where' to convey the meaning' in cases in which.' (Para 6)

'Per Ray, C. J.': The word 'when' in Sub-section (2) cannot force the construction of future death. If it were so, the words 'at the time of his death' would be wholly superfluous. The word therefore means "if or in the event of" and does not refer to the 'time' when the Hindu dies. (Para 50)

Anno: H. W. R. P. Act, S. 3, N. 1.

(h) Hindu Women's Right to Property Act (1937), Ss. 3 (2), 4 — Applicability of S. 4 to Hindus referred in S. 3 (2).

'Per Narasimham, J.': As the word "intestate" is inappropriate in Sub-section (2) of S. 3, and is deliberately omitted from that Sub-section but is retained in S. 4, it necessarily follows that S. 4, cannot apply to the Hindus referred to S. 3 (2). (Para 9)

'Per Ray, C. J.': Section 4 is an exception to Section 2 and, in that sense, does not limit the operation of Sub-section (2) of Section 3 to cases of women widowed subsequent to the Act. (Para 50)

Anno. H. W. R. P. S. 3, N. 1.

(i) Hindu Women's Right to Property Act (1937), Ss. 3 (2), 2 — S. 2 does not limit S. 3 (2).

('Per Narasimham, J., and Ray, C. J.; Das, J., contra'): An amending Act ex hypothesi will be contrary to the existing law which it purports to amend and must prevail notwithstanding any provision to the contrary in the then existing law. Section 3 of the Act which purports to amend the existing Hindu Law is a self-contained provision and Sub-sections (1) and (2) of that section prevail over the rule of Hindu Law by their own force. Section 2 is, therefore, apparently inserted by way of abundant caution. Where custom is saved, there is express provision to that effect in Sub-section (4) of Section 3. The word 'intestate' in S. 2 cannot therefore limit the giving of full effect to Sub-s. (2) of S. 3. (Para 11)

Anno: H. W. R. P. Act, S. 3, N. 1.

(j) Hindu Women's Right to Property Act (1937), S. 3 (2) — Applicability — Nature of Widow's interest — Hindu dying before 1937 — Section applies.

('Narasimham, J., and Ray, C. J., Das, J., contra') —The quantum of interest which the widow gets is not fixed with reference to what her husband had at the time of his death. The quantum is liable to fluctuation until partition and hence there is no legal impossibility in applying Section 3 (2) to the case of a widow whose husband died prior to the Act, when joint family property continues intact after the passing of the Act. If there was any valid alienation by the manager of the family or by a coparcener in States like Madras where such alienations are recognised as valid to the extent of his interest, the quantum of interest available to the widow at the time of partition would have to be worked out as if her husband were alive till the date of partition while at the same time preserving vested rights which had accrued to persons before commencement of the Act. A.I.R. (32) 1945 Mad. 21, Rel. on. (Para 12)

'Per Das, J.': Under S. 3 (2), the Hindu Widow gets her interest from her husband by 'devolution.' By the 'devolution' of the interest on her she intercepts the right of survivorship thereto of the other coparceners, including the direct lineal male descendants of the husband himself. She has the right, under Sub-section (3), to obtain separation of her interest by claiming a partition. Her interest is a present interest capable of enjoyment, as such, even without division, and is not dependent upon her enforcing partition. She can therefore question alienations made or partitions effected, behind her back after the right accrues to her. The interest which she gets from her husband, in her hands being the limited interest of a Hindu women's estate, is subject to alienation and devolution in the same way. It follows that while her interest is an interest in the joint family property, it is not a coparcenary interest — it is only an ex-coparcenary interest. On her death, her interest in the joint family property, or the share therein which she may take on separation, does not, 'prima facie,' revert back to the joint family or coparcenary as such, but goes to the heirs of her husband as the fresh stock of descent. 'Case Law Ref.' (Para 20)

So far as can be gathered with reference to the wording of Sub-section (2) and (3) of S. 3 of the Act, the interest taken by the post-Act Widow is merely an interest in the joint family property and accruing at the very moment of her husband's death. There is absolutely no reason for thinking that the position is different in respect of the pre-Act widow, in case the Act applies to her. (Para 21)

Anno: H. W. R. P. Act, S. 3, N. 1.

(k) Hindu Women's Right to Property Act (1939), S. 3 (2) — Application of, to widows of Hindus dying before Act — Whether affects any vested rights of coparceners — Retrospective operation of Act — Rule as to — Interpretation of Statutes.

(Per Narasimham, J., and Ray, C. J.; Das J., contra'): No statute should be construed retrospectively so as to affect vested rights unless such a construction can be justified either by express words or by necessary implication.

By applying the Act to a widow whose husband died prior to 1937 the effect may undoubtedly be to reduce the quantum of interest which the other coparceners might have obtained, had they partitioned the property at the time of the death of the husband. But as they had no vested right to that quantum at that time it cannot be said that that right was adversely affected by such a construction. Unless it is a well-defined right there can be no question of its being either adversely affected or impaired.

Moreover, by admitting the widows of deceased coparceners also to some interest in the property the Act may be said to have deprived the coparceners of their exclusive privilege of limiting the interest to males alone. But a mere deprivation of privilege cannot be a ground for not giving limited retrospective effect to a statute when the words are capable of such construction. 1896 A. C. 240 Ref. (Para 13)

'Per Das, J.': The argument that the death of the widow's husband does not result in vesting his interest in the other coparceners or the introduction of widow as a sharer on her husband's death does not adversely affect any vested interest of coparceners, lays too much stress on the unpredictable nature of a coparcener's arithmetical share on partition. But that is not the sole criterion of a coparcener's interest. His is a vested interest. It is no doubt fluctuating in one sense. But the fluctuation is not erratic. The interest while it cannot be measured in terms of any arithmetical share before partition is still definite and definable in terms of the class of the membership of the joint family corporation. It is therefore well-nigh impossible to say that the introduction of the widow as a co-sharer does not adversely affect the coparcener's vested right. (Paras 29, 31)

Anno: H. W. R. P. Act, S. 3, N. 1.

'Per Ray, C. J.': The only explanation why Section 4 was enacted notwithstanding S. 2, is that Section 2 makes the Act applicable to cases of deaths of Hindus occurring either before or after the Act, and Section 4 emphasises the same by excepting, from the general rule of applicability prescribed in Section 2, the cases specified therein, namely, the cases where a Hindu leaves separate exclusive properties of his own which he could have disposed by valid testamentary disposition, but had failed to do so, and which would descend on his death to his heirs as distinguished from survivors, by rules of inheritance, the Act having introduced some new heirs into the pre-existing list of heirs under Hindu Law, as it then stood. NARASIMHAM, J: This reference to the special Bench was necessitated in consequence of a difference of opinion between my lord the Chief Justice and my learned brother Justice Das who first heard the appeal as a Division Bench.

(2) The essential facts have been fully set out in the judgment of my learned brother Justice Das and it is unnecessary to repeat them at length. Appellant Radhi Bewa (who was defendant No. 2 in the original suit) is the widow of one Bairagi who died sometime in 1932 or 1934. Respondent Bhagawan (plaintiff no. 1) is the own brother of Bairagi and respondents Brundaban and Hrudanand (plaintiffs 2 and 3) are the sons of another brother of Bhagawan and Bairagi named Natha who is dead. There was another brother of Bhagawan named Bharat who died leaving a widow named Keluni (defendant no. 1) and a daughter (defendant no 3.) They were also parties to the litigation in the early stages and it appears that they eventually compromised with the plaintiffs. The whole case proceeded on the assumption that the Mitakshara coparcenary which originally consisted of Bhagawan and his three brothers Natha, Bharat and Bairagi remained in tact even after the death of Natha, Bharat and Bairagi and that at present the surviving coparceners are Bhagawan on the one hand and Natha's two sons Brundaban and Hrudanand on the other. They, therefore, claimed the suit property (which are agricultural lands) as the surviving members of the coparcenary and urged that appellant Radhi Bewa who is the widow of a deceased coparcener whose death took place prior to 1937 was entitled only to maintenance. Radhi Bewa's main contention however was that though she became a widow prior to 1937 there was nothing in the provisions of the Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act, 1937 to disentitle her from claiming an interest in the property of her deceased husband under Sub-section (2) of Section 3 of that Act in view of the fact that the coparcenary has yet been disrupted. She, therefore, claimed the share of her deceased husband. My lord the Chief Justice took the view that though the Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act, 1937 (Act XVIII of 1937) as amended by the amending Act of 1938 (Act XI of 1938) was not retrospective in the broad sense in which it is ordinarily understood yet there was nothing in that Act to prevent the widow of a deceased coparcener who died prior to 1937 leaving an interest in the joint family from claiming that interest when that interest had not vested in any person either by partition amongst the coparceners or otherwise.

(3) The Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act, 1937 (hereinafter referred to as the Act) as amended by the Act of 1938 was held by the Federal Court in Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act, 1937, In the matter of A. I. R. (28) 1941 F. C 72, to be inapplicable to agricultural lands. Thereupon the Orissa Legislature passed an Act in 1944 (Orissa Act V of 1944), extending the Act to agriculture lands in Orissa and giving retrospective effect to the same. Before the Division Bench it was contended, relying on the word 'always' in Section 2 of the Orissa Act, that the Orissa Act had unlimited retrospective effect. But this contention was rightly given up by Mr. Mohanty on behalf of the appellants at the time of arguing the appeal. The retrospectivity of the Orissa Act extends to the date of the commencement of the Central Act of 1937. It is, therefore, unnecessary to discuss the true meaning of the expression 'always' occurring in the Orissa Act which has been dealt with at some length in the judgments of the learned Judges who constituted the Division Bench. The sole question for consideration by the Special Bench is whether the benefits of Sub-section (2) of Section 3 of the Act are available to a Hindu woman who became a widow prior to the passing of the Act but whose husband's interest in the joint family property had not vested in any other person either by partition of the joint family property or by valid alienation. A decision of this question depends on a construction of Section 3 (2) of the Act along with other provisions of the Act such as Sections 2, 4 and 5. Though the Act is a small one consisting of five sections its construction is by no means easy and as pointed out in Mayne's Hindu Law, 11th Edition, at page 701, the Act even after the amendment of 1938 "remains defective and obscure in some respects." The difficulties in construing that Act have also been fully discussed at pages 4 to 10 of the report of the Hindu Law Committee, 1941. I must, therefore, confess to a feeling of diffidence in approaching the subject especially when my lord the Chief Justice and my learned brother Justice Das for both of whom I have the greatest respect have taken two divergent views.

(4) Before discussing the relevant provisions of the Act I may reiterate some well-known rules of statutory construction which bear repetition.

"The words of a statute, when there is a doubt about their meaning, are to be understood in the sense in which they best harmonise with the subject of the enactment and the object which the Legislature has in view. Their meaning is found not so much in a strictly grammatical or etymological propriety of language, nor even in its popular use, as in the subject or in the occasion on which they are used, and the object to be attained." (Maxwell, 9th edition, page 55).

To these rules must be added the special rules of beneficial construction which are applicable to remedial Acts.

"Even where the usual meaning of the language falls short of the whole object of the Legislature, a more extended meaning may be attributed to the words if they are fairly susceptible of it. The construction must not, of course, be strained to include cases plainly omitted from the natural meaning of the words," ('ibid', page 71.)

At the Bar it was faintly contended that the Act was not a remedial one. This argument apparently overlooks the following observations of the Chief Justice of India in A. I. R. (28) 1941 F. C. 72 at p. 76:

"The underlying purpose of the Act is plainly stated in its Preamble: "Whereas it is expedient to amend the Hindu Law to give better rights to women in respect of property." It is, therefore, a remedial Act seeking to remove or to mitigate what the Legislature presumably regarded as a mischief; and as such it ought to receive a beneficial interpretation."

The Chief Justice of India relied on the following passage in 'Gover's case'; In re, Coal Gas Co., (1875) 1 Ch. D. 182:

"The Act must be construed so as to give the most complete remedy which the phraseology will permit."

(5) I may now quote Sections 2 to 5 of the Act.

"Section 2. Notwithstanding any rule of Hindu law or custom to the contrary, the provisions of Section 3 shall apply where a Hindu dies intestate.

"Section 3 (1). When a Hindu governed by the Dayabhaga School of Hindu law dies intestate leaving any property, and when a Hindu governed by any other school of Hindu law or by customary law dies intestate leaving separate property, his widow, or if there is more than one widow all his widows together shall, subject to the provisions of Sub-section (3) be entitled in respect of property in respect of which he dies intestate to the same share as a son

Provided that the widow of a predeceased son shall inherit in like manner as a son if there is no son surviving of such predeceased son, and shall inherit in like manner as a son's son if there is surviving a son or son's son of such predeceased son;

Provided further that the same provision shall apply 'mutatis mutandis' to the widow of a predeceased son of a predeceased son.

(2) When a Hindu governed by any school of Hindu law other than the Dayabhaga school or by customary law dies having at the time or his death an interest in a Hindu joint family property, his widow shall, subject to the provisions of Sub-section (3), have in the property the same interest as he himself had.

(3) Any interest devolving on a Hindu widow under the provisions of this section shall be the limited interest known as a Hindu Women's Estate, provided, however, that she shall have the same right of claiming partition as a male owner.

(4) The provisions of this section shall not apply to an estate which by a customary or other rule of succession or by the terms of the grant applicable thereto descends to a single heir or to any property to which the Indian Succession Act, 1925, applies.

"Section 4. Nothing in this Act shall apply to the property of any Hindu dying intestate before the commencement of this Act.

Section 5. For the purposes of this Act, a person shall be deemed to die intestate in respect of all property of which he has not made a testamentary disposition which is capable of taking effect."

The original Act of 1937 did not contain Section 5 and in Sub-section (2) of Section 3 of that Act the word 'intestate' was found after the word 'dies. By the amending Act of 1938, the word 'intestate' was omitted from Sub-section (2) of Section 3 as 'inept' and Section 5 was newly inserted so as to give the expression 'die intestate' an extended meaning.

(6) Reading Sub-section (2) of Section 3 as it now stands it will be noticed that there is nothing in it to indicate that the death of the person referred to therein must have taken place prior to the commencement of the Act. All that it says is that when a Hindu governed by a particular school of Hindu law dies having at the time of his death an interest in a Hindu joint family property, his widow shall, subject to the provisions of Sub-section (3), have in the property the same interest as he himself had. The date of widowhood is not referred to at all. It was, however, contended that the expressions 'dies' and 'at the time of his death' indicate that the Legislature was thinking of deaths which might take place after the commencement of the Act. This argument, however, overlooks the well-known rule of statutory drafting.

"A statute is to be regarded as always speaking" ('Halsbury' Vol. 31, 2nd Edition, page 572.)

The tense and the mood of the verb used in the Act are such that whenever the Act is taken up for consideration it should appear as if the Act is then speaking. Therefore merely because the verb 'dies' is in the present tense it is not correct to say that the Act refers to the present and to the future and not to the past. Moreover, the subjunctive mood has been used in a conditional sense and the word 'when' is not used as indicating time factor but as indicating a condition. It is true that the word 'when' may sometimes be indicative of the time factor but here it appears to have the same meaning as 'where.' Thus in Section 2, the words used are "The provisions of Section 3 shall apply where a Hindu dies intestate."

Thus 'when' and 'where' have been used indiscriminately in the Act to convey the meaning 'in cases in which' (see Sir A. Alison's Legislative Drafting and Forms, 4th Edition, p. 117.) I would paraphrase Sub-section (2) as follows:

"In cases in which a Hindu governed by any school of Hindu law other than the Dayabhaga school or by customary law leaves an interest in a Hindu joint family property at the time of his death, his widow shall, subject to the provisions of Sub-section (3) have in the property the same interest as he himself had."

The words 'at the time of his death' have been specially insested to restrict the application of this Sub-section to the interest which he then leaves in the Hindu joint family property whatever might have been his interest prior to his death and they have nothing to do with the prospective or retrospective application of the Act. The most decisive argument in favour of the view that the word 'dies' does not necessarily indicate prospectivity is found in Section 4 of the Act itself. That section expressly says that nothing in the Act shall apply to the property of any Hindu dying intestate before the commencement of the Act. It, therefore, expressly bars giving retrospective effect to the property of a Hindu dying intestate before the commencement of the Act. The word 'dies' occurs in Sub-section (1) of Section 3 which deals with the separate property of a Mitakshara Hindu or the property of a Dayabhaga Hindu dying intestate. If the expression 'dies' in Sub-section (2) is itself sufficient to bar retrospective operation, by parity of reasoning the same expression in Sub-section (1) of Section 3 should be a bar to retrospective construction and there would have been absolutely no need for the Legislature to insert a new section like Section 4. It was, however, urged that Section 4 might have been inserted by way of abundant caution and that it should not affect the reasonable inference arising from the tense of the verb 'dies.' I am, however, unable to accept the view that a section like Section 4 which expressly bars retrospective effect in certain cases can be said to have been inserted by way of abundant caution. It seems to have been inserted mainly because the Legislature fully realised that if Section 3 (1) stood by itself it might be reasonably construed as retrospective to a limited extent and with a view to remove all possibility of such a construction it found it necessary to provide a new statutory section. Thus taking into consideration the rule of drafting regarding the use of the tense and mood and the implications arising out of the language used in

Sub-sections (1) and (2) of Section 3 read with Section 4 of the Act it seems clear that there is nothing in Sub-section (2) of Section 3 to limit its application to the widow of a Hindu who died after the commencement of the Act.

(7) There is ample authority for such a construction. As pointed out by my lord the Chief Justice the Privy Council while construing the words 'dying intestate' occurring in the Hindu Law of Inheritance (Amending Act of 1929) pointed out that those words do not necessarily connote the future tense but that they are descriptive of the status of the deceased and have no reference and were not intended to have any reference to the time of the death of a Hindu male. Similarly in 'The Queen v. St. Mary Whitechapel', (1848) 116 E R 811, the following provisions of Section 2 of Stat. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66 came up for consideration.

"No woman residing in any parish with her husband at the time of his death shall be removed ....."

The argument that the word 'residing' in that section though connected with the words 'shall be removed' is not meant to confine the enactment to future residence but that it is a descriptive word having the effect of adjective and referable to any time was accepted by Lord Denman, C. J., who held that though the Act was prospective in its operation as it related to future removals only there was nothing to prevent a construction by which 'a part of the requisites for its action is drawn from time antecedent to its passing."

In 'The Queen v. Birwistle', (1889) 58 L J M C 158, the decision turned on the construction of the following extract from Section 1 of 49 & 50 of Vict. c. 52.

"From and after the passing of this Act it shall be lawful for any married woman, who shall have been deserted by her husband to summon her husband before any two Justices, etc. etc."

The question for consideration was that section would apply to desertions which took place rior to the commencement of the Act also. Lord Coleridge, C. J., answered this question in the affirmative saying:

"Scores of Acts are retrospective, and may without express words be taken to be retrospective, since they are passed to supply a cure to an existing evil. This Act was intended to afford married women a remedy for desertion, and desertion may have commenced before the Act....."

The recent judgment of Viswantha Sastri, J., in 'Lakshmi Ammal v. Narayanaswami', A I R (37) 1950 Mad 321, while construing the words "if he marries again" in Clause (4) of Section 2 of the Hindu Married Women's Right to Separate Residence and Maintenance Act, 1946 is also very instructive. The learned Judge held that the said expression is not limited to second marriages which might take place after the coming to force of the Act but would apply to such marriages which took place prior to the passing of the Act and the words were "Merely descriptive of the position of the husband as a twice married man at the date when the wife's claim for separate maintenance is made under the Act....."

(8) It is unnecessary to cite other authorities. Even on a fair construction of Sub-section (2) of Section 3 it cannot be said that there is any indication therein barring its application to the widows of those Hindus who died before the commencement of the Act. When there is no such indication there seems to be no reason as to why the benefit of that Sub-section should be denied to those classes of persons who became widows prior to the commencement of the Act unless such a construction is inconsistent with the other provisions of the Act or offends against other well-known canons of the statutory construction. Such a construction is strictly speaking not giving retrospective effect to the statute as ordinarily understood but to quote the words of Lord Denman, C. J., (1848) 116 E R 811, to apply the Act prospectively though

'a part of the requisites for its action is drawn from time antecedent to its passing.'

(9) It was contended that Section 4 read with Section 5 left no room for doubt that the whole of Section 3 including Sub-section (2) could not apply to the property of a Hindu who died before the commencement of the Act. It will be noticed that Section 4 refers to the property of a Hindu dying intestate. Sub-section (1) of Section 3 expressly refers to the property of such a Hindu and that Sub-section has therefore clearly no retrospective operation. But Sub-section (2) does not refer either to 'property' or to a Hindu who 'dies intestate.' It refers only to the 'interest' of a Hindu in the joint family. The word 'intestate' which was originally inserted in that Sub-section was deliberately omitted by the Legislature in 1938 as 'inept.' That is to say, the Legislature considered that it will not be appropriate to say that a Hindu governed by the Mitakshara who has an interest in the joint family property can be said to 'die intestate' in respect of that interest because he has no right to make a testamentary disposition. If, therefore, it will not be good English to say that such a Hindu died 'intestate' how can it be said that Section 4 applies to him also? In other words, if the word 'intestate' is inappropriate in Sub-section (2) of Section 3 and is deliberately omitted from that Sub-section but retained in Section 4 it necessarily follows that Section 4 cannot apply to those Hindus referred to in Sub-section (2) of Section 3. Moreover, in ordinary language when a person is said to 'die intestate' the reference is to a person who having the capacity to make a will either omits to execute any will at all or executes a will which is found to be invalid due to other causes. It will, therefore, be not good English to say that a 'minor died intestate' or else that a 'congenital idiot died intestate' because neither of them has the capacity to make a will. The position of a coparcener in an undivided Hindu family is of a similar type in respect of his interest in the joint family property and Section 4 cannot be applicable to him in respect of that interest.

(10) It was, however, contended that even though in terms Section 4 may not be applicable to a coparcener of an undivided Hindu joint family, by virtue of the extended definition given in Section 5 it became so applicable. It was urged that the words in Section 5 'he has not made a testamentary disposition which is capable of taking effect' would also include those cases where an undivided Mitakshara Hindu does not make any will at all or makes a will which on account of his incapacity is incapable of taking effect. I would have been inclined to accept this argument but for the deliberate omission of the word 'intestate' from sub-section (2) of section 3 by the Legislature in 1938. If intestacy and the interest of a Mitakshara Hindu joint family property are incongruous in one sub-section of the Act they must be incongruous in all other sections of the Act because it is a well-known rule of statutory construction that words and phrases should be given the same meaning throughout the Act, unless there is any repugnancy in the context. Section 5 should therefore be construed to refer to those cases where a person having the capacity to make a will executes a will which due to other reasons such as failure to comply with the formalities or contravention of the law of transfer of property is rendered invalid in whole or in part in respect of a portion of the property. The necessity for inserting section 5 was obvious. Ordinarily, the word 'intestate' would mean intestacy in fact; that is to say, the fact that no will was executed by a person capable of executing a will. But legal intestacy goes further and includes those cases where a will though executed in fact is declared to be invalid in whole or in part. If section 5 were not there then difficulties might have arisen in construing section 4 in those cases where there is intestacy in law though not in fact and it was to remove this difficulty that section 5 was inserted adopting the language of section 30 of the Indian Succession Act. If section 5 were meant to include those cases of persons who had no capacity to make a will at all the necessity for omitting the word 'intestate' from section 3(2) would not have arisen.

(11) One important argument against this construction is that it may lead to the anomalous result of section 2 being not applicable to subsection (2) of section 3. This argument appears to have weighed very much with my learned brother Justice Das. Section 2 undoubtedly refers to a Hindu who dies intestate and it says that the devolution of property as described in section 3 shall apply to the property of such a Hindu 'notwithstanding any rule of Hindu law or custom to the contrary'. It is argued that unless this controlling section 2 is made applicable to subsection (2) of section 3 difficulties of construction would arise when there is a conflict between section 3(2) on the one hand and any provision of Hindu Law or custom to the contrary on the other. There are two answers to this argument. The first one is that given by Srinivasa Iyengar in his 10th edition of Mayne's Hindu Law at page 716 and reiterated in the 11th edition of the same book at page 704. There, it has been pointed out that: 'as intestacy cannot by any legal possibility be a condition for the operation of sub-section (2) to section 3 the words 'dies intestate' in section 2 must be treated as a surplusage having no meaning.'

Another reason which I venture to put forward is that section 2 was inserted by way of abundant caution and the full operation of sub-section (2) of section 3 is not in any way affected even if section 2 be completely omitted. The Act purports to be an amendment to the Hindu law. It is well-known that Hindu law consists not only of sacred texts but includes customary law which modifies those texts and the judicial decisions interpreting those texts and recognising such custom. When an Act therefore purports to be an amendment to the existing Hindu law it must, to the extent to which it can be reasonably construed, prevail over any existing provision of Hindu law or custom to the contrary. An amending Act ex-hypothesi will be contrary to the existing law which it purports to amend and must prevail notwithstanding any provision to the contrary in the then existing law. Section 3 is a self-contained provision and sub-sections (1) and (2) of that section would prevail by their own force and section 2 was apparently inserted by way of abundant caution. Where custom is saved, there is express provision to that effect in sub-section (4) of section 3. The word 'intestate' in section 2 cannot therefore limit the giving full effect to sub-section (2) of section 3.

(12) Another reason which also appears to have weighed very much with my learned brother Justice Das will be clear from the following quotation of his Judgment.

"The quantum of the interest which a widow gets is the same as what the husband had during his life-time and therefore does not fluctuate with reference to any further changes in the constitution of the family. It is also clear that that interest is measured by what it was when the husband died, since the interest is referred to in subsection (3) as 'devolving' on her from her husband and in sub-section (2) as being the same which he had when he died."

From this premise he infers that the commencement and the quantum of the widow's interest have reference to the point of time when her husband died and that it is almost impossible to fit in the case of a widow whose husband died prior to the Act, into the framework of section 3 (2). I am however unable to find any clear authority to support the view that the quantum of interest which the widow gets is fixed with reference what her husband had at the time of his death and does not fluctuate. This question is certainly not free from difficulty as pointed out in the 11th edition of Mayne's Hindu Law at pages 710, 711 where the learned editor has observed:

To a similar effect are the following observations at page 334 of the same book.

"While she cannot be in strict sense a coparcener with the other members, her position will be analogous to that of a member of an undivided family under the Dayabhaga Law with this possible difference that, as she is only to have the 'same interest' as her husband himself had, the share to which she will be entitled at a partition may be liable to the same fluctuation caused by changes in the family as if she occupied the place of her husband or as the share of any member of an undivided Mitakshara family."

The Madras High Court has also taken the same view in 'Chinniah Chettiar v. Sivagami Achi', I L R (1945) Mad 402. Therefore, even in respect of post—1937 deaths it has been held that the quantum of interest of a Hindu widow is liable to fluctuation until partition. There seems to be thus no legal impossibility in applying section 3(2) to the case of a widow whose husband died prior to the Act, when joint family property continues intact after the passing of the Act. If there was any valid alienation by the manager of the family or by a coparcener in States like Madras where such alienations are recognised as valid to the extent of his interest, the quantum of interest available to the widow at the time of partition would have to be worked out as if her husband were alive till the date of partition while at the same time preserving vested rights which had accrued to persons before the commencement of the Act.

(13) It is true that no statute should be construed retrospectively so as to affect vested rights unless such a construction can be justified either by express words or by necessary implication. But the question is what are the vested rights that are adversely affected by the construction suggested in this judgment. It has been strenuously contended that the rights of the other coparceners in the joint family property are adversely affected. It is unnecessary to elaborate at length the various rights of an individual coparcener in a Hindu joint family until partition. I would content myself with quoting the following observations of the Privy Council in 'Ananta Bhikappa v. Shankar Ramchandra', 70 Ind App 232 at p. 239:

"As Appovier's case made clear, the fraction which is at any time employed to describe the quantum of interest of a male member of the family 'does not represent his rights while the family is joint', but the share which he would take if a partition were then to be made. His interest is never static but increases by survivorship as others die and lessens as others enter the family as by birth or adoption."

A coparcener has undoubtedly an interest in the joint family. But the quantum of his interest at any particular time being indeterminate and inchoate till actual partition it cannot be said that he has any right — much less a vested right — to such a quantum of interest. By applying the Act to widows whose husbands died prior to 1937 the effect may undoubtedly be to reduce the quantum of interest which the other coparceners might have obtained, had they partitioned the property at the time of the deaths of those husbands. But as they had no vested right to that quantum at that time it cannot be said that right was 'adversely' affected by such a construction. Unless it is a well defined right there can be no question of its being either adversely affected or impaired. The rule against retrospective construction (even in a limited sense) has been thus explained in Halsbury, Vol. 31, 2nd edition, page 516.

"The rule, therefore, strictly stated applies to rights which are at the moment of enactment matters of active assertion, and not to rights which may thereafter be the subject of litigation".

How can it be said that the quantum of interest of a coparcener in the coparcenary property is a matter of active assertion until partition? The learned Counsel for the respondent however contended that the other rights of the coparcener in the joint family property such as his right of joint possession and enjoyment etc. fully described in section 235 at page of Mulla's Hindu Law, 10th edition are also adversely affected. I am however unable to understood how any right of a coparcener except the quantum of his interest is adversely affected when the widow of a deceased coparcener is held to have her husband's interest in the property. She is not a stranger but also a member of the joint family and as such is always entitled to maintenance like coparceners themselves. By giving her the same interest in the property which her husband had the joint possession and enjoyment of the property by the other coparceners is not in any way adversely affected. The Karta continues to manage the property as before and the other coparceners' right to claim partition at any time is not affected at all. The coparceners had the privilege (if I may use that expression) of admitting male issues of coparceners alone to an interest in the coparcenary property. The Act by admitting the widows of deceased coparceners also to some interest in the property may be said to have deprived the coparceners of that exclusive privilege of limiting the interest to males alone. But a mere deprivation of privilege cannot be a ground for not giving limited retrospective effect to a statute when the words are capable of such construction. In 'Reynolds v. Attorney General for Nova Scotia' 1896 A C 240, it was held that a mere privilege was not a vested right so as to prevent a court from giving retrospective effect to a statute.

(14) The judgment of the Federal Court in 'Umayal Achi v. Lakshmi Achi', A. I. R. (32) 1945 F. C. 25 has been cited at the Bar and emphasis has been laid on the following observations of Varadachariar J. at page 33.

"But that is due to the circumstances that her husband died before the passing of the Act..... ..The possibility of such varying consequences cannot be allowed to control the natural and reasonable interpretation of the Act. It is prima facie prospective....."

The use of the word 'prima facie' by Varadachariar J. makes it absolutely clear that there is no decision by the Federal Court of this question. This point was not specifically taken up and moreover in that case it could not be taken up because the entire property had vested in a sole coparcener before the commencement of the Act of 1937.

(15) To conclude: the Act being a remedial Act there seems no justification for not giving full effect to the words of sub-section (2) of section 3 so as to embrace within its scope persons who became widows not only after the commencement of the Act but also those persons who became widows before the commencement of the Act so long as the interest which their husbands had in the joint family property at the time of their death had not vested in any individual. The tense and mood used by the draftsman in sub-section (2) of section 3 are not at all decisive on the question of prospective construction but are consistent with the alternative construction also. If section 4 be made applicable to sub-section (2) of section 3 there would certainly be a definite bar to giving such a limited retrospective construction to section 3(2) but by deliberately omitting the word 'intestate' from sub-section (2) of section 3 and retaining it in section 4 the legislature obviously indicated that section 4 should not in any way control sub-section (2) of section 3. Any such construction which would affect vested rights of any person may be open to other objections based on well-known canons of construction. But so long as such vested rights are not affected there seems no justification for depriving one class of widows from the benefits which the Act intended to confer on them.

(16) I would therefore, with great respect, agree with the view taken by my Lord the Chief Justice.

(17) JAGANNADHADAS, J.: We have heard elaborate arguments on his reference and I have had the advantage of considering carefully the judgment of my Lord the Chief Justice in the Division Bench and all the arguments in support of it from the Bar and the Bench and also of reading with close attention the judgment prepared by my learned brother Justice Narasimham. But after giving the matter my best and anxious consideration I regret, with great respect, my disagreement with their views and I feel unable to come to any different conclusion than that which I had reached when I heard the matter as a member of the Division Bench. I am indeed bound to say that I feel reinforced in the view that I have already expressed.

(18) In view of the importance of the matter and out of respect for the views of my learned brothers and out of regard for the strenuous arguments advanced at the Bar, I am obliged to deal with the question involved, at some length, even at the possible risk of repetition of portions of my previous judgment.

(19) Under Section 3, sub-section (2) of Central Act XVIII of 1937, as amended by Central Act XI of 1938, the widow of a coparcener who dies leaving an interest in joint family property gets his interest therein. The question for decision is whether this applies equally to a widow whose husband died prior to the passing of the Act, as it does indisputably to the case of a widow whose husband died after the passing of the Act. It is common ground that the Act is not to be construed as retrospective in operation. But it is argued that it is possible to give prospective operation to it, also in its application to a widow whose husband died before the commencement of the Act. This depends upon a construction of the relevant provisions of the Act itself and upon the question whether, so construed, it does or does not adversely affect any vested rights which had accrued prior to the commencement of the Act. The feasibility of such a construction depends, largely, on the nature of the interest given to such a widow and the time of the accrual of that interest, generally, under the Act.

(20) The relevant provisions are sub-sections (2) and (3) of section 3 of the Act. These provisions have come in for consideration before the various High Courts during the thirteen years for which the Act has by now been in force. It is now well settled that the Act has not the effect of introducing the widow as a coparcener into the joint family along with the other coparceners, that the widow gets the interest of her husband by succession as his heir and not by survivorship, but that no disruption of the coparcenary is effected thereby, that the widow holds her interest in the property not as the interest of a tenant-in-common with the coparceners, but as an interest in joint family property, subject to all the normal and well understood incidents relating to ownership of joint family property, viz., its liability to common management by the family manager, its liability for family debts, family expenses, and so forth. These propositions are clearly laid down in A. I. R. (28) 1941 F. C. 72 at p. 74 Col. (2), 'Siveshwar Prasad Narain Singh v. Harnarainmal', AIR (32) 1945 Pat 116; 'Sardambal v. Subbarama Ayyar', A I R (29) 1942 Mad 212; 'Kallian Rai v. Kashinath', A I R (30) 1943 All 188; 'Jadaobai v. Purnmal', AIR (31) 1944 Nag 243; 'Vinod Sagar v. Vishnubhai', AIR (34) 1947 Lah 388; and Radha Ammal v. Commr. of I. T., Madras', 1950-1 Mad L Jour 399 and 'Seethamma v. Veerana Chetty', I L R (1950) Mad 1076. They emerge from the wording of the sub-sections above referred to. The widow gets "the same interest in the joint family property which the husband had", but the interest which devolves on her is "the limited interest known as the Hindu Woman's estate". She gets her interest from her husband by "devolution". By the "devolution" of the interest on her she intercepts the right of survivorship thereto of the other coparceners, including the direct lineal male descendants of the husband himself. She has the right, under sub-s. (3) to obtain separation of her interest by claiming a partition. Her interest is a present interest capable of enjoyment, as such, even without division, and is not dependent upon her enforcing partition. Her interest is, in this respect, unlike that of the mother under the pre-existing law who was entitled to a share only on partition, but who had no right to compel partition and whose right to get a share depended on partition. See 'Pratapmull v. Dhanbati Bibi', A I R (23) 1936 P. C. 20. She can therefore question alienations made or partitions effected behind her back after the right accrues to her. The interest which she gets from her husband, in her hands being the limited interest of a Hindu Woman's estate, is subject to alienation and devolution in the same way. It follows that while her interest is an interest in the joint family property, it is not a coparcenary interest — it is only an ex-coparcenary interest. On her death, her interest in the joint family property, or the share therein which she may take on separation, does not prima facie, revert back to the joint family or coparcenary as such, but goes to the heirs of her husband as the fresh stock of descent. These positions are clearly deducible from the wording of the sub-sections and are substantially supported by the decisions cited above, besides being in complete accord with the closely reasoned views expressed by my Lord the Chief Justice in 'Kunja Sahu v. Bhagaban Mohanty', I. L. R. (1949) 1 Cut. 483, with most of which Justice Panigrahi has agreed.

(21) For the purpose of the present discussion, it is of importance to consider at what point of time the right accrues to the widow under the Act. Having regard to the wording of the sub-sections above referred to, there can be no reasonable doubt that the right accrues at the very moment of the husband's death. This is indisputably so with reference to the case of a widow whose husband dies after the commencement of the Act, (and is quite independent of the correctness or otherwise of the suggested construction — which I shall presently refer to — of the word "when" occurring at the beginning of sub-section (2) of section 3 as indicative only of the conditions for the accrual of the right). The only two possible alternatives, on principle for the commencement of the accrual of the right in the case of such a post-Act widow — if I may use the expression — are either her husband's death itself or the actual partition between the remaining coparceners. But, as has been pointed out already, there is nothing in the Act indicating that the rights of the widow, are to arise only on, or remain in abeyance until, partition. The right accrues therefore at the moment the sole condition for the birth of the right is fulfilled, viz., the death of the husband, having at the time an interest in joint family property. This is also clearly brought out by the use of the words and phrases "when", "at the time of his death" and "the same interest as he himself had" in sub-section (2), and the word "devolving" in sub-section (3). So far therefore as can be gathered with reference to the wording of sub-sections (2) and (3) of section 3 of the Act, the interest taken by the post-Act widow is, merely an interest in the joint family property, and accruing at the very moment of her husband's death. There is absolutely no reason for thinking that the position is different in respect of the pre-Act widow., in case the Act applies to her.

(22) In my previous judgment, as a member of the Division Bench, I stated as follows:

"It is reasonably clear that the commencement and quantum of the widow's interest has reference to a point of time when her husband died and it would also appear that her rights are in respect of the family property as it stood at the time when her husband died. If this is the correct view of the amplitude, quantum, and commencement of the widow's interest, it appears to me to be almost impossible to fit in the case of a widow, whose husband died prior to the Act, into the framework of Section 3, sub-section (2)".

(23) It has been argued before us, on this reference, that this assumption is erroneous. My attention has been drawn to a passage in Mayne's Hindu Law, 11th Edition, p. 710 and to a decision reported in I L R (1945) Mad 402 to the effect that the interest which the widow takes by devolution from her husband is the same fluctuating interest as that of her husband. For the purposes of the present discussnon, it may not be necessary to express any final opinion as to whether those views are correct. But I must point out that the core of the reasoning indicated in the above quotation from my previous judgment is that the widow's interest accrues right at the very moment of her husband's death, — quite independently of the question whether or not the interest is fluctuating — and that, therefore, the case of a widow whose husband died prior to the Act but whose rights came into operation after the commencement of the Act, is incompatible with the wording of the sub-sections quoted above. To counter the argument that the wording in these sub-sections indicate also the time-factor relating to accrual of the right of the widow, my learned brother Justice Narasimham has construed the word "when" as meaning "if" and has pointed out the use of "where" in section 2 of the Act as meaning "if". He has also attempted a paraphrase of sub-section (2) of Section 3 in order to support his point of view. But it appears to me, with great respect, that the very use of the word "where" in a different context and in a different section and the necessity felt by my learned brother to paraphrase in different language what he conceives to be the meaning of sub-section (2) of Section 3 are, to my mind, themselves cogent arguments against the meaning that he would attribute to the sub-section, and demonstrate that it is a forced construction. The construction, so adopted, proceeds on the omission to take note of the use of the important and decisive word "devolving" occurring in sub-section (3) of section 3.

(24) Though as I have already stated the question as to whether the interest that the widow takes, is a fluctuating one, or one defined and determined with reference to a point of time, viz., the date of her husband's death, does not require to be finally decided for the purposes of this case, a consideration of this question helps the discussion and is not out of place. I would, therefore, with very great respect to the learned Editor of Mayne's Hindu Law and the learned Judges in the Madras decision, venture to submit that the view taken as to the fluctuating character of a widow's interest appears to be erroneous. As I have shown above, the interest taken by the widow is not a coparcenary interest but only an interest that had been once a coparcenary interest. The essential characteristics of a coparcenary interest are that it arises by birth and lapses by death, except in so far as such lapse is prevented by the right of representation inhering in the three direct lineal male descendants of the coparcener. The fluctuating nature of a coparcenary interest is merely the result of these characteristics being a common feature of the interest of each and every member of the coparcenary group who between them own the entire family properties. It is obvious from the above that the rights of accrual by survivorship arising therefrom are mutual. In the case of a widow's interest under the Act, her interest arises not on her birth but on her husband's death. Further, on her own death, the interest does not, prima facie, lapse or revert back to the family, but goes to her husband's separated heirs. Her interest, therefore, does not accrue, on her death to the coparceners. It is difficult therefore to see how the benefit of survivorship can accrue to her own interest on the death of the other coparceners, there being no mutuality. It is also equally difficult to see how her share can be diminished by changes in the family. Some stress has been laid on the phrase in S. 3(1) that the widow shall have the same interest as her husband had. But it is not provided that, in her hands, it shall 'continue' to be the "same" interest, but on the other hand it is provided in S. 3(3) that in her hands it is "the interest in Hindu woman's estate". This has the effect — and it has been so judicially construed — of completely changing the character of the interest in her hands. It is in no sense therefore the "same" coparcenary interest in her hands, nor even a modified coparcenary interest. This conclusion is in no way affected by the line of decisions which hold that her interest is an interest in joint family property to the incidents thereof until partition. In my view therefore the interest of the widow does not continue in her hands as the "same" interest of her husband, but was so only at the time of devolution, the word "same" having reference to the measure and amplitude of the interest and not to the continuance of its equality. It appears to me, to follow, that her interest is not liable to fluctuations arising from the changing circumstances of the coparcenary group with whom she holds the joint family property in common. It must also follow that the quantum of her interest in the joint family must be one that is determined with reference to the time of the accrual of such interest, viz., the death of her husband. This view is in complete accord with what my Lord the Chief Justice has said in I.L.R. (1949) 1 Cut. 483, wherein his Lordship has specifically dissented from the view expressed in I.L.R. (1945) Mad. 402. I have since had the opportunity of reading my Lord's draft judgment on this reference and have considered carefully what his Lordship has said about his previous judgment. I take leave to say with respect that I prefer to follow My Lord's earlier reasoning.

(25) At any rate, if the view taken by me above is correct, viz., that the moment of the husband's death is the determining factor at least for the accrual of the widow's interest, if not also for the quantum, etc., thereof (note that this has been assumed to be so in 'Bhagwat Shukul v. Mt. Kaporni', A I R (31) 1944 Pat. 298 at p. 302; A I R (29) 1942 Mad. 212; 'Subba Naicker v. Nallammal', A I R (37) 1950 Mad. 192 at p. 193, and more clearly assumed in I L R (1949) 1 Cut. 483 at pp. 487 to 489), I am unable to see how the case of a widow whose husband died prior to the Act, can be brought within the scope of Sub-s. (2) of S. 3, without giving the Act retrospective operation.

(26) It has been suggested that the rights of a widow in such a case may well be taken to commence from or after the date when the Act comes into force provided there has been no partition of that joint family property between the members of the coparcenary previous thereto. This is the view expressed by my Lord in his referring judgment when he stated:

"Such an interpretation does not give the Subsection any retrospective operation when it applies to a case in which the joint family and the joint family property remain undivided and undisposed of till after the commencement of the Act."

It appears to me with respect that this is a construction wholly unwarranted by the language of the Act and imposes limitations on the accrual of the right not found in the Act itself. It is not enough that the word "dies" may be capable of being construed as applicable to the case of death prior to the Act. Every other requirement flowing from the wording of the Sub-sections must also be equally applicable to such a case and nothing which is not in it can be imported into it. One cannot shut his eyes to the inescapable implication of the Act that the right accrues by devolution at the moment of husband's death and no other. There is nothing in the Sub-section to warrant the accrual of the widow's right at any point of time other than the moment of the death of her husband, or to make the accrual conditional upon the property remaining undivided between the members of the coparcenary until the commencement of the Act. The Sub-section merely refers to the case of the husband dying as an undivided member of the family and the accrual of the widow's right at the moment of the husband's death. Indeed, if, as my Lord the Chief Justice is inclined to think, the widow is introduced as a sharer by giving her a right to represent the husband just like the son, there is no reason why she should not be able to reopen even a partition already made before the Act just as a posthumous, natural or adopted, son would be entitled to do, the more so after the case in 70 I A 232. This shows the untenability of imposing the condition of no partition (or no disposal) before the Act and of the view that the widow is the representative in the same way that the son is.

(27) It is also suggested that there is nothing against such a right, though determined with reference to a point of time prior to the date of the Act, springing up into operation at or after the commencement of the Act. This might have been possible, if the Act purported only to grant to the widow, out of the common pool of the joint family property an interest equal to that of her deceased husband's interest, as indeed was the case in respect of a mother prior to the Act, and did not provide for 'devolution' of that interest. I have already attempted to show that such devolutions occur at the very moment of death. To say that there can be devolution on death but accrual of the right thereafter, would be opposed to the fundamental principle that there can be no accrual on devolution with a gap and that heritage cannot be in abeyance. A devolution 'by succession' and accrual of right thereon must occur at the very moment when the succession opens. The same is also the case with devolution by survivorship as for instance where a member of an undivided Hindu family dies and his interest devolves on the survivors. The analogy of an adopted son divesting the interest of his deceased adoptive father on such adoption even after it has vested in a separated coparcener as in 70 Ind App 232, and the analogy of a reversioner succeeding to a propositus after the death of his widow, which have been suggested in the course of the arguments, have absolutely no relevance in this context and provide no exceptions to the fundamental rule that devolution by inheritance or survivorship cannot remain in abeyance. Nor does the decision of the Federal Court in AIR (28) 1941 FC 72, indicate that the devolution on the widow under S. 3 (2) is not by heirship (interrupting survivorship), though of course as pointed out therein the word "devolution" in its generic import is wide enough to include both succession and survivorship.

(23) The next point for consideration is whether or not the introduction of the widow as a sharer in the joint family property affects pre-existing rights of the other coparceners. My Lord the Chief Justice, in his referring judgment, has taken the view that the previous death of the widow's husband does not result in vesting any of his rights in the other coparceners and that what the Act does is only to give the widow a right of representation to her husband and that, consequently, there is no question of divesting of vested rights arising, on the construction adopted by him. My learned brother Justice Narasimham has put the matter in a different way and has said that no coparcener has a vested right to a particular share and that he cannot, therefore, complain of any vested right of his being affected by the introduction of an additional sharer in the person of the widow of a deceased coparcener. It appears to me, with great respect, that neither view makes a correct approach to the question at issue. The question is not whether the death of the widow's husband has vested any fresh rights in the other coparceners and if so whether they are taken away by the Act or whether a coparcener has a vested right to a definite arithmetical share. The question is — what are the normal rights of the coparceners 'from their birth' and are they vested rights and if so are they adversely affected by the introduction of the widow as a sharer. If the Legislation, in its general application, affects such vested rights, it can only be construed so as to bring it about either directly or indirectly by retrospective operation and so as not to affect adversely situations resulting from events prior to the Act. It is also pertinent to observe that in order to judge whether the construction of a statute leads to retrospective operation or not, it is not necessary that a pre-existing vested right should be completely divested. It will suffice if the vested right is adversely affected. As pointed out by Justice Mookerjee in 'Promotha Nath v. Soren Dasi', A I R (7) 1920 Cal. 435:

"Every statute which takes away or 'impairs a vested right', under existing laws, or creates a new obligation or imposes any duty, or 'attaches a new disability'..... in respect of transactions or considerations already passed ..... must not be deemed retrospective in its operation."

See also In re 'Pulborough School Board Election; 'Bourke v. Nutt', (1894), 1 Q. B. 725 at p. 737.

(29) The Privy Council has laid down as early as in 'Katama Natchier v. Rajah of Shivagunga', 9 Moo Ind App 539, at p. 611 that:

"According to the principle of Hindu Law, there is coparcenership between the different members of a joint family and survivorship following upon it. There is community of interest and unity of possession between all the members of the family and upon death of any one of them the others take by survivorship that in which they had during the deceased's lifetime a common interest and a common possession."

In 'Sudarsanam v. Narasimhulu', 25 Mad. 149 at p. 154, Justice Bhashyam Iyengar has further amplified the position as follows:

"The Mitakshara doctrine of joint family property is founded on the existence of an undivided family as a corporate body and the possession of property by such a corporate body. The first requisite, therefore, is a family unit and possession of property is the second requisite. For the present purpose, the female members of the family may be left out of consideration. 'The conception of a Hindu family is a common male ancestor with his lineal descendants in the male line' (the underlining (here into inverted commas) (is mine); and so long as that family is in its normal condition; viz., in an undivided state, it forms a corporate body. Such corporate body, with its heritage, is purely a creature of law and cannot be the creation of any act of the parties save in so far that by adoption a stranger may be affiliated as a member of that corporate family." The conception of a Hindu Mitakshara coparcenary is founded on the text of the Mitakshara, which, by elaborate logic, established that in ancestral property the son has a right by birth and that his ownership is equal to that of the father. As pointed out by Mayne at page 317, this itself is founded on the right of representation according to which, son, grandson and great grandson take together. It is the essence, therefore, of the ownership of joint family property that every coparcener has co-ownership in and common possession of the entire property and that the interest of each coparcener arises by birth and lapses on death to his male descendants or male collateral coparceners. The property belongs to the joint family and to each male member thereof in common. Anyone acquiring by birth and retaining the status of being its member has certain rights over and from the family property which are not, in any sense, those of mere maintenance-holders without any ownership in the property, but are proprietary rights. It is true that the individual rights are, in a sense, overshadowed by the family right of which the manager is the representative while the family is undivided. But the coparcenary is a close corporation consisting entirely of the male descendants of a common ancestor whose membership fluctuates by deaths, births, or adoptions 'and in no other way.' The right which a coparcener has, being a right by birth, it is impossible to say that it is not a vested right. It is Apratibandha Daya according to Mitakshara concept. That interest, though fluctuating, — and in some jurisdictions inalienable, — is itself property. It is on that footing that its attachability and saleability in execution has been laid down by the Privy Council in 'Deendayal Lal v. Jugdeep Narain', 3 Cal 198. Though the interest, at any point of time before partition, is not predictable in terms of an arithmetical share, owing to the very constitution of a coparcenary, that very constitution determines and defines the interest. The interest besides being property before partition is such that it entitles the coparcener to a well-defined share in the family property or the partition according to definite rules based on predetermined facts of which the most important are:

(1) In the distribution the three lineal male descendants have a right of representation.

(2) The distribution is between male members only but per stirpes and not per capita (apart from mother, etc., who get shares in lieu of maintenance.)

(See Mulla's Hindu Law, p. 403, para. 321.)

The interest, therefore, of a coparcener, while it cannot be measured in terms of any arithmetical share before partition, is still one which is definite and definable in terms of the class of membership of the joint family corporation.

(30) The above being the nature of a coparcener's interest in the joint family property, the question for consideration is whether the rights of the surviving coparceners can be said 'not' to be adversely affected by introducing the widow of a predeceased coparcener as a sharer in the joint family property. If, as I have attempted to explain above, the interest of a coparcener is, from the moment of his birth, a vested interest carrying with it the right to a share on partition only between the members of a close corporation determined in accordance with prescribed rules of law, it seems to be ununderstandable to say that the coparcener's rights are not adversely affected by the introduction of a sharer not falling within these rules. The case in 'Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, Ltd., (1900) 1 Ch 656 at p. 673, shows that in the case of a company, existing rights founded and dependant on 'alterable' articles can be affected by their alteration, so as to have retrospective operation. This decision, therefore, clearly implies that if the articles on which the rights are founded are not by the constitution of the company alterable, they can only be so altered by retrospective legislation. If, therefore, the rights of a coparcener in a coparcenary depend on the Mitakshara text of the equal right of the son by birth in the ancestral property of the father, such rights are unalterable in the usual way to affect past situations. They can only be affected by an Act with retrospective operation, if the interference with the rights is to be on account of an event prior to the Act. Of course, if the event is subsequent to the Act, vested rights are necessarily affected thereby, because that is the very purpose and intendment of any such prospective legislation.

(31) The arguments above noticed to the effect that the death of the widow's husband does not result in vesting his interest in the other coparceners or the introduction of widow as a sharer on her husband's death does not adversely affect any vested interest of coparceners, lay too much stress on the unpredictable nature of a coparcener's arithmetical share on partition. But that is not the sole criterion of a coparcener's interest. His is a vested interest. It is no doubt fluctuating in one sense. But the fluctuation is not erratic. It is determined by well-defined rules which flow from the very concept of a Mitakshara coparcenary and constitute the essential criteria of a coparcenary interest. It seems to me therefore, with great respect, well nigh impossible to say that the introduction of the widow as a co-sharer does not adversely affect the coparcener's vested interest. There may have been some plausible argument if the widow was not introduced not as a mere co-sharer but as a coparcener. Then at least in some contingencies, i.e., on death of widow each coparcener may get the benefit of an augmented share. But as already pointed out her death cannot 'prima facie' benefit the other sharers. Hence her introduction as co-sharer must in every case have the inevitable result of reducing the share which each coparcener would otherwise have had.

(32) It has been suggested that the widow of a coparcener is a member of the joint family and is, in any case, entitled to maintenance and that the right of the coparceners to admit only the male descendants of a common ancestor to a share in the property at the time of the partition amounts to no more than a privilege to exclude the female members from any share in the property and that therefore admitting such female members to a share in the family property cannot be said to have an adverse effect on the rights of the coparceners as such and the case in (1896), A. C. 240, has been relied on. My Lord has also said that one coparcener obtaining a benefit by survivorship on the death of another is a privilege. I confess with respect my inability to appreciate these views. The distinction between the alleged right in (1896) A. C., 240, and that in the present case is obvious from the facts in the former. As pointed out already it is of the essence of a coparcenary, as a corporation owning joint family property, that it is confined to the male descendants of a common ancestor and that it lapses on his death. The female members do not come into the picture at all according to that concept excepting for purposes of maintenance. The only exceptions are the mother, grandmother and the like and the unmarried daughter, who get on partition certain specified shares, but it is settled that they get these shares in lieu of maintenance and not by virtue of any pre-existing right in the property. See AIR (23) 1936 P C 20. Even this right of sharing has itself become obsolete in certain jurisdictions such as in Madras. It is to be noticed in this connection that the effect of the Act is not merely to introduce the widowed mother as a sharer but the widows of all other predeceased coparceners, both ascendant and descendant, as co-sharers. This is entirely beyond anything that even the ancient Hindu Law contemplated.

(33) Further, it should be noticed that it is not merely the quantum of the share on a future partition that is adversely affected by the introduction of the widows of predeceased coparceners, but that the interests of the coparceners are affected by the Act in various other ways also. In the first place, the share allotted to the coparcener's widow under the Act is 'prima facie' taken altogether out of the joint property, as such, and does not revert back to the family on her death, unlike for instance, as in the case of a share allotted to a mother under the pre-existing law — See 'Debi Mangal Prosad v. Mahadeo Prasad', 34 All. 234. This follows from the provision that the widow takes her interest as a Hindu Woman's estate which, appear to mean, that on her death, it goes to the heirs of the separate property of her husband. There is no direct decision on this specific point, but it may be noticed that the same view has been expressed by Justice Viswanath Sastri of Madras High Court in A I R (37) 1950 Mad. 538, at p. 540. Secondly, under the pre-existing law relating to the allotment of a share to the mother, the mother was not entitled to demand partition, but could only get a share on partition — See A I R (23) 1936 P C 20. Under the Act, however, the widow is given the right to demand partition by virtue of the interest that she gets. It is clear therefore that she is entitled to compel partition even though all the other coparceners are united in not requiring a partition. Then, again, before partition, the coparceners can, as between themselves jointly, alienate any specific item of joint family property but on the introduction of the widow as a co-sharer they cannot do so unless she also consents to the same. Further, while, according to the law prevailing in jurisdictions other than Madras and Bombay, no coparcener can alienate his interest by private sale for consideration, the widow who gets the deceased coparcener's interest under the Act can alienate her interest without reference to the others introducing thereby complications in the management of the joint family property against the will of the other coparceners. These and other ways in which the interest of the coparceners as a group, and of individual coparceners as comprising that group, are adversely affected, in the sense that new disabilities or fetters are attached to the joint holding of the property by coparceners as a group can be multiplied. It seems to me, therefore, that it is not merely the quantum of the coparceners' share that is affected adversely but also their rights in several other respects; and it is not permissible to whittle down the effect on the coparcenary of the introduction of the widow as a co-sharer of the joint family property by assuming the coparcener's share to be an inchoate and indistinct privilege, and the other rights as having relation to sentimental objections to the deprivation of privileges.

(34) Let us now consider what would be the position, if, after the death of the widow's husband and before the Act, there have been partitions. In the normal case of the post-Act widow she can undoubtedly reopen partitions made behind her back after her husband's death. But it has been suggested that a pre-Act widow cannot so reopen prior partitions because the Act is not retrospective. That, to my mind, is begging the question. To say that the pre-Act widow gets an interest, only to the extent that there has been no previous partition or previous alienation of the family property and cannot therefore reopen them is, as already pointed out, to introduce limitations on the right which are not to be found in the Act itself. Let us also consider the case of an alienation of an individual coparcener's interest, after the husband's death and prior to the Act, the alienation being either of the coparcener's interest in the entire family property or in a specific item thereof. Such alienation can be inter vivos in Madras and Bombay and in invitum elsewhere but the considerations are the same. Suppose the alienee has worked out his interest, before the Act, by a partition, but the coparceners remain joint; the coparceners are put to a double loss, once by the alienation which must have been worked out on the footing that the widow's husband does not count and later by introduction of the widow as a co-sharer treating her husband as continuing for the purpose. Take again the case where the alienee did not happen to work out his rights until the Act. How are the widow's rights to be adjusted? Consonantly to the assumption that the widow gets her husband's interest, if the property remains without partition till the Act it must be taken that the alienee will have to get the share as affected by the emergence of the widow as a co-sharer. This is definitely affecting adversely the vested interest of such an alienee — at least as understood in Madras — See 'Chinnu Pillai v. Kalimuthu', 35 Mad. 47, which I pointed in my earlier judgment. I think the same is the position of execution sale purchasers in other jurisdictions. Again take a case, where the widow herself has entered into some arrangements with her coparceners for her life in lieu of maintenance, before the Act. Does the Act entitle her to repudiate and reopen the arrangement? To these and other complications that must arise in respect of arrangements prior to the Act as a result of the view sought to be urged in favour of the pre-Act widow, I could find no answer in the course of the arguments except the evasive one that those cases do not arise for decision in the present case and may have to be dealt with when they arise and that each such case must be decided on its own facts virtually implying that the Court must arrogate to itself 'ad hoc' legislative function for each case. But in my view a tentative and 'prima facie' consideration of these complications is necessary for arriving at a proper conclusion in this case and without going into further elaboration it is enough to say that I am inclined to think that the view urged will have the effect of adversely affecting rights vested by previous transactions.

(35) I am, therefore, quite clear in my mind that the introduction of a widow of a deceased coparcener as a sharer in the joint family property has the definite result of adversely affecting in general the interests of the coparcenary as a whole, as well as of the individual coparceners in the property and of strangers in certain events and that the Act cannot be construed as comprising within its scope the view of a coparcener who died before the commencement of the Act, unless it can be definitely held to be retrospective in the operation which it is admitted it is not. It appears to me therefore with the greatest respect to my learned colleagues that from the unequivocal wording of sub-section (2) and (3) of Section 3 indicating that the widow's right accrues by devolution at the very moment of her husband's death and from the nature of a coparcener's interest as being a vested right by birth defined and determinable according to the prescribed rules of Mitakshara system which must be affected by the introduction of a widow as a co-sharer. the result inescapably follows that the Act cannot apply to the case of a widow whose husband died prior to the Act.

(36) This without more should be enough for supporting my conclusion. But out of respect, for other arguments advanced, I shall proceed to notice the same.

(37) In the course of the argument, the case in 'Queen v. St. Mary's Whitechapel, (1848) 116 E R 811 and in 'The Queen v. Birwistle', (1889) 58 L J M C 158 (See also 'Jogadanund Singh v. Amritalal', 22 Cal 767 at pp. 779-780) has been relied on in support of the position that a statute is not retrospective merely because a part of the requisites of its action is drawn from a time antecedent to its passing. I am not at all sure that the principle of such cases is not confined to what may be called mere remedial rights and whether they can be extended to statutes relating to substantive property rights. On a careful perusal of these decisions, however, it will be seen that they have no application to the situation of this case. It is necessary to notice that, on the facts of the case in (1848) 116 E R 811, it was pointed out in the report itself, that the statute in its direct operation was prospective since it relates only to future removals and that only 'a part' of the requisites for such action is drawn from a time antecedent to the passing of the Act. In that case the requisites for the operation of the power of removal under the statute consisted of two facts (1) widowhood as indicated therein and (2) continuance of widowhood for 12 months thereafter. The right of removal of pauper widows from the parish by the authorities can, in no sense, be considered a vested right at any rate, it is not a vested property right. It is also necessary to emphasise that the significance of the word "part" in the relevant passage in that report cannot be missed or blurred over. The reason is that, in such cases, the totality of the requisites becomes complete only after the Act, and hence the right itself accrues after the Act. Similarly in (1889) 58 L.J., M.C., 158, the accrual of the right conferred depended on desertion plus continuance thereof until after the Act. In the case 22 Cal. 767, also it will appear from the facts that the principle in (1848) 116 E R 811, was applied since only a part of the requisites for the operation of the statute was prior to the Act, viz., the passing of the decree in the case — See pp. 779-780. In the case before us the 'only' requisite for the 'accrual of' the right under the Act is the single fact of the death of the husband owning an interest in joint family property. Therefore, if the Act is to be applied to the case of the widow of a husband who died before the Act, both the requisites for the operation, and the operation itself, are antecedent to the Act, and hence retrospective and there is no scope for a prospective operation on such facts. There may have been some possible room for argument — based on the principle of the above cited case — only if it could be deduced from the language of the Act that the accrual of the right — though partly dependent on the death of the husband — is, in some way at least, directly connected with and dependent on the factum of a partition taking place subsequent to the passing of the Act. But, as I have already stated before, there is no room for any such construction, and no such construction has been attempted to be argued. I may add that in this connection the cases under Hindu Law of Inheritance Amendment Act (II (2) of 1929) have been pressed into service in which I can find no analogy.

(38) Another rule of construction has been pressed into service, based on a passage in Halsbury, Second Edition, Vol. 31, page 572, namely, that a statute is to be regarded as "always-speaking." But this, I apprehend, does not mean that the statute is to be construed as operative with reference to the past as much as with reference to the present and the future: it only means that, with reference to any particular case that falls within the scope of the wording of the statute, the statute must be taken to be speaking with reference thereto — and it is not to be regarded as a rule of guidance as to the retrospective or prospective operation of the statute. It seems to mean what Lord Esher has pointed out in (1894) 1 Q B 725 at p. 735, viz.:

"That when the present tense is used, the time to be considered is the time at which the Court has to act."

On the other hand, the principle applicable to such cases has been clearly laid down by Lord Justice Lopes in the same case at p. 737 as follows:

"It is a well-recognised principle in the construction of statutes that they operate only on cases and facts which come into existence after the statutes are passed unless a retrospective effect is clearly intended. This principle of construction is specially applicable when the enactment to which retrospective effect is sought to be given would prejudicially affected vested rights."

This very principle has been referred to by Justice Varadachariar in A I R (32) 1945 F C 25 at p. 33, in the following terms:

"The Act is 'prima facie' prospective and its proper construction and operation must be determined with reference to conditions and contingencies likely to arise, after its commencement, because these alone could presumably have been within its contemplation."

The same principle of construction has also been adopted in a Full Bench case of the Patna High Court relating to the Inheritance Amendment Act 1929 — See 'Bhagwat Narain v. Srinavas', A I R (24) 1937 Pat. 113, at p. 121, and also by Chief Justice Sir Courtney Terrell in 'Punyabrata Das v. Monmohan Ray', A I R (21) 1934 Pat. 427 at p. 430, when he construed the words "who marries" occurring in the Special Marriages (Amendment) Act XXX (30) of 1923 as synonymous with "who shall marry hereafter."

(39) I shall now turn to the sections of the Act other than Section 3 and the implications thereof. In my judgment in the Division Bench I came to the conclusion — on a consideration also of Sections 2, 4 and 5 of the Act, 1937, as amended by the Act of 1938 — and having regard to the history of the amendment — that the Legislature had clearly intended that the Act ought not to be applied to the case of a widow of a coparcener who died prior to the passing of the Act. My Lord the Chief Justice and my learned brother Justice Narasimham have however — on a consideration of these very sections — come to a different conclusion. I do not propose to go into the matter any further except to make the following observations My learned brothers point out that, in the view I take of Sections 2, 4 and 5, the use of the phrase "dying intestate" appearing in Section 2, as applied to the case of a coparcener in respect of his joint family interest, will not be in consonance with accepted legal notions of testacy and intestacy and is — to say the least — bad English if not also bad law. They further point out that the word "intestate" occurring in Sub-section (2) of Section 3 of the Act, as it stood in 1837, was omitted in the Amendment of 1938 and that having regard to that circumstance Section 4 would be absolutely redundant if it was not meant to imply and convey that Section 3 (2) is to apply to a death prior to the Act. While I do not deny the force of this criticism, I would with respect point out that, if the contrary view is taken of Sections 2, 4 and 5 as my learned brothers have done, one is obliged to say — as indeed Justice Narasimham has done — that Section 2 is redundant and the word "intestate" therein should in any case be deleted. As between the two views of the construction of Sections 2, 4 and 5, viz., that which renders Section 4 redundant and that which renders Section 2 otiose, I would, with respect, submit that the former is definitely preferable, having regard to the history of the Act which shows that originally Section 4 must have applied to both Sections 3 (1) and 3 (2). I may also add that the redundancy of Section 2 is not so obvious to me as it appears to my learned brother Justice Narasimham. In the absence of Section 2, it may be — as pointed out by him though I am not sure about it, that Section 3 might prevail even as against a relevant rule of Hindu Law or custom to the contrary; but it would prevail only as against such a rule relating to inheritance or devolution, i.e., a rule designating the person who is to take the property of the deceased person as his successor and as against nothing else. It appears to me, however, that Section 2 is intended to provide for — and in fact has — a much larger content than that; it seems to me to be intended to provide, for instance, that the devolution is to take effect notwithstanding that such devolution may bring about certain anomalies in the application of the law relating to coparceneries or interfere with vested rights of coparceners and notwithstanding that it results in the curious position of a coparcener and a non-coparcener sharing together joint family property— a position hitherto unknown. This I have mentioned only to show one of the many possible contingencies to which Section 2 might apply which may require to be specifically provided for statutorily. It may also be pointed out that the section has in fact also been construed to bring about the result that a widow would obtain her rights under the Act, irrespective of the disqualifications imposed under the normal law consequent on the unchastity of the widow at the time when succession opens — See 'Akoba Laxman v. Sai Genu Laxman', A I R (28) 1941 Bom 204. In the absence of Section 2, as already stated, the rules in Section 3 might prevail as against other competing rules governing devolution of the property in question, but they cannot prevail over the rules which may affect but do not directly relate to devolution or succession such as the rules governing disqualifications on such devolution. I am, therefore, not prepared to agree with a view which involves such an important section as Section 2 being rendered otiose and which in any case requires the deletion of the word "intestate" therefrom.

(40) In the view that I have taken of Sections 2, 4 and 5 there is no doubt some inappropriateness in referring to a coparcener — who dies leaving only an interest in joint family property, as a person "dying intestate." But having regard to the specific definition of the phrase "dying intestate" in Section 5, it appears to me that there is nothing so very incongruous in relying on the literal meaning and in referring to a person — who may not make a will in respect of property over which he has no testamentary capacity — as a person "dying intestate" in respect of that particular property, for the simple reason that even if such a will is made it cannot take effect.

(41) Nor am I impressed by the argument that the use of the word "property" in Section 5 renders it inapplicable to an "interest" because, in terms, the Act itself, as its preamble shows, gives better rights to women in respect not only of property but also interest, — See Sub-section (2) of Sec. 3.

(42) If the matter rested merely on the view that is to be taken of the construction of Sections 2, 4 and 5, I might have hesitated, in view of the admittedly bad drafting of the Act, to differ from the view taken thereof by my learned brothers. But it appears to me that quite irrespective of the construction to be put on these sections the plain meaning of Sub-sections (2) and (3) of Section 3 of the Act is clear and decisive against the construction that has appealed to them. To say the least there is nothing in these sections to override the plain meaning of Sub-sections (2) and (3) of Section 3, except the supposed negative implication of Section 4 which is found to be unwarranted if one has regard to the unamended Act in 1937 and the history of 1938 amendment.

(43) It has been strenuously pressed on us that the Act is a remedial measure and must be construed benevolently and that the test to be applied in construing a remedial Act is not merely whether a particular construction thereof is the normal meaning of the language used, but that the question is whether the language is sufficiently wide to admit of a construction which brings in all members of the class who are intended to be benefited by it. While I have no quarrel with this proposition, I must point out that even in the case of a remedial statute it is the language of the statute that must govern and there is no warrant for any construction which cannot reasonably be deduced from a fair construction of the Act. The Act is merely one "to give better rights to women" as the preamble shows. But it is not clear what particular class of women are intended to be benefited thereby. It cannot even be maintained that at least all widows are intended to be benefited, thereby. Indeed the contrary can be demonstrated, viz., that certain women who were entitled to rights under the pre-existing law are deprived of their rights. For instance, the mother or daughter of a widower (male) having self-acquired property who leaves him surviving no male issue but a widowed daughter-in-law is excluded by the said daughter-in-law by virtue of Section 3, Sub-section (1). Therefore the Act helps only some women who are widows and not all women or all widows. It may, therefore, well be that the Act intended to help only future widows of joint families and was anxious not to disturb the domestic equilibrium of joint families, into which or outside which, widows must have settled themselves under the pre-existing law. It may also well be that the Legislature was more anxious about the fate of future widows of joint families who are an ever-present class in the present conditions of Hindu society rather than about past widows of such families whose number, in any case, must be definite and gradually dwindling and who must disappear altogether by mere lapse of time.

(44) In my previous judgment, I have relied on the judgment of the Federal Court in A I R (32) 1945 F C 25, as amounting to an implied decision that Sub-section (2) of Section 3 does not apply to the case of the widow of a coparcener who died before the Act. My Lord the Chief Justice is inclined to think that in that particular case the widow was not given a share in the interest of the husband who died prior to the Act, not because the Act was not applicable to such a case, but because the death of the widow's husband left the entire family property in the hands of the sole surviving coparcener and the question of the widow's interest arose only on the death of that coparcener after the commencement of the Act. With great respect, I am unable to see how that makes any difference. My Lord has observed as follows in his previous judgment:

"On the facts of that case, the joint family property had become vested in one owner before the Act commenced. It having become the absolute and exclusive property of Arunachala, the last male-holder, to hold her as entitled to inherit would amount to reopening a transaction or consideration already vested."

With great respect, this view of the nature of the interest that Arunachala took ignores the very decision of the Federal Court which, in terms, decided that what Arunachala held as the sole surviving coparcener was not his absolute property but was an interest in joint family property liable to be effected by posthumous adoption to a deceased collateral and that, therefore, Sub-section (1) of Section 3 was not applicable. In the view of the Federal Court

"the difference between the position of a person owning self-acquired property and that a person who happens to be the holder of property as the sole surviving coparcener for the time being, is shown by the fact that in the latter case his right as full owner will be reduced to that of a coparcener the moment adoption is made by a predeceased coparcener's widow" — See A I R (32) 1945 F C 25, at p. 33."

In the words of the Judicial Committee in 70 Ind App 232

"this possibly challenges the character of a surviving coparcener's right as an absolute right' and creates qualifications which impair its completeness."

If, as my Lord is prepared to think, the result of the Act is to clothe the widow with the right of representation to the interest of her husband, there is absolutely no reason why even the sole surviving coparcener's interest in the joint family property cannot be divested in her favour in the same way as it could have been in favour of a son adopted by her. It appears to me that the fact of the matter is that the widow does not represent the husband except in a very loose sense and that the property is not so absolutely vested in the sole surviving coparcener as to furnish the reason for the assumed decision of the Federal Court that the widow in that case was not entitled to succeed to her husband's interest in the joint family property. I must, therefore, respectfully disagree with the view that the decision in A I R

(32) 1945 F C 25, is not a decision on the very question at issue in the case now before us. In my view the earlier passage in the report, viz.,

"It is true that on the above view the plaintiff in the present case will derive no benefit from the Act though she happens to be the widow of a predeceased son, but that is due to the circumstance that her husband died before the passing of the Act.

appears to me to be the expression of the unequivocal opinion of the Federal Court and I can see nothing in the use of the word "prima facie", in the later passage, viz.,

"the possibility of such varying consequences cannot be allowed to control the natural and reasonable interpretation of the Act; it is 'prima facie' prospective etc."

as militating against the view expressed in the earlier passage which is a definite and decisive opinion on the point. The use of the word "prima facie" indicates only that no reason for a contrary interpretation appeared from the Act; and it is only a Judge's cautious way of stating his conclusion on a matter which was taken for granted without argument. The fact that the widow was not given a share in her pre-deceased husband's interest in the joint family in that case is indisputable and the reason for it has been stated by the Federal Court itself in the first passage quoted above. There can, therefore, be no reasonable doubt that there was a clear, though assumed, decision that the Act was inapplicable to her case and 'that it was given effect to in refusing her a share.' All that can be said is that the point of law itself was not specifically raised before the Federal Court and debated. But that must be so because the eminent counsel who appeared for the widow in that case felt the position to be unarguable. I would, therefore, with respect, follow the above implied decision of the Federal Court as I understand it — on the very question as in this case. I can find no reason to think that any of the arguments now relied upon for the contrary view would have escaped notice if found tenable.

(45) To sum up, my view is, that the meaning of the relevant provisions of the Act is clear and does not admit of the suggested benevolent construction. Sub-sections (2) and (3) of S. 3, show that the widow's interest accrues by devolution at the moment of husband's death and such devolution adversely affects the rights of each coparcener vested in him from the moment of his birth, defined and determined with reference to fixed Hindu Law Rules and may also have the effect of adversely affecting past transactions. The machinery in the Act provided for benefiting Mitakshara joint family widows is not by a mere declaration vesting in all such widows the interest of their deceased husband from and after the passing of the Act and therefore in effect, providing for a grant of that interest to them, taking it out of the common pool of the joint family property, but it is by way of devolution of that interest from the husband to the widow. The widow while introduced as a sharer of the family property, is not made a statutory grantee, but a statutory heir, of the coparcenary interest therein of her husband. It is, therefore, impossible to extend the benefit of the Act to a pre-Act widow except by giving the Act retrospective operation. The principle of prospective operation of rights founded partly on past events is inapplicable to the present case in view of the nature of the interest created in favour of the widow by the Act. Such authority as there is in A I R (32) 1945 F C 25, is in support of the conclusion that the Act does not apply to pre-Act widows to give them a right in joint family property.

(46) I cannot help pointing out that the law has been understood in the sense in which I understand it since the date of its passing in 1937. (See also 'Ram Bilas Singh v. Loke Nath', A I R (36) 1949, Pat. 405 at p. 408), and that the opposite view will have the consequence of reopening at least the transactions and partitions between 1937 and 1951, of families who have pre-Act widows, if not transactions prior to the Act, except probably to the limited extent of transactions relating to agricultural lands between 1937 and 1944, vide S. 2 of Orissa Act V of 1944. It will have the unfortunate effect of disturbing the domestic equilibrium of such families and will lead to disastrous and speculative litigation. These considerations can of course have no bearing if the statutory provisions are clear in favour of such widows. But the contrary is the position in this case so far as I can see, and what all is said for the other view, is not that the language is compelling, but is wide enough. I can only close with a passage from Lord Brougham delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee in 'Crawford v. Spooner', 4 Moo Ind App 179, as follows:

"The construction of the Act must be taken from the bare words of the Act. We cannot fish out what possibly may have been the intention of the Legislature; we cannot aid the Legislature's defective phrasing of the Statute; we cannot add, and mend, and, by construction, make up deficiencies which are left there. If the Legislature did intend that which it has not expressed clearly: much more, if the Legislature intended something very different; if the Legislature intended something pretty nearly the opposite of what is said, it is not for Judges to invent something which they do not meet with in the words of the text (aiding their construction of the text always, of course, by the context); it is not for them so to supply a meaning, for, in reality, it would be supplying it: the true way in these cases is, to take the words as the Legislature has given them, and to take the meaning which the words given naturally imply, unless where the construction of those words is, either by the preamble or by the context of the words in question, controlled or altered; and therefore, if any other meaning was intended than that which the words purport plainly to import, then let another Act supply that meaning, and supply the defect in the previous Act."

(47) RAY C. J.: I have had the opportunity of reading the judgments prepared by my learned brothers Das and Narasimham, JJ., I am in entire agreement with Narasimham, J., and for the reasons expounded by him. I would hold along with him that there is nothing in the language of the Act which compels one to hold that women widowed prior to the Act are not intended to be benefited by its provisions. The Act is intituled as an Act to amend the Hindu Law governing Hindu Women's Right to Property. The scope and object, except what appear from the preamble, are sought to be succinctly epitomised in Section 2 of the Act. It reads:

"Notwithstanding any rule of Hindu Law or custom to the contrary, the provisions of Section 3 (the only operative section) shall apply where a Hindu dies intestate."

In its operation, the section is not intended to repeal the Hindu Law but to amend it to an extent specified in the following section of the Act. The changes thus introduced, either in the rules of inheritance or survivorship are to be understood in the context of Hindu Law of Succession, in general, and the system of coparcenary, in particular, interfering with the pre-existing system as little as cannot be avoided. In the case of 'Secretary of State v. Bank of India, Ltd.', 65 Ind App 286 at p. 298), Lord Wright lays down:

"A statute is 'prima facie' to be construed as changing the law to no greater extent than its words or necessary intendment require."

The learned author (S. Srinivas Iyengar) of Mayne's treatise on Hindu Law and Usage, 10th Edn., observes at p. 716:

"Where the provisions of the Act are clear, effect of course must be given to them. But the legislature may well be presumed to have left Hindu law unaltered in other respects."

Pre-eminently therefore, the words, phrases and their connotations should be interpreted and evolved in conformity with the notions and concepts of Hindu Law. There are many instances occurring in the Hindu Law which, tested in the light of general juristic principles that prevail in the jurisprudence of most of the civilised countries and which constitute the basic spring-board for the various legislations undertaken by the British Government up-to-date, may appear anomalous; but to one conversant with the particular features of social and socio-economical framework of the society of Hindus, their concepts of family properties of various kinds, their modes of holding, devolution, disposal, suspension, re-animation and various other kinds of incidents and rights, privileges, obligation and liabilities incidental thereto, those instances will appear nothing but naturally and justly, though not logically, flowing from such principles of justice as are inextricably inherent in such conditions and features of the social framework of the Hindu society. We, therefore, in interpreting the statute, should not run away from such peculiarities or peculiar concepts inseparable from Hindu Law. Reference may be made to a few such instances. Take the case of an impartible estate. The holder thereof is designated by survivorship and the estate, whenever any occasion for it arises, devolves by rule of survivorship; but almost all the normal rights and privileges of a coparcener remain in suspension all the while, the single holder is alive— 'Baijnath Prashed Singh v. Tej Bali Singh', 48 Ind App 195. Though it appears unjust and, at the same time, illogical in view of its being coparcenary property in which all the coparceners ought to have equal interest, the solitary holder has not only the exclusive dominion but also the full power of disposal except in Madras Presidency (State of Madras) where the Hindu Law has been, in this respect, amended by the statutory law of the Impartible Estates Act. No coparcener of such a family has a right of claiming partition. This is against all logical canons of inductions and deductions applicable to the coparcenary system. Still, the system has been obtaining and working from time immemorial till the modern individualistic age of equality of men and their rights and status. Take the instance of a widow of a coparcener. She has a charge for maintenance against the coparcenary property to the extent of her deceased husband's interest therein though her husband left no such interest behind him. His interest on his death simply became extinct or lapsed. No other coparcener, who survived him, can be said to have derived any interest from him. The said interest is neither identifiable nor definable so as to be proceeded against by his creditors except under an attachment effected while he was alive. This position does not conform to strict logic. Compare, the position of a widow, as a dependant and mere maintenance-holder, is abruptly converted by a process of renovation, as it were, from a sort of suspended animation to that of a sharer when the sons and grandsons, etc., of her late husband effect a partition of the coparcenary estate in which her husband had an interest at the time of his death. Is this justifiable by application of logical deduction or induction? Had it been so, the widow would be entitled to the same right of a share at the partition of the coparcenary properties between the collaterals of her husband who left no issue of his own amongst his survivors — coparceners. This was, in fact, an anomaly of Hindu Law, and it is now removed by the Act. The result is that while a partition of the joint family property shall take place as between the coparceners, be they her husband's lineal descendants or collaterals, she shall be entitled to a share representing that of her husband. This remedies the standing deficiency in Hindu Law. If you hold that the right to maintenance is such an interest in the joint family property that its normal mode of enforcement or realisation is a share at the partition of the property, then the Act does not introduce any change in the law. But it cannot be so held. Right to maintenance is an interest in the family property but is not equivalent to a right to a share. It was just by way of compromise that she was given a share at a partition between her husband's sons, that is, her sons and step-sons and their sons, etc. Search for the logic as to why the same right was not acceded to her as against her husband's collaterals and why she was not given the right to claim partition on her own initiative and you do not find any except that the society's economy stood in need of co-operation and conjoint labour of the members of the family ,and occasioned the setting up of the corporate body of a coparcenary. The body was the personal unit and the properties owned by it were the estate units. The unit character was rigorously maintained under the managership of one head — an autocrat. No female was endowed with the power to disrupt it so long as the males did not desire to do. Minor males also were allowed no right to call for a partition except on special circumstances affecting them prejudicially in relation to their interests. The distinction between the existence of a widow's right to share against her husband's descendants and its negation as against the collaterals, in similar circumstances, is understandable on the hypothesis of the theory that till now obtains that a collateral does not represent another deceased collateral as he derives no interest from him on his demise. He on partition represents his ancestor, however high, who had once an interest in the coparcenary. The strict logical deduction resulted in an unequal treatment to a widow whose husband had left no issue. Here is an instance, where logic would work out an injustice. This is now removed by introducing an exception to this logical deduction by way of compromise. Now under the Act, the widow is given a share, on partition, of the property in which her husband had an interest as a coparcener. This is to be worked out in keeping with the family unit, both in relation to person and property. Naturally, if there is any apparent anomaly, viewed as a compromise, it is not so in reality. After a right to share is conceded, it is but natural that the remedy for the enforcement of such right shall be provided as in Sub-section (3) of Section 3 of the Act. A disqualified heir has no right to succession; but in a joint family if a son is born to him, he becomes a coparcener. An invalidly adopted son acquires a right to maintenance in the adopter's family. Hindu Law is the cumulative result of checks and balances and various compromises. Any patch repair by piecemeal statutory amendments is bound to give rise to various doubts and difficulties. But this repair work is not intended to alter the character of the structure but to maintain it notwithstanding. The interpretation of the Act shall be approached in that background.

(48) With regard to the language of the statute, under review, I do not intend to speak more than what I have already said in my judgment in the Division Bench, rather the referring judgment, and what has been said by my learned brother Narasimham, J. The key sections of the Act, for the present purpose, are Sections 2 and 4. Section 2 defines the ambit of operation of Section 3, and Section 4 prescribes the exception, or is inserted by way of a proviso to it. If we concede to the view taken by Das, J., both the sections should appear to be conterminous and co-extensive. It would mean as if the Legislature was needlessly redundant in defining the same rule twice over. Section 2 defines that the Act shall apply to the properties of a Hindu dying intestate. Section 4 says that the Act shall not apply to the property of Hindu dying intestate before the commencement of the Act. According to brother Das, J., an equivalent reading of Section 2 should as well be

"Notwithstanding any rule of Hindu law or custom to the contrary, the provisions of Section 3 shall apply where a Hindu dies intestate 'after the commencement of the Act."

The Legislature shall then be deemed to have said that same thing both affirmatively and negatively. Nothing could have simpler for the Legislature than to enact Section 2 as

"Notwithstanding any rule of Hindu Law or custom to the contrary, the provisions of Section 3 shall apply where Hindu dies intestate after the commencement of the Act."

This would completely obviate the necessity of enacting Section 4 at all.

The only explanation why Section 4 was there notwithstanding Section 2, is that Section 2 makes the Act applicable to cases of deaths of Hindus occurring either before or after the Act and Section 4 emphasises the same by excepting, from the general rule of applicability prescribed in Section 2, the cases specified therein, namely, the cases where a Hindu leaves separate exclusive properties of his own which he could have disposed of by valid testamentary disposition, but had failed to do so, and which would descend on his death to his heirs as distinguished from survivors, by rules of inheritance, the Act having introduced some new heirs into the pre-existing list of heirs under Hindu Law, as it then stood.

(49) Furthermore, a distinction between the property of a deceased Hindu, and the interest that he had at the time of his death in a Hindu joint family property has been laboriously maintained in the Act, wherever it is relevant to the purpose, particularly in Sub-sections (1) and (2) of Section 3. True, that the word 'interest' is of greater comprehension than 'property.' In some circumstances, notion of property may be expressed by the word 'interest.' The altered rule of succession provided for in Sub-section (1) deals with a deceased intestate Hindu's property. Here 'property' is interest in movables and immovables, corporeal or incorporeal rights and hereditaments in such properties over which he has, 'at all material times, during his life', the complete power of disposition while "the interest" dealt with in Sub-section (2) conveys quite a different conception of property. For the sake of perspicuity and clear visualisation of the differences as to the incidence of the newly introduced rule into the Hindu Law of succession, the Legislature has been particularly careful to maintain the two different phraseologies. In Sub-section (3), the word 'interest' has been used in the more comprehensive sense of including both what is 'interest' within the meaning of Sub-section (2) and what is 'property' within the meaning of Sub-section (1) of the section. A peep into the significance of the word 'interest' in the eyes of a great lawyer like Sir George Rankin may throw some light on the discussion. His Lordship in the case of 'Kalyanji Vithaldas v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal' 64 Ind App 28 at p. 37, observed:

"Does then the existence of a wife, or of a wife and daughter, make it income of a Hindu undivided family rather than income of the individual partner? Their Lordships think not. A man's wife and daughter are entitled to be maintained by him out of his separate property as well as out of property in which he has a coparcenary interest, but the mere existence of a wife or daughter does not make ancestral property joint. 'Interest' is a word of wide and vague significance and no doubt it might be used of a wife's or daughter's right to be maintained, which right accrues in the daughter's case on birth; but if the father's obligations are increased, his ownership is not divested, dived or impaired by marriage or the birth of a daughter. This is equally true of ancestral property belonging to himself alone as of self-acquired property."

No interest of a coparcener in coparcenary property can be said to be such of his property as he can leave behind him to be inherited or otherwise disposed of, except on partition after dissolution of the corporation of a coparcenary and division of the unit of its estate. Until separation in estate, no fragment of it can be called property of an individual in the fullest sense of the term.

(50) Coming to Section 4, we find that the Legislature confined its operation to the property of any Hindu dying intestate. Mark the singularity of the sameness of language in this section with that in Sub-section (1) of Section 3. That Sub-section deals with intestate deceased Hindu's property governed by Dayabhag School and the separate property left by him, on his death, in any other School of Hindu Law or customary law. One cannot shut his eyes to this remarkable identity of expression. It cannot be without a significance and meaning. While dealing with an interest in Sub-section (2), the Legislature gave preference to the words "having at the time of death" rather than 'leaving' used in Sub-section (1). This is because, the Mitakshara coparcener dying leaves nothing behind. Thus, for the purpose of succession or inheritance and various other purposes cognate thereto, and in relation to his testamentary or non-testamentary disposition, no Hindu coparcener can predicate of himself of having such property in the coparcenary estate as he could leave on his death. No doubt, he cannot be said to be propertyless when he is a member of the coparcenary owning coparcenary properties. This conceptual difference between property of a Hindu and his interest in the joint family property having been laboriously maintained by the Legislature in phrasing the Act, all the implications of the Act inconsistent with or repugnant to the said distinction, which is fundamental and basic, must have to be ruled out. In this context, the contention that, for the purpose of attachment and sale by a creditor, a Hindu coparcener has property seems to me to be wholly beside the point. In this background, the language of Section 4 negatives any assumption that "the interest of a Hindu", irrespective of his being testate or intestate or otherwise, in the coparcenary property is included within the words "the property of any Hindu dying intestate before the commencement of this Act." Therefore, it is clear that Section 4 is an exception to Section 2 and, in that sense, does not limit the operation of Sub-section (2) of Section 3 to cases of women widowed subsequent to the Act. The word 'intestate' in Section 2 is no doubt 'extra' as pointed out by the learned author of the 10th Edition of Mayne's Hindu Law. I would quote a passage from the learned author's exposition at p. 716.

"As the Act stands, on a strict construction, Sub-section (2) to Section 3 can apply only when under Section 2 a Hindu dies intestate, especially as those words are not required in connection with Section 3 (1), being already there. If, therefore, he has made a complete and valid disposition of all his separate and self-acquired property, he cannot be said to have died intestate. But as intestacy cannot by any legal possibility be a condition of operation of Sub-section (2) to Section 3, the words 'dies intestate' in Section 2 must be treated as surplusage having no sensible meaning, to avoid an absurd result."

As this aspect has been sufficiently dealt with by brother Narasimham, J., I do not think it is worthwhile to dilate upon it any more. That the words 'dying; or dies', wherever they occur in the Act, do not necessarily convey an idea of futurity is not seriously disputed. Similar words did occur in the Hindu Law of Inheritance Amendment Act (II of 1929.) They received the judicial interpretation including the notions of deaths both before and after the Act. The expression of a contrary view was not favoured by almost all the High Courts and finally the Judicial Committee. I would refer to a passage from 'Pokhan Dusadh v. Mt. Manoa', A I R (24) 1937 Pat. 117, at p. 120.

"The first objection admits of a simple answer. It implies that the words "Hindu male dying intestate" mean a Hindu male who will hereafter die intestate. It appears to me, however, that the words in question were never intended to convey this meaning. The words "dying intestate" which qualify the preceding words "Hindu male" are merely descriptive and limit the operation of the Act to the estate of those Hindu males only who answer the description. It is true that the participle in the expression "dying intestate" is in the present tense; but that is the present tense of logic and the expression connotes the intestacy of the deceased owner without any reference to whether the death occurs before or after the Act comes into force. "The Hindu male dying intestate" simply means the Hindu male who has died or may die intestate."

That legislation is in 'pari materia' with the present one. The Legislature with that knowledge used similar words or the same words or their grammatical variations in phrasing relevant references to the deaths of Hindus. As a settled canons of construction, the Legislature shall be presumed to have employed the self-same words with the self-same meaning. With the utmost respect to brother Das, J., I must say that the word 'when' — the first word — in Sub-section (2) cannot force the construction of future death upon us. If that were so, the words "at the time of his death" would be wholly superfluous. It would do to frame the Sub-section by saying

"When a Hindu governed by any school of Hindu Law other than Dayabhag School or by customary law dies having an interest in a Hindu joint family property his widow shall ....."

As the word 'when' did not connote the time of death, the words "at the time of death" were needed as it would, if the section began with the word 'if' instead of 'when.' I would, therefore, agree entirely with brother Narasimham, J., that the word 'when' means "if or in the event of" and does not refer to 'the time when the Hindu dies.'

(51) By way of reinforcing this interpretation, brother Das, J., relies very much upon the word 'devolving' in Sub-section (3) of the section. I would note that the dictionary meaning of the word 'devolve' is "lapse of an unexercised right to the ultimate owner." According to him, 'devolve' or its grammatical variations, such as, "devolution, devolving, &c." denote descent by succession or inheritance, as distinct from survivorship. The next step, in his logical process, is that if what the widow gets is by succession or inheritanec and not by survivorship, any gap between the time of the death of her husband and the time of her taking is inconceivable. By this process of reasoning, he comes to what he calls "inescapable conclusion" that the time of her husband's death must occur after the Act as she could, in either view of the case, not be deemed to have or not to have taken before the commencement of the Act. Devolution does not necessarily mean descent by succession or inheritance. I would, in this connection, invite attention to the highest authority on the subject, namely, the decision of the Federal Court in the case 'In the matter of Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act, 1937, A I R (28) 1941 F C 72, at p. 78. The passage from the judgment of the Court, delivered by Gwyer, C. J., of India, which I am going to rely upon and to quote below, was spoken by his Lordship while dealing with 'the fourth question.'

"That even if it were permissible to uphold the Act to a limited extent, the provision in S. 3 (2) relating to the interest of the deceased in Hindu joint family property would be 'ultra vires' the Indian Legislature, on the ground that the mention of 'succession' in Entry No. 7 of List 3 of Sch. 7 does not include or authorise legislation in respect of the benefit which accrues to the members of a Mitakshara joint Hindu family under the rule of survivorship."

The question thus arose directly and substantially; and his Lordship, in overruling the contention, proceeds to say, 'inter alia':

"It is equally important to remember that neither in their ordinary grammatical significance nor by a long continued use in a technical sense have the words 'devolution' and 'succession' 'acquired a connotation that would preclude their application to describe the operation of the rule of survivorship as above explained.' Eminent text writers and Judges have used one or the other of these terms to include the accession of right which takes place on the death of one of the members of a Mitakshara joint family. Many enactments of Parliament and of the Indian Legislature have used the words 'inheritance' and 'succession' in juxtaposition, justifying the inference that succession is either another category from or a wider category than 'inheritance' (See some of those enactments referred to in Ilbert's Government of India, Chapter 4, and in Mulla's Hindu Law, p. 4.) If in these enactments 'succession' should be held not to include the principle of survivorship, it would be difficult to say what else that word is meant to refer to and in any other view the continued administration of that part of the Hindu Law by the British Indian Courts could not have been provided for, because there are no other appropriate words in those provisions. Such being the position as to the meaning of the words, it is permissible to add that it is difficult to conceive of any reason why in framing Lists 2 and 3 Parliament should have thought fit 'to take away the law of survivorship' from the jurisdiction of the Indian Legislatures, and there is no justification for attributing oversight either, when, as above explained, the language employed 'may properly be held to comprehend the law of survivorship as well.'

"In one or two instances, eminent writers have employed language suggesting that 'devolution' may comprehend cases of survivorship but not the word 'succession' (See Mayne's Hindu Law, para. 270,) but it is difficult to find any basis for this distinction. 'Devolution' may be wider in scope than 'succession' in the sense that the former is not restricted to the result of a 'death'

(See O. 20, R. 10, Civil P C), but that is immaterial for the present purpose; and, as already stated, eminent Judges have used both the terms in a sense that will include the operation of the principle of survivorship."

The point can be further elucidated by referring to an earlier part of his Lordship's judgment, which reads:

"In addition to the constitutional points above summarised, a suggestion was made on the construction of the Act that it does not provide for the devolution of any property by survivorship nor confers on the widow a right by survivorship, though it gives her the same interest in the joint property as the deceased husband had. This does not seem to be tenable. It is true that Section 3 of the Act does not use the word 'survivorship', and it may be that the widow taking a share under the Act does not become a coparcener with the other sharers; but there can be no doubt that in the cases in which, it gives to the widow of a deceased coparcener a right to a share in the joint property which she did not possess under the pre-existing law, it takes away to that extent the benefit of the rule of survivorship which would have accrued to the remaining coparceners. The reference must, therefore, be dealt with on the footing that so far as its effect goes, the Act does legislate 'with respect to' the law of survivorship."

If I may say so with great respect, in the illuminating judgment of Gwyer, C. J., the connotation of 'survivorship' has been rightly commented upon. It is a term which is borrowed from the English Law as what takes place on the death of a coparcener and bears resemblance to the operation of principle of survivorship in the case of joint tenancy on the death of one of the joint tenants according to the English jurisprudence. Lord Dunedin in 'Baijnath Prasad Singh v. Tejbali Singh', 43 All 228, sounded a note of caution about the use of the terms "coparcenary and coparcener" in relation to the Mitakshara joint family. Gwyer, C. J., observes that the note is equally applicable to the use of the terms "joint tenancy and survivorship" for the incidents associated with joint ownership under the Mitakshara Law. 'The only degree of resemblance between the two systems of law is the 'jus rescendi' and the effect of death of one coparcener, namely, an extinction of the deceased person's interest and diminution in the number of sharers whose pre-existing interest extended over the whole property.' This is just the reason why, when a coparcener dies, no property, nor even his interest, devolves upon any person. It remains in the coparcenary to be worked out and separated at the partition in favour of the person who can represent him at the time. That it devolves upon the widow is an exception to the rule.

(52) In order to make the position clear, I would for a moment consider what should happen in the case of the death of a Hindu after the Act leaving a widow and a body of coparceners. It is clear at the moment, the husband's interest will become extinguished and would lapse in the same manner as it would if the Act were not in force with the only difference that the number of persons for whose benefit the effect of extinction will operate will include the widow. The interest thus grows in her and can be not inappropriately described as devolving on her by survivorship. Like all other survivors, she should acquire a right of claiming partition. My learned brother Das, J., relies upon a decision of the Patna High Court in holding that accrual of this right is by way of inheritance. The decision is reported in the case of 'Siveshwar Prasad Narain Singh v. Haranarain Mal', A I R (32) 1945 Pat. 116. What was held in that case by Fazl Ali, C. J., (as he then was) is summed up in the following words:

"Therefore if the interest which she has in the property at present is an asset of the husband, then it can be lawfully attached. As I have already stated if she acquired the interest of her husband as an heir, then it must be deemed to be the latter's asset in her hands."

I have nothing to disagree with this learned judgment. But I do not consider, it supports the theory that the process that takes place at that psychological moment is one of inheritance as distinguished from devolution by survivorship. The law amends the Hindu Law to the effect of adding the widow to the list of survivors as if she would be a member in the corporate body of the coparcenary for the purpose of devolution of his interest. The character or extent of such devolution is to be determined according to the rule implied in the words "she shall have the same interest as her husband had at the time of death." The judgment of Venkataraman Rao, J., of the Madras High Court in the case of 'Sardambal v. Subbarama Ayyar', A I R (29) 1942 Mad. 212, to be presently referred to, would make the position clear as to why the creditor of the husband can lawfully attach the widow's interest in the joint family property accruing to her under the provisions of this Act. A relevant passage occurring in the judgment of Gwyer, C. J., which runs as follows will throw light on the subject:

"Whatever may be the position under the English Law, the theory of extinction does not exactly (in the sense 'completely') describe the position which arises on the death of a member of a Mitakshara joint family. The result of a long course of decisions is that certain legal acts continue to operate on the interest of the deceased even when what is ordinarily spoken of as the rule of survivorship is taking effect." (the bracketed words are mine.)

The following extract from the judgment of Venkataraman, Rao, J., is very illuminating:

"If for instance an undivided member dies leaving a son and also his widow, the property would devolve upon both of them and though, so far as the widow is concerned, her interest is limited, no such limitation can be placed upon the interest taken by the son. It cannot be said that the interest of the son is attached but not that of the widow. 'The fact that a right of partition is conferred upon the widow goes to show that the property is taken by her subject to all the rights and liabilities which the husband would have had because it is the same interest that is conferred upon her.' Therefore, giving the language its plain meaning, the property taken by her must be held to be liable for the payment of her husband's debts and is liable to be attached by the plaintiff." It is abundantly clear from the above that liability to her husband's debts of the interest accruing to her on his death, under the benefits of the Act, arises not on account of the process of accrual being either succession or inheritance rather than survivorship, but because she gets the same interest that her husband had which means she gets it subject to the rights, obligations, liabilities and equities that would have been available to any outsider as against that interest. To use the words of Sir Maurice Gwyer, the legal act of the liability incurred by the loan of the husband is already in operation as against the interest that he had. The other coparceners cannot be said to be getting the "same interest" for the purpose of the liability. The joint family property in the hands of the son is liable for the father's debts. That does not necessarily make out the position that the son gets his father's interest by inheritance. In Madras jurisdiction, a coparcener can sell his interest in family property. That does not mean that he succeeds by inheritance, not by survivorship. If Fazl Ali C. J. used the word 'heir' or 'succession', he did not mean to use it strictly in the technical sense; he meant nothing other than what Venkataraman, J. laid down, on which he relied, it being the admitted position that by that interest accruing to the widow, the coparcenary does not become disrupted, or, in other words, the share accruing to her does not become separated, carved out and held as an asset different from the assets of the joint family property. What his Lordship said was true for the limited purpose of enforcing the liability for the husband's debts against the interest devolving on her. No corrolaries should be drawn to support the proposition that she must get the interest at her husband's death or not at all. In the Hindu law jurisdiction, a coparcener's creditor can follow the joint family property in the hands of his sons but not so if the property is in the hands of his sons living in commensality with others who are collaterals to their father. This does not amount to mean that the sons get by inheritance while others get by survivorship. In a joint family constituted by father and his sons, the father dying after the Act, the entire property comes to the possession of the sons and their mother. The property would be equally liable in their hands even though the sons are surviving coparceners while the mother, as a widow, is assumed to be heir. My conclusion is that the fixation of this liability on the assumption that the deceased husband's interest is an asset in the hands of his widow is not at all a relevant consideration for the purpose. It would have been relevant if it were an infallible proposition that an heir, or, in other words, one who takes by inheritance, must take at the death of the propositus. Various other estates may interpose to postpone the vesting of succession to a later date. This is illustrated by the reversionary succession interrupted by widow's estates or other life estates, such as, that of a daughter, sister and so on. The Hindu law introduces the fiction of death of the last male holder occurring, as it were, after the said estates expire.

(53) I would further point out that I could come across no decision in which it has been held not only that the interest of the husband, that is acquired by the widow, gets disrupted from the joint family property once for all, and never comes back to it even though the family continues to function and exist as a corporate coparcenary body after the widow's death, but also that it goes, on her death, to her husband's heirs as distinguished from coparceners or survivors. On the other hand, one of the decisions cited by my learned brother Das, J. lays down the contrary, I would, in this connexion, invite attention to a decision of the Lahore High Court in the case of 'Vinod Sagar v. Vishnubhai', A I R (34) 1947 Lah. 388. Paragraphs 56 and 57 of the judgment delivered by Abdur Rahman, J. deal with the question. The sum and substance of this judgment is to the effect that accrual or growth of the right of a widow does not amount to disruption of the coparcenary nor separation of any particular interest from the joint family property, until the widow effects a partition by metes and bounds; that even if she divides her interest by metes and bounds the rest of the joint family and joint family property remain completely unaffected; that until a partition is brought about, the Karta of the joint family would be entitled to act as such and the widow shall be bound by his acts in the fullest possible sense in his capacity to represent the entire of the coparcenary. On partition, the Karta's power of management and control would be kept in abeyance in regard to the property which has fallen to a widow, for such time as she remains in its possession. The learned Judge says:

"Whether its character would change even after a partition by metes and bounds does not arise for decision at this stage, although, as at present advised, I seem inclined to the view that it would not."

In my judgment, I see nothing in the nature of interest that devolves upon the widow under the Act which, except temporarily for the purpose of enabling the widow to enjoy widow's estate and that on partition by metes and bounds, would alter the character and the destination of the property for the purpose of its ultimate devolution. Such alteration may occur on change of circumstances, such as, family having broken up in the meantime. If the unit of the joint family and the joint family property, as such, continues till after the widow's death, the estate must return to and merge in the stock of the coparcenary property. I would sum up the position like this that on the death of the husband, his interest in the joint family property would lapse. In the coparcenary estate including her husband's interest, she shall have the same interest as her husband had at the time of his death. That interest will be an unpredicatable and unpredictable one. Under the management of the Karta of the joint family, she shall be bound to sue and to be sued through him, who will represent her and her undivided interest, just in the same manner as he would for the other coparceners and their coparcenary interests. She will have the same right of claiming partition as every other coparcener would have. Till partition her right will be only to maintenance, just in the same manner as that of any male coparcener. I would here quote Gour's Hindu Code, Art. 1069:

"But it is clear that even in this family all persons do not possess equal rights. The property which it owns is called 'joint family property,' but it is a misnomer if it implies possession of any common rights other than the right to maintenance."

When partitioned at her instance, portion carved out she shall be entitled to enjoy separately and during such enjoyment which enures till her death, the dominion of the Karta of the joint family remains in suspension. When she dies the woman's estate goes back to the joint family if it exists. The conception of Hindu law is that after woman's estate terminates, the property goes back to the stock from where it had come. In the present case, the stock is the coparcenary and coparcenary property. It is the same interest that her husband had, that means, a coparcener's interest in the coparcenary property. There is absolutely no guarantee either in the implied conception or connotation underlying the idea of Hindu women's estate or in the language of the Act that would warrant the conclusion that the property should go to her husband's heirs as his separate property, he being considered to be a fresh stock of descent for the purpose of inheritance. I would here quote a few passages from Mayne's Hindu Law at pp. 720-21:

"The Act however does not effect a statutory severance or disruption of the entire family. To interpret the Act as effecting such a severance would cut across the recognised principles of Hindu Law and would not make for a rational and orderly succession. As the wives of coparceners are undoubtedly members of a joint Hindu family, there is nothing incongruous in the widow of a coparcener being viewed as occupying a position more or less analogous to the position of a coparcener in a Dayabhag family. As the other members of the family will remain undivided and as she cannot be regarded as the widow of a divided member, the joint family system and management will continue as before, probably an advantage. Except to the extent of the widow taking her husband's interest, the Act leaves the rights of the other members of the family untouched. The result is that while the deceased coparcener's interest vests in his widow, his male issue will continue in the strictest sense to be coparceners along with the other male members of the family with mutual rights of survivorship. So also under sub-section (1), in a Mitakshara family, the sons, grandsons and great-grandsons of her husband will be coparceners 'inter se' while the widow will hold her interest in quasi-severalty but along with them. To hold that the widow of a coparcener who takes his interest on his death is strictly a tenant-in-common with the coparcenary body is not to give full effect to the words in S. 3(2), according to which she is to have 'in the property the same interest as he himself had', apart from the grave complications which it will involve. On that view, she will be entitled to an account and for a definite share of the income, while the others will not be; more than that, it will lead to anomalies and hardships in connexion with the allotment of shares; and even before partition there would be separate management and representation and separate incurring of debt. 'But evidently the intention of the Act is only to interrupt survivorship and to protect the right of a widow so that she may have the same interest as if she continued the legal persona of her husband till partition'.

"Though, if she were assumed to be a coparcener in the Mitakshara sense, the working of the Act would be easier, the circumstance that she will hold her interest under the Act in quasi-severalty does not materially alter the position of the joint family in other respects."

(54) Substantially, the devolution by survivorship, while acting on undivided coparcenary property, has, dormantly inherent in it, the principle on which the Hindu law of succession is based, which is for the time being eclipsed by the dominant concept of Hindu coparcenary, and the implications implicit in it for the purpose of its corporate functioning. When the time for disruption of the coparcenary arrives, and the coparcenary property is divided, the right by survivorship manifests itself in the form of a right to succession. The deceased coparcener, whose interest in the coparcenary property lapsed, or extinguished itself at the time of his death, is at the time of division represented by those who would be his male heirs within the coparcenary under the laws of inheritance and they will take that interest which he could have taken had he lived till partition. In this view of the matter, his interest remains undisposed of, and what goes down from time to time by deaths and births is the right to represent him which is not, in the strict sense of the term, the same as the right to property. By the time, if the law could interpose a representative of its own making, its effect would be the same as if representatives could be added or deducted by birth, adoption and death under the Hindu law. For the purpose of determining the time of accrual of the widow's interest under the Act, the test of its fluctuability has been applied by my learned brother Das, J. with some amount of rigour. He himself, however, is not certain about its fluctuability and has reserved his opinion about it. In the circumstances, no certain result could be achieved on admittedly uncertain basis. He, in this connexion, has referred to a decision of this Court, to which I was a party reported in I. L. R. (1949) 1 Cut. 483. The aspect of the question with which we are dealing did never arise then. I am still of opinion that on the facts of that case my decision was correct. I do not fear that in the light of the present decision of mine, the decision reached there should have been anything different. At any rate, I am quite sure that such fluctuations as are inherent in the character of "the same interest as her husband had" would affect the interest before devolution. The question before us in the case of 'Kunja Sahu v. Bhagaban Mohanty', I. L. R. (1949) 1 Cut. 483 was if the widow, on whom the same interest as her husband had had devolved, would be entitled to alienate before partition by metes and bounds. It was argued that "the same interest" should mean "the coparcenary inalienable interest that her husband had'. In support of this argument, the decision of Leach, C. J. in the case of 'Chinniah Chettiar v. Sivagami Achi', A I R (32) 1945 Mad 21 was cited, to show that according to the learned Chief Justice Leach the word "same interest" would compel him to hold that the widow's interest would be subject to such reduction by fluctuation by an adoption as it would in the hands of her husband. To that contention, I observed :"with great respect, I cannot go so far as that because it would be difficult to assume that her interest will be enhanced on the death of coparcener as it would have had her husband been alive". My observation is not tantamount to saying that there will be no fluctuation of whatsoever kind. I did not, in fact, dissent from the learned Chief Justice, but I said I could not go to the fullest extent that all kinds of fluctuations including enhancement by fluctuation would also occur. Reduction by fluctuation is permissible but not enhancement, because evidently, as the trend of authorities so far goes to establish, with which I very respectfully agree, she is not a coparcener in the full sense. The main decision proceeded on the basis that hers was a widow's estate according to sub-section (1) and the meaning of "same interest" in sub-section (2) must be arrived at in that context. As such an estate, it is alienable and its main attribute cannot be cut down by the doctrine of fluctuability being called in aid. At any rate, I must observe once again that the problem of fluctuability creates greater difficulty in the case of post-Act widows than in the case of pre-Act widows. To the question arising in the latter case, there is a very simple answer, namely, that she must take the same interest subject to such variations as might have in any way impaired it by time a right accrues to her. Suppose, the entire joint family property is sold away for joint family debts between the husband's pre-Act death and post-Act devolution upon the widow. The benefit of the Act cannot be said to materialise not because the Act does not apply to pre-Act deceased's widow but because the interest that the Act intends for her was not in existence at the time the Act came into operation. The same is the case with regard to mutilation of the said interest or its impairment within the time by agencies either voluntary or involuntary. Take the simple illustration of a Mitakshara son. He becomes a coparcener on birth, but he cannot in any event challenge an alienation of the joint family property that had taken place before he was legally born. The real difficulty arising out of fluctuability or otherwise would be almost baffling in a case where the interest devolves upon the widow on her husband's death after the Act and she never alienates her interest nor partitions till a number of deaths and births in the coparcenary body had occurred and then she comes out with a suit for partition claiming that she should get the same interest as her husband had at the time of his death. In case the fluctuation takes place from such a cause as operates on the interest that her husband had, that is, a coparcener's interest in coparcenary property from its inherent character the widow's rights thereto must be governed by it, even to its curtailment. There may be cases in which the fluctuation takes place on account of loss of a coparcener's status, such as, accrescence due to increase in the number of coparceners of the same degree of relationship with the common ancestor. In such cases, the widow may not be entitled to the increase, because she does not inherit her husband's status in the family.

(55) Besides, as I have already expressed myself very clearly, in applying the rule of fluctuability, we shall have to make compromises or exceptions in order to meet the ends of justice, illustrations of which are numerous in the rules of Hindu law or custom in their application to the realities of life. It is too difficult to lay down any inflexible rule. Each case shall to be decided on its own facts. Fluctuations due to natural causes of deaths or births in the coparcenary body are associated with gain or loss of status. A new birth brings in a coparcener. That affects not the status but has the potentiality of affecting the interest of others, while death, resulting in loss of status of the deceased, attracts accrescence in the case of those only who have the requisite status at the moment. Hence the difference. Assuming my casual observation in that case, where, too, I have observed logical deductions would land us in anomalies rather than remove them, to be true, my present conclusion is not in the least affected.

(56) The learned author of Mayne's Hindu Law, 10th Edn., has given an illustration at p. 722 at the end of Art. 592, which I will quote here:

"The anomaly of a widow holding a woman's estate in the undivided property of her husband must necessarily be dealt with as a special case: the interest she takes may well be a fluctuating interest till there is a partition."

It must be remembered, however, that such cases will occur very rarely, if not, not at all. So long as any coparcener dying after the death of the concerned widow's husband leaves surviving him any male issue within the prescribed degree, or even a widow of his, or any of his male descendants, the concerned widow's interest shall not be affected as they or any one of them shall represent the subsequently deceased coparcener at the partition. The ambiguity, if any, being common to the cases of pre-Act and post-Act widows, its determination is not material for testing the correctness of either of the rival contentions.

(57) I would just point out an instance which would testify to the correctness of the view that I have taken. Suppose the Act operates only in cases where a Hindu dies after the Act both within the meaning of sub-sections (1) and (2) of section 3. Take a Hindu dying after the Act who leaves besides his widow, a daughter-in-law and a granddaughter-in-law whose husbands predeceased him before the Act. The rule of devolution of interest on the last two widows will operate differently according as sub-section (1) or (2) of section 3 applies. In the former case, they should each get the share of a son or grandson along with the widow; but in the latter case, they will get nothing while the deceased's widow will get the entire interest. This will happen because their husbands died before the Act. In this connexion, I should note that it is not disputed that the benefit of subsection (1) will accrue to the predeceased son's widow or predeceased grandson's widow even if their husbands died before the Act, provided that the properties to be inherited were those of the Hindu dying intestate after the Act, in which their husbands had no vested interest at the time of their deaths. They shall, however, be deprived of the interest that their husbands had at the time of their deaths in coparcenary estate. It would be difficult to appreciate that this discrimination is within the intendment of the Act. The object of the amendment was obviously to give the right that a Hindu had, or could have had, if alive, at the opening of the succession or dissolution of the coparcenary, to his widow. This object was, however, subordinated to the consideration of leaving undisturbed transactions, or considerations that were lawfully completed under the law in its pre-amended state. If we presume the Legislature to be free from arbitrariness and guided by rules of justice and equality to all, similarly circumstanced, we cannot make the assumption of discrimination that must have to be made in order to justify the opposite view. Sub-section (2), interpreted as I do, would completely obviate the anomaly referred to. If the rival contention is acceded to, their widows get an interest in the property in which they had none, while they are excluded from the coparcenary property in which their husbands had an interest at the time of their respective deaths. That such widows were intended to be given better rights cannot be denied in view of the provisions of sub-section (1) of section 3.

(58) In expounding that to give the benefit of the Act to women widowed prior to the Act would amount to divesting the coparceners of the normal rights vested in them from their births, my learned brother, Das J. has enumerated the various rights and privileges, either in existence or in expectancy, of a coparcener in a Hindu joint family. On the assumption that they are vested rights, their impairment, even to the slightest possible degree, is held out as the determining factor of retrospectivity. Though in my view they are not so, I should, assume for argument's sake that what my learned brother Das, J. enumerates as vested rights are so in reality. At the same time, I would assume with him that the Act cannot be given the meaning so as to affect such rights. The result that would inevitably follow is that, so long as a single coparcener, born prior to the Act, is alive in a joint family, at the time of the post-Act death of a Hindu coparcener, his widow shall not be entitled to the benefit provided for under sub-section (2) of the section. This, in other words, means that in order that the Act shall operate prospectively, the joint family must have been one in which the surviving coparceners would be all born after the Act, or one that is constituted after Act. It is, however, conceded that the Act must operate in all cases of deaths of coparceners after the Act, independently of the fact that the surviving coparceners had acquired their vested rights by births before the Act came into effect. In this contention, no distinction is made as to the impairment of the rights of the surviving coparceners between those born before and those born after the Act. In that event, the Act must be taken to be retrospective in its very nature. The distinction between the effects of the two rival interpretations in this respect, therefore, is without difference. The apparent retrospectivity is thus not real, nor it is sanctioned by the language of the Act. It will apply to the devolution of interest of a Hindu dying before as well as after the Act, with the same effect on the rights of surviving coparceners. It has been accepted by all such eminent Judges and Jurists as had had the occasion to consider it that the operation of the Act is prospective in nature notwithstanding that its operation does deprive all the coparceners born before the Act of what brother Das J. calls vested rights of theirs. These views, for which I am full of respect, cannot be explained except on the hypothesis that the rights of the coparceners before partition are not vested rights. It is too late in the day to flout the views of theirs. So in whatever manner and extent the surviving coparceners' rights are affected, its operation should not be condemned as retrospective. I shall not be understood to advocate the position, nor has it been pointed out to us, that acceptance of my view would amount to reopening the completed transactions, such as, pre-Act alienations or partitions or the like. The Act operates only on joint family having coparcenary properties that continue to be so at the time it comes into force. This is exactly the view that has been taken by my Lord Varadachariar, J. in the case of 'Umayal Achi v. Lakshmi Achi', A I R (32) 1945 F. C. 25 at p. 33. The paragraph in which this position has been expounded is very much liable to be misconstrued; but on a close reading it is clear that it means exactly what I have just now said above. The passage that can give rise to misconstruction, if and when read stripped off from its context, reads:

"It is true that, on the above view, the plaintiff in the present case will derive no benefit from the Act, though she happens to be the widow of a predeceased son. But that is due to the circumstances that her husband died before the passing of the Act."

The death of "her husband" before the Act was considered to be the circumstance on which depended the result of "derivation of no benefit from the Act" for the plaintiff. That is because on her husband's death, prior to the Act, the joint family, as such, came to an end with the result that at the commencement of the Act there was no joint family nor joint family property. This position is made clear by his Lordship by illustrating it on reference to a hypothetical case. In this case, though not expressly but by necessary implication, it may be understood that B's widow lost her husband before the Act. This is made clear by the learned Judge saying that the adoption by A's widow was after the Act. Last comes the concluding passage which reads:

"The only possibility of calling the Act to her aid is by the application of sub-s. (2) of S. 3 if a double fiction could be imported so as to justify the assumption not only that 'the joint family was being continued by the adopted boy but that B must be deemed to have died after the adoption. On this assumption, B's widow could retain a half of the estate as against the adopted son of A, only if B's ownership could be described as 'interest in joint family property."

An "interest in the joint family property" in the aforesaid passage is quoted from sub-section (2) of Sec. 3. Three things are clear from this passage, viz., that (a) the husband's interest at the time of his death, while he is sole surviving coparcener, is to be distinguished from "his interest in the joint family property". (It can be his separate property which according to the learned Judge is not embraced within the scope, intendment and object of the Act. In order to be "an interest in the joint family property" within the meaning of sub-sec. (2), it must be an interest in such property for the purpose of the sub-section only when at the death of the widow's husband one or more other male coparceners were alive); (b) the joint family must be continuing from before the commencement of the Act till the Act came into force, (c) so that the interest devolving on the widow could be said to be "an interest in the joint family property" that her husband had. Like the case of a completed partition of the family estate accompanying a disruption of the coparcenary prior to the Act the death of the widow's husband as the sole surviving coparcener amounts to a completed transaction or part consideration which, according to my view, is not in the least affected by the operation of the Act. I shall show presently that conceding that my view is one demanding retrospective operation of the Act, it is limited and confined to cases where such past transactions or considerations are not affected. It is well known as a canon of construction of statutes that a statute may be retrospective to certain extent and no further.

(59) I would here refer to a passage from the judgment of Gwyer, C. J. of India, in which his Lordship says that the Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act is a remedial Act seeking to remove or to mitigate, what the Legislature presumably regarded as a mischief; and as such it ought to receive a beneficial interpretation, and even though it be found in a small minority of cases to prejudice rather than to benefit those whom it was intended 'to help, this would be no reason why the Court should not adopt the construction which is on the whole best calculated to give effect to the manifest intention of the Legislature.' Brother Das, J. does not dispute this proposition but says that the beneficial construction must be one admissible under the language of the Act. True, when two reading or two interpretations are equally admissible, this doctrine would give preference to the one which would render a larger measure of benefit to a larger number of people. With reference to this, my learned brother Das, J. in his judgment in paragraph 43 has said

"But it is not clear what particular class of women are intended to be benefited thereby. It cannot even be maintained that at least all widows are intended to be benefited thereby. Indeed the contrary can be demonstrated, viz., that certain widows who were entitled to rights under the pre-existing law are deprived of their rights. For instance, the mother or daughter of a widower (male) having self-acquired property who leaves him surviving no male issue but a widowed daughter-in-law is excluded by the said daughter-in-law by virtue of sec. 3 sub-sec. (1). Therefore the Act helps only some women who are widows and not all women or all widows."

I am sorry to have to say that I do not at all comprehend that the mother or the daughter of a widower has been deprived of her reversionary right to succession by virtue of sub-section (1) of section 3. They do, notwithstanding the Act, retain their places in the list of heirs. Mother is a later heir than son, grandson, great-grandson, widow and daughter of the last male holder. The Act has introduced son's widow, grandson's widow and great-grandson's widow in the places of their husbands. By this process, the chance of succession of either the daughter or the mother is not in the least rendered more remote than what it was before. It has also to be noticed that these widowed daughters-in-law or grand-daughter-in-law take side by side with the living sons and grand-sons in whose presence neither the mother nor the daughter could inherit, even though daughters-in-law and the grand-daughters-in-law were not conferred the right to succeed under the Act. So the apprehended consequence is more imaginary than real. On the contrary, the Act has increased the number of women heirs in the place of their husbands along with the male relations of the same degree without removing other women relations even a step further than the places they have been occupying under the Hindu law. Here, I would point out that the Act pre-eminently intends to benefit predeceased sons' and grandsons' widows. Brother Das's construction would defeat this. Sub-section (2) of section 3 uncontrolled by sec. 4 would achieve this very efficiently. This establishes the correctness of my exposition.

(60) My learned brother Das, J. would ask me to interpret the Judgment of Mr. Varadachariar J. of the Federal Court, already referred to in the way which he has done in order that I may appear to pay due regard to it as a Judgment of a Superior Court by which I am bound. But it is within my right to comprehend the judgment in my own way, and my learned brother should kindly remember that I have followed the judgment of Mr. Justice Varadachariar in the Federal Court in support of the view that I have taken. If his Lordship Mr. Justice Varadachariar has said that the Act is prospective I have not said anything to the contrary. On the other hands, I have not fallen a prey to the contention that all other considerations being equal, retrospectivity would consist in merely relying on a pre-Act event as attracting its operation. In either of the cases, impairment or divestation of pre-Act acquired coparcenary right being common, there is no logic in distinguishing one as prospective from the other as retrospective. I do not apprehend, as brother Das, J. says, that distortion of domestic equilibrium would occur.

(61) In my judgment, the view that we have taken will restore the equilibrium in the domestic sphere of life, where it has been lost. It will remove the cold indifference with which the Hindu widows are being treated by their husband's coparceners and relations even in cases where their husbands have thrown all their earnings into the family funds and added immensely to the opulence of the coparcenary and have, in substance, built it up. It is apprehended by my learned brother that this pronouncement will adversely affect or otherwise reopen completed transactions and thus unsettle settled rights and obligations created on their basis and should give rise to numberless litigations and liabilities changing the legal relations already established. This apprehension is, to my mind, wholly unfounded. In this connexion, I shall refer to section 3 of the Orissa Act (V of 1944) which reads:

"Notwithstanding anything contained in section 2, where any person, who, but for this Act, would have been entitled to any property, has been in possession thereof or has made a transfer thereof, his possession up to the date of the commencement of this Act shall be deemed to be as lawful, and the transfer so made by him shall be deemed to be as valid, as if this Act had not been passed."

(62) Besides, I shall draw attention to the fact that it is not a case in which we are going against a series of judgments which had founded legal rights and obligations amongst the people. Even so, that there will be a few cases in which completed private transactions will have to be reopened should not stand in our way of interpreting the Act rightly to the best of our judgment. The principle of 'stare decisis' is not called for in the facts of this case. I would conclude, therefore, my judgment with the remark that, with the greatest deference to the views of my learned brother Das, J., I could not persuade myself to hold that by taking the view of giving benefit to the widows, whose husbands died before the Act, we are at all giving it a retrospective operation so long as it does not affect the completed transactions or past considerations that took place before the Act. If anything is affected, it is the presumed chance potentiality of pre-Act born coparceners. A similar argument was advanced in relation to the construction of the Hindu Law of Inheritance Amendment Act and it found favour with the learned Judges in the case of 'Krishna Chettiar v. Manikammal 57 Mad. 718. I would cite a passage from this judgment of Madras Court, which was quoted by Sir Fazl Ali C. J., who delivered the judgment of the court in the Patna Full Bench case of 'Pokhan Desadh v. Mt. Manoa', AIR (24) 1937 Pat. 117.

"At p. 187, the learned author (Maxwell) observes that a testator is presumed to have in view the state of the law when he made his will. If it be so, we can reasonably presume that a person competent to make a will is satisfied with the state of the law regarding the order of succession to his estate among his heirs, if he prefers to die intestate without making a will. If he wishes to prefer a remoter to a nearer heir he will certainly have recourse to the making of a will. If he does not make a will, it may be because he wishes that his property should devolve according to the existing law of succession. The policy of the legislature is not to make a subsequent enactment operative against the estate of such a man and thus frustrate his presumed intentions, unless, for special weighty reasons, such a retrospective operation is bound to be necessary. If Act 2 of 1929 is given such a retrospective operation, it would be frustrating the intentions of the last male owner who preferred to die intestate before the passing of this Act. Such an anomaly will not arise if this Act should be held to apply only prospectively".

In reference to this contention, Fazl Ali, C. J., in that Patna Full Bench case, observed:

"The point to be considered is whether we can legitimately draw any presumption as to the intention of a person who has died intestate.' I venture to point out respectfully that if it is permissible to say that a man did not leave a will, because he was satisfied with the state of the law regarding the order of succession to his estate, it is equally permissible to say that his intention might have been to let the law take its course and that he was not thinking of any particular heir at all. It being impossible to predicate as to who would succeed to the estate until the succession opens, it is difficult to say that a person who dies intestate had contemplated at the time of his death that he would be succeeded by any particular person or persons. There will be still less justification for presuming that if he had known that a change was going to be effected in the existing law, he would have disposed of his property by means of a will. That being so, there is no question of frustrating the presumed intention of a person to whose estate the Act applies, and as already stated, to hold that the Act applies only when succession opens is not to give it a retrospective effect and therefore the principles bearing upon the question as to when a statute shall be construed to have retrospective operation have no relevancy".

The observations of Fazl Ali, C. J. will apply 'mutatis mutandis' to this case with reference to the view of my learned brother Das, J., particularly, as the statutes under consideration are in 'pari materia'.

(63) In the premises aforesaid, I would agree with the order proposed by my learned brother, Narasimham, J.

(64) ORDER: It is therefore ordered that this appeal be allowed and that the widow concerned will have the same interest in the joint family property as her husband had at the time of his death. There will be no order for costs.

Patna High Court

A. I. R. (38) 1951 Patna 1 [C. N. 1.]
FULL BENCH
SHEARER, RAMASWAMI AND SARJOO PRASAD JJ.

Rameshwar Prasad Sahu — Appellant v. Parmeshwar Prasad Sahu and others — Respondents.

A. F. O. O. Nos. 39 and 40 of 1950, D/- 22-9-1950.

Limitation Act (1908), Art. 182 (2) — Appeal — Meaning — Does not include appeal from order declining to set aside ex parte preliminary decree : 16 Pat. 306=A.I.R. (24) 1937 Pat. 337=169 I. C. 581, OVERRULED.

The word 'appeal' in col. 3 of cl. (2) of Art. 182, Limitation Act, does not include an appeal preferred against an order refusing to set aside an ex parte preliminary decree in suit for partition in computing the period of limitation for executing the final decree passed in such a suit as the word 'appeal' in the clause means an appeal only from the decree or order sought to be executed : Case law discussed : A. I. R. (4) 1917 Pat. 157, Approved ; 16 Pat. 306 = A. I. R. (24) 1937 Pat. 337 = 169 I. C. 581, OVERRULED ; A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 6, Rel. on. [Para 5]

Anno : Limitation Act, Art. 182, N. 34, Pt. 7.

S. N. Dutta and Prem Lal — for Appellant ; Nandlal Untwallia and Awadh Kishore Pd. — for Respondents.

Shearer J. — The question which has been referred to this Bench for decision has been stated by Sinha and Rai JJ. thus :

"Whether the word 'appeal' in col. 3 of cl. (2) of Art. 182, Limitation Act, includes an appeal preferred against an order refusing to set aside an ex parte preliminary decree in a suit for partition in computing the period of limitation for executing the final decree passed in such a suit."

Article 182, Limitation Act, prescribes the period of limitation

"for the execution of a decree or order of any civil Court not provided for by Art. 183 or by S. 48, Civil Procedure Code."

By reason of what is contained in col. 3 of the Article, the starting point for limitation varies, according as there has or has not been an appeal or a review of judgment or an amendment of the decree. Article 182 substantially reproduces the provisions contained in the earlier Limitation Acts of 1871 and 1877. The principles underlying all these provisions were twofold. One principle, to borrow the language used by Sir Dinshah Mulla in Nagendra Nath Dey v. Suresh Chandra Dey, 59 I. A. 283 at p. 288 : (A. I. R. (19) 1932 P. C. 165) is "that so long as there is any question sub judice between any of the parties, those affected shall not be compelled to pursue the so often thorny path of execution which, if the final result is against them, may lead to no advantage."

The other is that, when, on appeal, the decree or order of a subordinate Court is affirmed, modified or reversed by the High Court, the period of limitation for an application for execution of the final decree or order is the period of limitation applicable to decrees of the subordinate Court itself, and not to decrees of the High Court. Section 19, Civil P. C. of 1859 prescribed a period of twelve years' limitation for applications for the execution of decrees of a Chartered High Court, while S. 20 prescribed a period of three years' limitation for applications for the execution of decrees passed by other Courts. When, shortly afterwards, the Court of the Sadar Diwani Adalat was abolished and its appellate jurisdiction was transferred to the High Courts, a question arose as to whether a decree of a High Court passed on appeal from a decree of a subordinate Court could be executed within twelve years or had to be executed within three years. There was a conflict of decisions on the point, and, as appears from the observations of Sir James Colvile in Kristo Kinkur Roy v. Rajah Burrodacaunt Roy, 14 M.I.A. 465 at p. 487 : (10 Beng.L.R. 101 P.C.), one at least of the learned Judges, who came to the conclusion that the longer of the two periods of limitation was the period applicable, admitted that his construction "involved consequences absurd in themselves, and, presumably, contrary to the intention of the Legislature." It is quite clear that it was in order to put an end to this controversy that Art. 167, Limitation Act of 1871, took the form which it did and that, but for the imperative necessity of making the intentions of the Legislature clear, Art. 167 might well have taken a very different form. The reason why in Col. 3 of Art. 167 different starting points for limitation were prescribed was to prevent any argument being put forward that, as the decree of the subordinate Court merged in or was superseded by the decree of the High Court on appeal, the period of limitation applicable was the period applicable to decrees of the High Court and not that applicable to decrees of the subordinate Courts. Whether the decree of the trial Court has been affirmed or has been modified on appeal or on review of judgment is wholly immaterial in ascertaining what the starting point for limitation is. The Court executing the decree has merely to see whether, in point of fact, there has been an appeal or review of judgment. I stress this point as, in some of the decisions in which a forced interpretation has been put on the language used in the article, it has been completely overlooked. The word 'judgment' in Cl. (3) in the third column means, and can only mean, the judgment in the suit in which the decree or order of which execution is sought has been passed, and by a parity of reasoning the word "appeal" in Cl. (2) should be construed as an appeal from that decree or order. The narrow point which has been referred to us for decision is whether the word 'appeal' in Cl. (2) must be so construed or whether it may be construed to include also an appeal against an order declining to set aside an ex parte decree. Since 1871 this point has, on a number of occasions, come before the various High Courts, and until 1927, except in one instance, the decisions uniformly were that the word "appeal" there meant, and could only mean, an appeal from the decree or order of which execution was sought. The decision in which a contrary view was taken is a decision of the High Court of Calcutta: Lutful Huq v. Sumbhudin Pattuck, 8 Cal. 248 : (10 C.L.R. 143). In that case execution was sought of an ex parte decree passed on 7-2-1876. The application for execution was not made until 18-12-1880, that is, until more than three years had elapsed since the passing of the decree. In this interval an application had been made to have the ex parte decree set aside, and, when that application was rejected, an appeal had been preferred by the judgment-debtor which was ultimately dismissed on 19-12-1877. It appears that, when the application to have the ex parte decree set aside was made, the trial Court ordered that execution of the decree should be stayed and that a similar order was made when the appeal against the order of the trial Court dismissing the application was preferred. Under S. 15, Limitation Act of 1908, the decree-holder would have been entitled to exclude the period during which execution of his decree had been stayed. Section 15, Limitation Act of 1877 did not, however, apply to orders of stay made in the course of proceedings for the execution of decrees. It is quite clear from the judgment of Prinsep J. that in his opinion, this was a serious defect in the Act, and that it was largely in order to prevent a palpable injustice resulting from it that he concurred in the view expressed by Morris J. that the decree had been kept open and did not become final until the order of the appellate Court was passed on 19-12-1877. With the greatest respect, it appears to me that, in order to do what they considered to be justice in this particular case, the learned Judges put on the words contained in Cl. 2 of Art. 179 a construction which they were not intended to, and could not, bear. In the same year in which Lutful Huq v. Sumbhudin Pattuck, (8 Cal. 248:10 C.L.R. 143) was decided a contrary view had been taken by the Allahabad High Court in Sheo Prasad v. Anrudh Singh, 2 ALL. 273. In 1891 the High Court of Bombay in Juvaji v. Ramchandra, 16 Bom. 123 followed the Allahabad and dissented from the Calcutta decision. In 1893 a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court itself, of which Comer-Petheram C. J. was a member, expressed doubts as to the correctness of the earlier decision—vide Baikanta Nath v. Aughore Nath, (21 Cal. 387) and in 1927 another Division Bench in express terms, dissented from it—vide Fakir Chand v. Daiba Charan, 54 Cal. 1052 : (A. I. R. (14) 1927 Cal. 904). This latter decision was approved by Rankin C. J., in Profulla Kumar v. Mt. Sarojbala Basu, 35 C. W. N. 155 : (A. I. R. (18) 1931 Cal. 332). Shortly before this, the point had come before this High Court in Brijraj v. Nauratan Lal, 3 P. L. J. 119 : (A. I. R. (4) 1917 Pat. 157) and Chamier C. J. had relied on Baikanta Nath Mittra v. Aughore Nath Bose, 21 Cal. 387 and had dissented from Lutful Huq v. Sumbhudin Pattuck, 8 Cal. 248 : (10 C.L.R. 143). The diligence of Mr. Nandlal Untwalia, who appears for the respondents, has also brought to our notice similar decisions of the Judicial Commissioner in the Central Provinces and of the Lahore Court.

[2] The question as to whether a more extended meaning can be given to the word "decree" in Cl. (2) of Art. 182 arose in a more acute form in consequence of the amendments made in 1908 in the Transfer of Property Act and the Code of Civil Procedure. Until 1908 a mortgagee, who had obtained a preliminary decree for sale, was, on the expiry of the period fixed for the payment of the mortgage money, entitled under S. 89, T. P. Act (sic) was repealed and O. 34, R. 5, Civil P. C. was enacted under which a mortgagee was required to obtain a final decree for sale, and, when that decree was passed, to apply in the course to levy execution on it. In 1927 in Somar Singh v. Deonandan Prasad, 6 Pat. 780 : (A. I. R. (14) 1927 Pat. 215), a Division Bench of this Court was called on to decide whether an application for the execution of a final decree in a mortgage suit was not barred by limitation in spite of the fact that a period of more than three years had elapsed between the passing of the decree and the making of the application. The preliminary decree was passed on 23-8-1921, and the final decree on 28-10-1922. In the interval an appeal against the preliminary decree was preferred and was ultimately dismissed on 29-10-1925. The application for execution of the final decree was made on 2-2-1926, that is, more than three years after the final decree was passed, but within three years after the dismissal of the appeal against the preliminary decree. Kulwant Sahay and Ross JJ., held that, in such circumstances, the application for execution was not barred by limitation, and an application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council against their decision was rejected. This decision was followed by Venkata Ramana Rao J., of Madras High Court in Koyakutti v. Verrankutti, A. I. R. (24) 1937 Mad. 421 : (171 I. C. 980) and an appeal under the Letters Patent against his decision was dismissed. Prior to this, however, another learned Judge of the Madras High Court sitting singly, Madhavan Nair J. in Ahammad Kutty v. Kottakkat Kuttu, 56 Mad. 458 : (A. I. R. (20) 1933 Mad. 315) had taken a contrary view. Since then, a contrary view has also been taken by a Division Bench of the Bombay High Court in Mahadeo Bhimasankar Madhava v. Fatumiya Husseinbhai, I.L.R. (1948) Bom. 521:(A.I.R. (35) 1948 Bom. 337). Kulwant Sahay J., in Somar Singh v. Deonandan Prasad Singh, 6 Pat. 780 at p. 785 : (A. I. R. (14) 1927 Pat. 215)observed :

"Clause (2) of Art. 182 prescribes (where there has been an appeal) the date of the final decree or order of the appellate Court or withdrawal of the appeal'. There is nothing here to show that the appeal must be against the decree sought to be executed. In my opinion, the intention of the Legislature in making this provision was that, if an appeal in any way imperils the decree sought to be executed, then the date of the final disposal of the appeal should be the date from which the period of limitation ought to be computed."

In dismissing the application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council Dawson-Miller C.J.* observed :

"It is further well established that the test in such cases is whether the decree of the appellate Court imperils the validity of (sic) a final decree in a mortgage suit is imperilled by an appeal being preferred from the preliminary decree is tantamount to saying that, in consequence of the preferring of that appeal, questions at issue in the suit are still sub judice between the parties. As I have already said, one of the two principles underlying Art. 182, Limitation Act, is that, so long as any question at issue in the suit is still sub judice between the parties, a plaintiff who has obtained a decree ought not to be compelled to levy execution on his decree, and that as against him limitation ought not to begin to run until all such questions have been finally decided. If, therefore, the language used in Art. 182 is capable of bearing a construction which would enable the holder of a final decree for the sale of the mortgage property to defer applying for execution of his decree until a period of three years after the decision of an appeal against the preliminary decree is about to expire, such a construction ought to be put on it."

With the greatest respect, however, I entertain much doubt as to whether the construction put by Kulwant Sahay J. is a construction which the words themselves are capable of bearing, and if, as Madhavan Nair J. in Ahammad Kutty v. Kottakkat Kuttu, 56 Mad. 458 : (A.I.R. (20) 1933 Mad. 315) pointed out, it is open to the decree-holder instead of applying to levy execution on the final decree, which he has already obtained, to apply for a fresh final decree to be passed, there is the less reason to have resort to an unduly forced construction. Dawson-Miller C. J., while endorsing the test applied by Kulwant Sahay J. also observed :

"It seems to follow, therefore, as a matter of course, that the appeal in this case was not only an appeal from the preliminary decree but an appeal from all that naturally followed by the passing of that decree, namely, the final decree for sale which, after all, is merely part of the machinery prescribed for carrying out the direction for sale contained in the preliminary decree."

This suggests that His Lordship was not prepared to give a more extended meaning to the word 'appeal' than was absolutely necessary for the purposes of that particular case.

[3] The decisions of this Court to which I have just referred are of importance only in so far as in them, for the first time, since 1879, a gloss was put on the word 'appeal' as it occurs in Cl. (2) of Art. 182 and, in consequence of them, a further and much more serious gloss was put on that word in certain decisions of the Madras High Court. The decisions in question are Sriramachandra Rao v. Venkateshwara Rao, I.L.R. (1939) Mad. 252 : (A.I.R. (26) 1939 Mad. 157) and Thandavaroya Gramani v. Arumughamudali, A. I. R. (32) 1945 Mad. 261 : (1945-1 M. L. J. 421). In each of them another decision of this Court, namely, Firm Dedhraj Lachminarain v. Bhagwan Das, 16 Pat. 306 : (A. I. R. (24) 1937 Pat. 337) was cited and relied on. In that case, as also in two of the three Madras cases, the question that arose was the question which we now have to decide, namely, whether, in the event of an application being made to have an ex parte decree set aside and an appeal being preferred against an order rejecting the application, the period of limitation for the execution of the decree is to be computed from the date of the ex parte decree or from the date of the order of the appellate Court finally dismissing the application under O. 9, R. 13, Civil P. C. Courtney-Terrell C. J. and James J. held that limitation did not commence to run before the order of the appellate Court affirming the order rejecting the application to have the ex parte decree set aside. In doing so, Courtney-Terrell, C. J. expressed the opinion that the long series of decisions to the contrary had been impliedly overruled by the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Nagendra Nath Dey v. Suresh Chandra De, 59 I. A. 283 : (A. I. R. (19) 1932 P. C. 165). I will defer, for the moment, examining this point or dealing with the reasoning contained in the judgment of the learned Chief Justice as Mr. S. K. Dutta, for the appellants, did not support that reasoning in its entirety and relied mainly on the Madras decisions to which I have just referred. The argument put forward by Mr. Dutta was, in short, that an appeal against an order rejecting an application to have an ex parte decree set aside is an order made in an appeal in the suit which is likely to affect the decree sought to be executed. It must be conceded that, if the decisions of the Madras High Court are correct, there is much substance in the argument put forward by Mr. Dutta. In Sriramchandra Rao v. Venkateshwara Rao, I.L.R. (1939) Mad. 252 : (A. I. R. (26) 1939 Mad. 157), King J., expressed the opinion that 'appeal' in Col. 3 of Art. 182 means an appeal in the suit which is likely to affect the decree sought to be executed and not merely an appeal against the actual decree or order sought to be executed. Kulwant Sahay J. had taken the view that the word 'appeal' ought to be construed as meaning an appeal which results in the decree of which execution is sought being imperilled, and, as I have already said, an attempt to so construe the word can be justified by one of the two principles underlying Art. 182. No such justification, however, exists for putting on the word 'appeal' the more extended meaning given to it by King J. It is quite clear that no issue arising in the suit again becomes sub judice between the parties when an application is made for an ex parte decree to be set aside or when an appeal is preferred against an order rejecting such an application. No such issue can become sub judice unless and until the ex parte decree is set aside and the suit is ordered to be re-heard.

[4] If the intention of the Legislature was that, when an appeal was preferred against an order declining to set aside ex parte decree and was unsuccessful, limitation should begin to run from the date of the order of the appellate Court, it must also have been its intention that, when no appeal was preferred, limitation should begin to run from the date of the order of the trial Court. There are, however, even more serious difficulties in the way of imputing such an intention to it. In Firm Dedhraj Lachminarayan v. Bhagwan Das, 16 Pat. 306 : (A.I.R. (24) 1937 Pat. 337), Courtney-Terrell C. J. expressed the opinion that an application to have an ex parte decree set aside was in essence an application for review of judgment. The law of limitation is part of the law of procedure and the existing Limitation Act and Civil Procedure Code were enacted by the Legislature in one and the same session. The provisions in the one statute must be read along with the provisions in the other. Now, the expression "review of judgment" occurs also in Ss. 5 and 12 and in Arts. 161, 162 and 173, Limitation Act, and, quite clearly, there bears exactly the same meaning as it does in O. 47, Civil P. C. How can it be said that in using it in Art. 182, the Legislature intended it to bear a very different meaning? There is the further difficulty pointed out by Fazl Ali J. in Mohammad Naqir v. Alauddin Ahmad, 20 Pat. 513 : (A. I. R. (28) 1941 Pat. 213), namely, that the words "where there has been a review of judgment" cannot mean "where there has been an application for review of judgment". Courtney-Terrell C. J. was of opinion that when an application for review of judgment was rejected, Cl. (3) of Art. 182 applied and that, when such an application had been granted and an objection taken by way of appeal was later sustained, Cl. (2) applied. Mr. G. C. Mukharji, who appears for the appellants in the second appeal in which this reference has been made and whom we, therefore, permitted to address us and who took a somewhat different line to that adopted by Mr. Dutta, was unable to support this part of the judgment of the learned Chief Justice. Mr. Mukharji suggested that in the latter case cl. (3) and not cl. (2) applied, the order of the appellate Court declining to allow a review, being the decision passed on review. In such a case, Mr. Mukharji asked, what was the starting point for limitation if it was not the date of the order allowing the objection taken to the granting of the application for review? I see no difficulty in this. When a trial Court decides to review its judgment, an entry is made in the suit register and its order operates as a stay of execution. If and when an objection to that order is upheld on appeal, the stay is automatically vacated. Limitation runs from the date of the decree but under S. 15 of the Act the decree-holder is entitled to exclude the period during which he has been prevented from executing his decree. The argument put forward by Mr. Mukharji may be more logical but it is, in my opinion, no less unsound.

[5] The judgment of Sir Courtney-Terrell C. J. proceeds on the assumption that the long and uniform series of decisions going back at least to 1878 were impliedly overruled by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Nagendra Nath Dey v. Suresh Chandra Dey, 59 I. A. 283 : (A. I. R. (19) 1932 P. C. 165). With the greatest respect, I should myself have thought it hazardous to make such an assumption when not a single one of the decisions was referred to and when the difficulties of construction in the way of taking a view different to that taken in them are so patent. Apart from this, it is, I think, plain that the point which their Lordships of the Judicial Committee had to consider was not at all the point with which we are concerned now. A final decree in a mortgage suit was obtained by certain co-mortgagees who had impleaded the other co-mortgagees in the suit as defendants. A question arose as between the plaintiffs and these defendants and what purported to be an appeal was preferred by the former against the decision of the trial Court on that question. In this appeal, while the co-mortgagees were made respondents the other defendants, that is, the judgment-debtors under the decree, were not. The appeal was dismissed as incompetent. When the decree was put into execution, it was contended by the judgment-debtors that the application was barred by limitation and the High Court of Calcutta upheld this contention on the ground, mainly, that it could not be said that there had been any appeal as the decree as a whole had never been imperilled. The Judicial Committee reversed the decision on the ground that, although the appeal was incompetent and although the judgment-debtors under it were not made parties, it had nevertheless been entertained and must be regarded as an appeal within the ordinary grammatical meaning of the word which was the meaning that it had in cl. (2) of Art. 182. The exact scope and effect of the judgment of Sir Dinshah Mulla have been the subject of elaborate decisions of the High Courts of Calcutta and Allahabad in Harish Chandra v. Dines Chandra, A. I. R. (33) 1946 Cal. 375 : (224 I. C. 111) and Kunwar Bahadur Singh v. Sheo Shankar, A. I. R. (37) 1950 ALL. 327. It will serve no useful purpose for me to repeat what has been said there. It is enough for me to say that I respectfully concur in the reasoning contained in the judgment of B. K. Mukharji J. Mr. Nandlal Untwallia, for the respondents, has drawn our attention to a very recent decision of the Supreme Court which, he suggests, is conclusive on the point before us. In Bhawanipore Banking Corporation Ltd. v. Gouri Shankar Sharma, A.I.R. (37) 1950 S. C. 6 : (1950 S. C. R. 25), a final decree in a mortgage suit was passed on 22-12-1941. No attempt was made to put the decree into execution until 9-4-1945. The reason was that the judgment-debtors under the decree had made an application under S. 36, Bengal Money-lenders Act. This application was dismissed for default in prosecution and an application under O. 9, R. 9, Civil P. C. to have it restored was dismissed. An appeal was preferred against the latter order and this appeal too was dismissed on 3-7-1944. It was contended on behalf of the decree-holder that limitation did not commence to run until 3-7-1944, and this contention was overruled. Fazl Ali J. expressed the opinion that the application under O. 9, R. 9 did not involve a review of the judgment thereby negativing the argument which commended itself to Courtney-Terrell C. J., and went on to point out that the word "appeal" in cl. (2) of Art. 182 meant an appeal from the decree of which execution was sought, thereby affirming the series of decisions which Courtney-Terrell C. J. had taken to have been impliedly overruled. The plea taken by Mr. Nandlal Untwallia for the respondents was, in my opinion, a sound one. I would answer the question that has been referred to us in the negative and say that Brijraj v. Nauratan Lal, 3 P. L. J. 119 : (A. I. R. (4) 1917 Pat. 157) was rightly decided and that Firm Dedhraj Lachminarayan v. Bhagwan Das, 16 Pat. 306 : (A. I. R. (24) 1937 Pat. 337) is not good law.

[6] Ramaswami J.—I agree that the question referred to the Full Bench should be answered in the negative, that Brijraj v. Nauratan Lal, 3 P. L. J. 119 : (A. I. R. (4) 1917 Pat. 157) is still good law and that Lachmi- narayan's case, 16 Pat. 306 : (A. I. R. (24) 1937 Pat. 337) is wrongly decided and should be overruled.

[7] Sarjoo Prosad J.—I entirely agree and have nothing further to add.

Hitlal Mahton — Appellant v. Kameshwar Singh Bahadur and others—Respondents.

A. F. A. D. No. 685 of 1948, D/- 14-9-1950.

(a) Tenancy Laws — Bihar Tenancy Act (VIII [8] of 1885), Ss. 26A, 148—Transferee not impleaded in rent suit—Effect.

Where in a village there is a custom by which the holding can be transferred without the consent of the landlord and such a transferee is not impleaded as defendant in the suit for rent by the landlord, the decree passed has the effect of a money decree and not a rent decree and the auction sale must be regarded as a money sale and not a rent sale. [Paras 8, 9]

(b) Tenancy Laws — Bihar Tenancy Act (VIII [8] of 1885), Sch, III, Art. 3—Real tenant not impleaded in rent suit—Dispossession.

Where the transferee of the holding, who is a real tenant, is not made a party to the rent suit his dispossession by the landlord auction-purchaser is really a dispossession by the landlord not through the process of Court. In such a case Art. 3 applies to suit brought by the transferee for possession. [Para 11]

B. C. De and M. K. Mukherji — for Appellant; S. N. Dutta, S. P. Srivastava, Baidyanath Jha and Bhagirathi Rai — for Respondents.

Rai J. — This is an appeal by the plaintiff against the judgment and decree of the Additional District Judge of Purnea confirming those of the Munsif of the same place. The plaintiff filed the suit for a declaration that his title in respect of the holding in suit had remained unaffected by the execution sale and subsequent delivery of possession, and re-settlement of the same by the defendant 1st party. He also prayed for recovery of possession.

[2] The facts leading to the present litigation are the following: There was a holding of 13 bighas, 8 kathas, 2 dhurs bearing a rental of Rs. 21-11-9. It had been mortgaged to the plaintiff and the defendants 3rd party. The mortgagees brought an action on the mortgage, obtained a decree and in execution of that decree they put to sale the said holding and purchased it themselves on 10-4-1929. On 22-2-1930, the sale was confirmed and on 29-3-1930, delivery of possession was given to the mortgagee auction-purchasers. There was subsequently a partition in the family of the plaintiff and the defendants 3rd party in which the holding in question fell to the share of the plaintiff. In the year 1930 the proprietor of the Darbhanga Raj filed Rent Suit No. 1709 of 1930 in respect of the holding in question against the original tenant, Srichand Mahton. In that suit for rent, the mortgagee auction purchasers were not impleaded as party-defendants. The rent suit was decreed, and in execution of that decree the landlord-decree-holder purchased it on 9-2-1934. On 28-10-1934, delivery of possession was given to the landlord auction purchaser. In 1937 the proprietor of the Darbhanga Raj settled it with one Ramjivan Singh who subsequently, in the year 1944, sold it to the defendants 2nd party. The present suit was filed on 17-10-1945.

[3] The plaintiff's case was that the sale in execution of the decree for rent only conveyed the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor in the holding to the auction-purchaser. According to him, the holding being transferable, the mortgagee auction-purchasers had become really the raiyats of the holding, and, as they had not been impleaded in the rent suit, the execution sale had the effect of a sale in execution of a money decree only. On this basis it was claimed that the right of the plaintiff was not affected by the sale and he was entitled to recovery of possession.

[4] The suit was contested by defendant 1 as well as by the settlee-defendants who contended that the holding was not transferable by custom, that the auction sale dated 9-2-1934, would be deemed to have passed the entire holding to the landlord auction-purchaser and it had not the effect of a sale in execution of a money decree only. The proprietor of the Darbhanga Raj was justified in bringing the rent suit against the original recorded tenant, Srichand Mahton, and the decree passed against him had the effect of a rent decree. The defendants contended that the right of the mortgagee auction-purchasers, if any, had been lost by the auction sale in execution of that rent decree. The defendants further contended that the suit of the plaintiff was barred by general and special law of limitation.

[5] The trial Court dismissed the suit. The decree of the trial Court was affirmed by the lower appellate Court also. Hence this second appeal.

[6] The lower appellate Court, after considering the various evidence on record, has come to the finding that the custom of transferability of occupancy holdings exists in Mohammadpur Sadik where the suit lands are situated. It also held that after the auction-purchase and delivery of possession in execution of the mortgage decree the mortgagee auction-purchasers came in possession of the holding. On the question of the right of the present plaintiff being affected by the auction-sale of 9-2-1934, the lower appellate Court was of opinion that as the mortgagee auction purchasers had not given notice to the landlord about their having purchased the holding in question the latter had every right to file the rent suit against the recorded tenant and the decree passed in such a suit had the effect of a rent decree. In this view of the matter, the entire holding had passed and the right of the mortgagee auction-purchasers had come to an end by that sale. On the question of limitation, the lower appellate Court held that if the sale in execution of the decree for rent be taken to have the effect of a sale in execution of a money decree, then the plaintiff's suit would be barred by limitation, as held by a Division Bench of this Court in the case of Mt. Deorati Kuer v. Dasarath Dubey, 21 P. L. T. 374: (A.I.R. (27) 1940 Pat. 476).

[7] Mr. De on behalf of the appellant submitted that once it has been found that there was a custom of transferability of occupancy holding in the village, the right of the mortgagee auction purchasers was complete on 10-4-1929, and non-mutation of their names in the sherista of the landlord would not affect their title. He stressed that the title of a purchaser of a transferable occupancy holding does not depend on the recognition by the landlord. In support of his contention he referred to an unreported decision of a Division Bench of this Court in Santilal Mahto v. Raj Darbhanga, Second Appeal 558 of 1947. It was a judgment between the family of the plaintiff and the present landlord defendant. In that decision it was held that in case of occupancy holdings transferable by custom the title of the purchaser cannot be affected by his failure to apply for mutation of his name in the landlord's sherista. In this connection, Mr. De also referred to the case of Ashok Bhuiyan v. Karim Bepari, 9 C.W.N. 843. In that case it was held :

> "There is no law rendering it obligatory on the tenants to get their names recorded in the landlord's sherista for the purpose of perfecting their title."

He also relied upon the case of Hargouri Prasad v. Raghunath Singh, 16 Pat. 239: (A.I.R. (24) 1937 Pat. 314), a Division Bench case of this Court. In that case, their Lordships, while discussing the rights of the transferees under the various clauses of the new amended S. 26, Bihar Tenancy Act, held as follows :

> "Now, as I have already stated, both these provisions apply to transfers made after the passing of the Bihar Tenancy (Amendment) Act. These sections have obviously no application where the holdings are transferable by custom and have been transferred before the commencement of the Act. In such cases the title of the transferee will be deemed to be perfect, even though the landlord may not have consented to the transfer."

[8] He also relied upon the decision in the case of Chamatkarini Dasi v. Triguna Nath, 17 C. W. N. 833 : (19 I. C. 989) in support of his contention that in absence of the mortgagee auction-purchasers the decree passed in the rent suit would have the effect of a money decree. In my opinion, there is much force in the contention of the learned counsel for the appellant.

[9] Mr. Dutt, the learned counsel for the respondents, in reply, submitted that the decree obtained by the landlord against the recorded tenants would have the effect of a rent decree. In this connection he referred to the provisions of the old S. 73, Bengal Tenancy Act, as it stood in the years 1930 and 1934. He contended that both transferor and transferee would be jointly and severally liable for the rent in absence of a notice as contemplated by that section. I do not think that this section can help the contention of the respondents. It appears to deal with voluntary transfers and it provides for the liability of the transferor and the transferee. It does not provide that the decree for rent against the transferor only will have the effect of a rent decree or the sale in execution of such decree will extinguish the right of the transferee as well. Mr. Dutt further relied upon the decision in the case of Azgar Ali v. Asaboddin Kazi, 9 C. W. N. 134. He specifically relied upon the following passage in the judgment of that case :

> "Now it is settled beyond the possibility of dispute that when a landlord obtains a decree for rent against his registered tenant, the defaulting holding may be sold in execution of such a decree, although it may have previously passed into the hands of persons other than the judgment-debtor and such unrecorded transferees would be bound by the sale."

But the facts of that case are distinguishable. It does not appear that the holding under consideration in that case was a holding transferable by custom. Besides in that case the transfer was of a portion of the holding. The learned Judges in that case were considering the right of the transferee to file an objection under S. 244, Civil P. C. as it then stood, and while considering the provisions of that section, they held that the transferee in that case was bound by the decree. Mr. Dutt further relied on the decision in the case of Rameshwar Singh v. Mt. Rajo Chowdhrain, 7 P. L. T. 625 : (A.I.R. (13) 1926 Pat. 210), but this case also is of no assistance to the respondents. In that case their Lordships were considering the propriety of the order passed by the Court below in an application filed under O. 21, R. 58, Civil P. C. The application had been filed by a transferee of a portion of the holding whose name had not been recorded in the landlord's sherista. Their Lordships held that the application was not maintainable. They were not considering the right of a transferee of the entire holding transferable by custom. In my judgment, the auction sale in execution of the decree for rent did not extinguish the title of the mortgagee auction-purchasers, which subsequently vested in the plaintiff alone by virtue of a partition in his family.

[10] But this alone will not help the plaintiff-appellant. The Court of appeal below has found and I think justly, that the present suit is barred by limitation. In the plaint, the plaintiff has mentioned his cause of action to have arisen on 28-10-1934, when delivery of possession was given to the landlord auction-purchaser. The lower appellate Court has held that the present plaintiff was dispossessed from this date by the landlord and the present suit having been instituted on 17-10-1945, was barred by limitation under the provisions of Sch. III, Art. 3, Bihar Tenancy Act, which runs as follows :

Description of suit.	Period of Limitation.	Time from which period begins to run.
"3. To recover possession of land claimed by the plaintiff as a raiyat or an under-raiyat.	Two years.	The date of dispossession."

[11] Mr. De, the learned counsel for the appellant, relied upon the decision of a Special Bench of this Court in the case of Gajadhar Rai v. Ram Charan Gope, 9 Pat. 788 : (A.I.R. (17) 1930 Pat. 256 S.B.). He contended that when the dispossession is by the landlord auction-purchaser by taking delivery of possession through the help of Court, it is not a dispossession by the landlord. He referred to the following passage from the judgment :

"It follows, therefore, that the weight of authority is clearly in favour of the view that Art. 3 of Sch. III, Bengal Tenancy Act, does not apply if the dispossession is by the landlord as an auction-purchaser of the holding."

But this decision can be of no assistance to the appellant. In this case the sale was in execution of a rent decree and the entire holding had passed by the sale. The judgment-debtor was the real raiyat, and hence it was held there that he was dispossessed through the instrumentality of the Court. In the present case, the plaintiff was not a party to the execution proceedings and he cannot in law be deemed to have been dispossessed by any process of the Court. While dealing with the case of Mt. Deorati Kuer v. Dasrath Dubey, 21 P. L. T. 374 : (A. I. R. (27) 1940 Pat. 476), which had been relied upon by the Court below, Mr. De submitted that in that case the dispossession was some time after the delivery of possession and hence the decision that Art. 3, Sch. III, Bihar Tenancy Act applies to a case where the landlord auction-purchaser gets possession in execution of a money decree, is really obiter. But apart from this decision, on the case of the plaintiff himself it was a case of dispossession by the landlord. The present plaintiff was not a judgment-debtor and his dispossession on 28-10-1934, was really the dispossession by the landlord not through the process of Court because the Court had no jurisdiction to dispossess the present plaintiff who was not a judgment-debtor.

[12] In my opinion, the judgment of the Court of appeal below was correct when it held that the suit of the plaintiff was barred by limitation.

[13] The result is that the decree passed by the Court of appeal below is upheld. The appeal fails and is hereby dismissed with costs.

[14] Imam J. — I agree that the appeal be dismissed, but would like to make a few observations of my own. Two principal questions have arisen in this case which require to be decided. The first one is as to whether the decree which the landlord obtained in Rent Suit No. 1709 of 1930 and the auction sale which followed its execution had the effect of a money decree and a money sale, or they had the effect of a rent decree and a rent sale. In the rent suit, the mortgagees of the holding had not been impleaded as defendants. The question for consideration is whether it was necessary to have impleaded them as defendants in the said rent suit in order that the decree in the said rent suit should have the effect of a rent decree and the auction sale which followed should have the effect of a rent sale. It has been found as a fact that there is a custom in the village, where the holding is situated, to the effect that a transfer of an occupancy holding can take place without the consent of the landlord. The custom pleaded and proved, however, does not show that the landlord must have notice of the transfer in order to make it effective and valid. At the time when the decree for rent was obtained by the landlord, there was no provision under the Bihar Tenancy Act which required that notice of the transfer should be given to the landlord in order to make it an effective and a valid transfer. It follows from this that when a transfer of an occupancy holding takes place in the village, where there is a custom of transferability, it is a valid transfer without notice of it to the landlord and it is effective from the moment it takes place. In the present case, the mortgagees of the holding, who had obtained a decree and in execution of it had auction-purchased the holding, were the real tenants and not the original tenant Srichand Mahto. The mortgagees not having been impleaded as defendants in the suit for rent brought by the landlord, the said suit for rent was brought against a person who was no longer a tenant of the holding. Between that person and the landlord, at the time the rent suit was decreed, there subsisted no relationship of landlord and tenant. The decree obtained in the said suit, therefore, must have the effect of a money decree and not a rent decree, and the auction sale which took place in execution of the said decree must be regarded as a money sale and not a rent sale.

[15] The second question to be decided is as to whether the general law of limitation or the special law of limitation under the Bihar Tenancy Act is applicable to the facts of the present case. There can be, in my opinion, no doubt on the decision of this Court in Gajadhar Rai v. Ram Charan Gope, 9 Pat. 788 : (A. I. R. (17) 1930 Pat. 256 S. B.), that if the holding had been sold in execution of the decree for rent obtained by the landlord and not merely the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor, then the special law of limitation under the Bihar Tenancy Act would not be applicable. I am, however, of the opinion that the holding in the present case was not sold in execution of the decree for rent obtained by the landlord, because the tenant to whom the holding belonged at the time had not been impleaded in the rent suit as a defendant and there was no relationship of landlord and tenant between the judgment-debtor of the rent suit and the decree-holder. The dispossession of the mortgagees, which took place after the decree-holder had auction-purchased, was by the landlord as the relationship of landlord and tenant subsisted at the time between them and the decree-holder. The order of the executing Court was to dispossess the judgment-debtor, who was at the time not in possession, and not the tenant of the landlord. When the mortgagees were dispossessed, it could hardly be said that they were dispossessed at the instance of the Court and not by the landlord. In the circumstances, in my opinion, the provisions of Art. 3, Sch. III, Bihar Tenancy Act, apply and the suit was barred.

Raj Kishore Prasad and Shivanugrah Narain — for Petitioner; Government Pleader — for Opposite Party.

Rai J.—This is an application by the plaintiff against the order of Mr. A. Rashid, Small Cause Court Judge of Gopalganj, impounding a document filed on behalf of the plaintiff in the suit and asking the office to assess stamp duty and penalty chargeable under the law.

[2] The plaintiff, the Sasa Musa Sugar Mills Ltd., brought a suit in the Small Cause Court, Gopalganj, for recovery of the price of sugarcane seed which the defendant-opposite party 1 had taken from the plaintiff under an agreement executed by him. This agreement was exhibited in the action as Ex. 1. It is unstamped. It has been incorporated in a printed form and is not attested by any witness. The trial Court came to the conclusion that the document is chargeable with stamp duty under Art. 5, cl. (c) of Sch. 1, Stamp Act. The Court below, therefore, ordered that the document be impounded under S. 33 of the Act.

[3] Mr. Raj Kishore Prasad, learned Advocate for the petitioner, contends that the agreement in question would be covered by the Exemption (a) to Art. 5, Sch. 1, Stamp Act.

Article 5 with the relevant Exemption runs as follows :

Description of Instrument.	Proper stamp duty.
5. AGREEMENT OR MEMORANDUM OF AN AGREEMENT.
(a) If relating to the sale of a bill of exchange.	Two annas.
(b) if relating to the sale of Government security of share in an incorporated company or other body corporate.	Subject to a maximum of ten rupees, one anna for every Rs. 10,000 or part thereof of the value of the security or share.
(c) if not otherwise provided for.	Eight annas.
Exemptions.
Agreement or memorandum of agreement— (a) for or relating to the sale of goods or merchandise exclusively, not being a Note on Memorandum chargeable under No. 43 :

He contends that the agreement in question is in substance an agreement for sale of sugarcane crop and the other matters mentioned in the agreement are merely incidental to the agreement for sale and, as such the document, according to him, is admissible without any stamp. In support of his argument, he cited a Special Bench decision of the Allahabad High Court in the case of L. H. Sugar Factory Pilibhit v. Moti, I. L. R. (1941) ALL. 471, also reported in A. I. R. (28) 1941 ALL. 243 (F. B.). He relied upon the view taken by the learned Judges who were in majority in the Special Bench. The Special Bench had to deal with a local enactment apart from the provisions of the Stamp Act. In that case also the document under consideration was one executed by an agriculturist for supply of sugar-cane to a sugar factory. Though the terms of the document under consideration in that Special Bench case are not exactly the same as those incorporated in the document in question, yet Mr. Rajkishore Prasad emphasised the view taken by the majority of the Judges on the interpretation of Exemption (a) to Art. 5, Sch. 1, Stamp Act. The Special Bench case of L. H. Sugar Factory Pilibhit v. Moti, I. L. R. (1941) ALL. 471: (A. I. R. (28) 1941 ALL. 243 F. B.), aforesaid refers to some other previous decision of the Allahabad High Court as well as to decisions of the Calcutta, Madras and Bombay High Courts. I have carefully gone through the judgment of the Special Bench of the Allahabad High Court quoted above. But I regret to say that I do not agree with the opinion of the Judges who were in majority so far as the interpretation of Exemption (a) to Art. 5, Sch. 1, Stamp Act, is concerned. I respectfully agree with the opinion of the Judges who were in minority specially that of Verma J. regarding the meaning of the word "exclusively" occurring in the said Exemption (a).

[4] On this point the judgment of Verma J. runs as follows:

"Mr. Pathak contends that the word "exclusively" qualifies "goods" or "merchandise". He, therefore, argues that the agreement in the present case being to sell certain goods alone (namely, the sugar-cane crop), and to sell nothing else, the exemption is applicable. The argument in my opinion is not well founded. The word "exclusively" is an adverb and cannot qualify a noun. In my judgment what it qualifies here is the preposition "for" and the participle "relating", or the phrase "for, or relating to, the sale of", introduced by the preposition and the participle, all of which it can qualify under the rules of grammar."

In my judgment, this Exemption is confined to an agreement which deals solely with the sale of goods or merchandise. It cannot be extended to an agreement incorporating several items in addition to an agreement for sale of goods or merchandise. The heading of the document in question shows that it is satta (agreement) in respect of seed, manure, sanai and plough. The relevant portion of the document in question runs as follows:

"The Sasa Musa Sugar Mills Limited, Sasa, Musa, Saran.

Satta in respect of seed, manure, sanai and plough, circle No. 5, Season 1945-46, Satta No. 121.

Whereas, I, executant No. 1, have to cultivate Sugarcane No. 313 in my kasht land and have to sow good Sugar-cane seeds in order to have good out-turn of produce. When the sugar-cane crop will be ready, I shall have to sell it to the said Mills. Therefore, we, the executants, of our own free will and accord, in a sound state of our body and mind, have taken 14 maunds of manure at the rate of -/15/- per maund amounting to Rs. 13-2 as advance for 1 Katha of land bearing survey No. 252 and as per boundaries specified below in village Rampore Babu which we shall cultivate. Through, and on the security of, executant No. 2, I received manure in one lump sum as peshgi seed and manure. I do hereby declare that when the said Company within the period from 23-2-1946 to 31-5-1947 will demand it from me, the executant No. 1, without any objection I shall carry it on my cart, and take it to the garh or station of Sasa Musa Sugar Mills Limited, Sasa, Musa, Saran, in accordance with the order of the proprietor of the Mill and get it weighed. According to the rate fixed by Government he shall take the price of the sugar-cane from me, executant No. 1, after setting off the price of the seeds and manure he shall take the balance of the price.

If the sugar-cane be dried up, rotten and very ripe or unripe, i. e., if it be damaged in any way, the said mill shall have full right either to take it or not to take it.

If on any account the mill be closed, the said mill neither is nor shall be liable to pay damage to any extent for the loss of the sugarcane. So long as the entire (produce) is not weighed, the field and the entire produce of the field shall remain mortgaged and hypothecated to the said Company.

I shall have no right to dispose of the said produce to any other person in any way. If any action of me or my family or my heirs be contrary to this, the Company shall be competent to take such civil and criminal proceedings as the said Company may deem proper against me or my family.

I declare that I have executed this satta as a karta of the joint family on behalf of all the members and that neither I nor any member of my family has executed any satta in favour of any other Company, agent and thikadar.

The Company shall realize without objection from the person and movable and immovable properties of us, the executants, by instituting a suit in the Court without damage.

We have, therefore, executed this agreement satta in respect of sugar-cane, seeds, manure, sanai and plough so that it may be of use when required."

[5] So, from the document itself it is clear that it cannot be said to be an agreement or memorandum of agreement for or relating to the sale of goods or merchandise exclusively. In my judgment, therefore, the document is clearly liable to stamp duty under Art. 5, Cl. (c) of Sch. 1, Stamp Act. Though Art. 41, Sch. 1, Stamp Act, provides for the stamp duty in respect of mortgage of a crop, it cannot cover all the agreements as contemplated by the document in question. Article 41, Sch. 1, Stamp Act, runs as follows :

Description of Instrument.	Proper Stamp duty.
41. MORTGAGE OF A CROP, including any instrument evidencing an agreement to secure the repayment of a loan made upon any mortgage of a crop, whether the crop is or is not in existence at the time of the mortgage—
(a) When the loan is repayable not more than three months from the date of the instrument—for every sum secured not exceeding Rs. 200.	one anna.
and for every Rs. 200 or part thereof secured in excess of Rs. 200 ;	one anna.
(b) When the loan is repayable more than three months, but not more than eighteen months, from the date of the instrument—for every sum secured not exceeding Rs. 100.	Two annas.
and for every Rs. 100 or part thereof secured in excess of Rs. 100.	Two annas".

Article 41, therefore, cannot be a bar to the applicability of Art. 5, cl. (c) of the Act. The Government Pleader representing the State of Bihar supported the order of the Court below on the ground that the document should be assessed to duty in accordance with the provisions of Art. 5, cl. (c), Sch. I, Stamp Act. He further submitted that, in accordance with the provisions of S. 6, Stamp Act, even though a portion of the document is covered by the provisions of Art. 41, Sch. I, Stamp Act, a higher duty as provided for by Art. 5, cl. (c) would be leviable in the present case. Section 6, Stamp Act, runs as follows :

"Instruments coming within several descriptions in Schedule I : Subject to the provisions of the last preceding section, an instrument so framed as to come within two or more of the descriptions in Schedule I, shall, where the duties chargeable thereunder are different, be chargeable only with the highest of such duties :

Provided that nothing in this Act contained shall render chargeable with duty exceeding one rupee a counterpart of duplicate of any instrument chargeable with duty and in respect of which the proper duty has been paid."

In my view, there is much force in the contention of the learned Government Pleader.

[6] The result is that the order passed by the Court below is upheld and the present rule is discharged. Under the circumstances of the present case there would be no order as to costs.

[7] Sinha J.—I agree.

[8] The universally accepted rule of construction of a document, with reference to its character as to under what part of the charging section or rule or article of the taxing statute it comes under, is that the document should be read as a whole. Under S. 6, Stamp Act, an instrument coming within two or more of the descriptions in Sch. I of the Act is chargeable only with the highest duty for one of such descriptions. Read as a whole, there is doubt that the document in question has the dual character of being an agreement for sale of sugar-cane and a mortgage of the sugar-cane produce until the entire dues advanced under the document are satisfied. That being so, it is chargeable with the higher duty under Art. 5 (c), Stamp Act. But it was argued on behalf of the petitioner that this document is one relating to a "document . . . for or relating to the sale of goods or merchandise exclusively". The question whether the word "exclusively" governs only the words "goods or merchandise", as contended for on behalf of the petitioner, or the entire clause beginning with the word "for" has been very exhaustively dealt with by a Special Bench of the Allahabad High Court in the case of L. H. Sugar Factories, Pilibhit v Moti, I. L. R. (1941) ALL. 471 : (A. I. R. (28) 1941 ALL. 243 F. B.). For the reasons given by Verma and Mulla JJ., who were in a minority, I would hold that the word "exclusively" governs the entire clause, and not only the words "goods or merchandise", though the majority of their Lordships constituting the Special Bench in that case were of the opposite view. The view that we have taken of the construction of the exemption in cl. (a) to cl. (c) Art. 5, Stamp Act, is in accord with the opinion of the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in a reference under the Stamp Act In re Board of Revenue, 58 ALL. 1083 : (A. I. R. (23) 1936 ALL. 481 F. B.), though the document before their Lordships in that case was not entirely of the same character. An earlier decision of a Full Bench of five Judges of the Allahabad High Court in In the matter of Gajraj Singh, 9 ALL. 585 : (1887 A. W. N. 190) also supports the principle underlying our decision. It must, therefore, be held that the decision of the Court below on the question of stamp duty leviable on the document in question is correct.

[9] The rule is accordingly discharged, but in the circumstances, there will be no order as to costs.

K.S. Rule discharged.

SHEARER, RAMASWAMI AND SARJOO PRASAD JJ.

In the matter of the Bharati Press; Sm. Shaila Bala Devi — Petitioner v. The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bihar — Opposite Party.

Misc. Judicial Case No. 220 of 1949, D/- 13-10-1950.

(a) Press (Emergency Powers) Act (1931), S. 28 — Service of notice by affixing a copy on press — Copy of offending pamphlet mentioned in schedule to notice not attached to copy of notice — Omission does not affect validity of notice itself — Irregularity, if any, does not vitiate legality of order demanding security when there is no prejudice from such omission. [Para 5]

(b) Press (Emergency Powers) Act (1931), Ss. 4 (1) and 23 — Notice specifying that the offending pamphlet was of the nature described in cl. (a) to S. 4 (1) — Objection in notice referring to entire pamphlet and not to any particular words or passages used — Court has power under S. 23 to enquire whether the offending pamphlet comes under any other clause of S. 4 (1) even though it is not mentioned in the notice — Defect in frame of notice of such character is of no consequence. [Para 7]

Anno. Press (Em. Powers) Act, S. 23 N. 1.

(c) Press (Emergency Powers) Act (1931), S. 4 (1) (a) and (d) — Applicability.

A pamphlet entitled 'Sangram' written in Bengali contained a clear invocation to the readers to join a total and deadly struggle to bring about a revolution by violence resulting in complete annihilation of those whom the writer considered as 'oppressors' or who were directors of wrong and injustice or who took part in parochial national politics or who brought into disgrace the mother tongue. There were no words in the pamphlet which could be said to refer to the State Government. The persons against whom the attack was made were not clearly defined and could not be said to be 'a definite or ascertained class' :

Held, on a consideration of the entire pamphlet that it fell within the mischief of S. 4 (1) (a) and not S. 4 (1) (d). [Paras 7, 8, 24]

Anno. Press (Em. Powers) Act, S. 4. N. 2 and 5.

(d) Press (Emergency Powers) Act (1931), S. 4 (1) (a) and (b) — Validity of — Constitution of India, Arts. 13 and 19.

(Per Sarjoo Prasad and Ramaswami JJ.; Shearer J. dissenting) : Clauses (a) and (b), Press Act, are worded in general terms and apply both to aggravated forms of offences like political assasinations as also to ordinary murders or congizable offences involving violence. They are not directed mainly and solely towards crimes of violence and political assasinations which undermine the security of, or tend to overthrow, the State. They are inconsistent with the fundamental right given under Art. 19 (1) (a) of the Constitution and as such void by virtue of Art. 13 (1) and are not saved as permissible legislation under Art. 19 (2) of the Constitution as the language of these clauses is not severable : A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 124 and A.I.R. (37) 1950 S.C. 129, Rel. on. [Paras 11, 12, 30, 32, 35]

The provisions of S. 4 (1) (a) and (b) cannot be justified under Art. 19 (2) of the Constitution on the ground that they relate to matters which offend 'against decency and morality' as these expressions have been given a narrower connotation in the Penal Code and may be deemed to have been used in the same sense in Art. 19 (2) of the Constitution as well. [Para 12a]

Consequently, an order demanding security under S. 3 (3), Press Act, for violation of S. 4 (1) (a) of that Act is void and must be quashed. [Paras 12, 35]

Per Shearer J. — The provisions of S. 4 (1) (a) and (b) which enable security to be demanded from the keeper of a printing press, are not inconsistent with the fundamental right of freedom of speech and expression conferred by Art. 19 (1) (a) of the Constitution. The taking of security is not something alien and repugnant to the concept of the freedom of the press. The word 'expression' in Art. 19 (1) (a) does not give an implied right to the writers and authors to obtain the services of printers to enable them to reach the widest possible public. Even if it be assumed that these clauses impose a restriction on the fundamental right possessed by the printer they are part of the law relating to seditious libel and therefore are saved by Art. 19 (2) of the Constitution. [Paras 17, 18, and 19]

Anno. Press (Em. Powers) Act, S. 4 N. 2 and 3.

B. C. Ghosh — for Petitioner. Advocate-General, Government Advocate and S. C. Chakravarty — for Opposite Party.

Sarjoo Prasad J. — In this case the petitioner, who is the keeper of the Bharati Press, Purulia, has moved under S. 23, Press (Emergency Powers) Act (XXIII [23] of 1931) (hereinafter called the Press Act) for setting aside an order calling upon him to deposit security under sub-s. (3) of S. 3 of the said Act.

[2] On 9-9-1949, a notice was served by affixing a copy thereof on the premises of the said Bharati Press. The notice is dated Ranchi 8-9-1949, and is addressed to the keeper of the Bharati Press, Purulia. It has been signed by one B. K. Dutt, described as Under Secretary to Government and "by order of the Governor of Bihar" requiring the said keeper to deposit with the Deputy Commissioner, Manbhum, on or before 19-9-1949, security to the amount of Rs. 2,000 in money or in Government securities. This demand for security, as appears from the notice, has been made under sub-s. (3) of S. 3, Press Act, and the notice further recites that the demand for security has been made inasmuch as "it appears to the Governor of Bihar that the Bharati Press, Purulia, is used for the purpose of printing and publishing matters specified in the schedule annexed hereto which are of the nature described in cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of S. 4, Press (Emergency Powers) Act, 1931, (XXIII [23] of 1931)."

In the schedule to the notice is mentioned "The Bengalee leaflet entitled 'Sangram'."

[3] The petitioner in his application challenges the validity of the demand of security mainly on two grounds : Firstly that the said notice demanding security from the petitioner is illegal because it does not state the "words, signs or visible representations" of the nature described in sub-s. (1) of S. 4, Press Act; and secondly that the Bengali leaflet entitled 'Sangram' does not contain any "words, signs or visible representations" of the nature described in sub-s. (1) of S. 4, Press Act. There was a further ground taken in the petition itself which was to the effect that the press of the petitioner did not print or publish any leaflet entitled 'Sangram' that is of the nature described in cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of S. 4, Press Act. But it has been conceded in argument before the Court that the leaflet in question had been printed and published by the press of the petitioner. Therefore, so far as the factum of printing and publication of the offending document is concerned, there seems to be no dispute. The arguments have thus been confined to the two points stated above as also to a further point which was subsequently raised by the learned counsel for the petitioner for the first time in arguments before the Court. The point is one of constitutional importance. It is to the effect that S. 4 (1), Press Act, is inconsistent with Art. 19 (1) (a) of the Constitution of India, and, as such, is void; and, therefore, the State Government or the Provincial Government had no jurisdiction to take any action against the petitioner on account of any violation of the said provision of the Press Act.

[4] The learned Government Advocate on behalf of the State objected to the last question being raised at a late stage of the hearing. The point being one of constitutional importance, the learned Government Advocate claimed that he should have been given sufficient notice of the matter and the petitioner, therefore, should not be allowed to raise this question. It is true that this constitutional point has been raised at a very late stage of the proceedings and ordinarily the Court would have been disinclined to entertain it, but as the question is one of importance and affects the very jurisdiction of the State Government to take action under the specified provisions of the Press Act, the petitioner could not be shut out from raising the question even though at a late stage of the proceedings.

[5] The records disclose that a copy of the offending leaflet 'Sangram' was not attached to the notice which was served on the petitioner; nor does it appear that the notice in question specified any "words, signs or visible representations" contained in the document which in the opinion of the State Government constituted an incitement to or encouraged, or tended to incite or encourage the commission of any offence of murder or any cognizable offence involving violence as contemplated by S. 4 (1) (a), Press Act. On behalf of the petitioner it has been contended that it was very material that a copy of the offending pamphlet should have formed a part of the notice, and the objectionable passages contained in the pamphlet should have been specified in the body of the notice. It is argued that the failure to specify those passages affected the validity of the notice and the legality of the demand for security. Now, under S. 28, Press Act, a notice which is directed to keeper of a press could be served by affixing a copy thereof to some conspicuous part of the place where the press is situate, provided the service could not, in spite of due diligence, be effected in the manner provided for the service of summonses under the Code of Criminal Procedure. I have already stated that the service in this case was effected by affixing a copy of the notice on the premises of the Bharati Press. It would have been certainly desirable to attach to the notice a copy of the pamphlet mentioned in the schedule thereof; but it does not, in my opinion, affect the validity of the notice itself. At least it amounts to some irregularity. On behalf of the State an affidavit has been filed which has been sworn to by one Rajeshwar Prasad, an assistant in the office of the Political Department, Special Section, Government of Bihar. To the affidavit has been attached a copy of the pamphlet 'Sangram,' which has been marked EX. A, with an English translation thereof. Since it has not been disputed that this document was actually printed by the press in question and that this was the document mentioned in the schedule to the notice, there does not appear to have been any prejudice to the petitioner, and, therefore, the irregularity in not attaching a copy of the pamphlet mentioned in the schedule at the time of the service of notice did not vitiate the legality of the order demanding security from the petitioner. The other question, namely, that the offending passages in the document were not specified in the notice is also not very material in this case. Where the objection is not only to any particular passage or passages in the document but to the document as a whole, then no passage or passages can possibly be specified as the objection does not relate to any particular passage but to the whole tenor of the document which has the undesirable effect as contemplated by S. 4 (1) (a), Press Act.

[6] The question then arises whether the document in question is of such a character as is described in S. 4 (1) (a) of the Act. If we are not satisfied that it is of such a nature, then it is open to this Court under S. 25, Press Act, to set aside the order demanding security from the petitioner. As the English translation of the document which formed a part of the affidavit filed on behalf of Government was objected to as not being an accurate translation of the original so as to give a correct impression of the tenor and contents of the document, we have had the document translated by a translator of this Court. I have read the document both in original as also from a Romanised copy thereof and I have also read the aforesaid translations. The document is written in high-flown Bengali language and contains a good deal of demagogic claptrap with some pretence to poetic flourish. The first few paragraphs indicate that the writer of the document finds wrong and tyranny pervading all over, from the past to the future. It says that history records the names of those who struggled against this tyranny in the past, and so shall history record the names of those who struggle against it in the future. The writer says he is starving and begging for a fight and his revolt is against oppression, fascism and wrongful harassment. He, therefore, calls upon everyone to join the struggle and to build a new world order by bringing about a complete revolution. So far there could not be anything objectionable in the pamphlet because revolution can be both by constitutional or non-violent methods and it can also be by a bloody and violent struggle resulting in death and carnage on a mass scale. As the subsequent paras of the document indicate, the revolution contemplated by the writer is not a non-violent or constitutional revolution but a revolution of the last category, namely, a revolution brought about by bloodshed and destruction. He wants revolution and wants destruction; through struggle and revolution the world is to be built anew after the oppressors have perished. He says that this struggle has to be brought about by courting death and suffering and the struggle is directed personally against those who are directors of the wrong and the injustice. The writer thinks that there is no protection against the oppressor except by standing up to fight in a body and destroy the oppressor. In one of the paragraphs the writer says :

"Ore nirboth atyachari-chokh rangiye gala mota kore jujurbhoy dekhata chas-dekhas. Bhoy kari na. . . . . tao sankirna rastra niti birudhe amar pratibad" which freely translated means : "Oh thou foolish oppressor, you want to cause abject terror in me with your red eyes and full throated voice—do that, I am not afraid. . . . My protest is against parochial national politics."

In another passage the writer says :

"Mrityu amar gopal priya; bish amar paniy, dabanal shikha snigdha batas, Shata putrahin jananir krandan amar Bansharir ekti sur, priyahara priyar (bindhabar) krandan amar ganer ekti koli" which means "death is my secret love; poison is my drink; the flames of fire are my sweet breeze; the wailing of a hundred bereaved childless mothers is just a tune in my flute; the weeping of widows at their widowhood is just a rhythm of my song."

In other words, the passage suggests that even if hundreds of persons die in the struggle, it should not make any difference at all and in fact the dire consequences should be welcomed without caring for the wails and tears of bereaved mothers and widows. In another passage the writer further says :

"Ami Amashan; ami amashan bashini mashan charini, rakta lolup Kali. Mahamari durbhikhra amar ullas . . . trisnarta ami chai rakta . . . ami chai biplab . . . ami chai sangram. Rakte ami chai satya; biplabe ami chai nyay, sangrame sangrame ami chai biswas, chhinr chhinr re anyay shikal. Bhang bhangre—atyachair garba shir."

This passage may be rendered into English as follows :

"I am the cremation ground, I am the blood thirsty goddess Kali who lives and moves about in the cremation ground. Plague or Famine is my great joy. . . . I am thirsty, I want blood, I want revolution, I want faith in the struggle. Tear, tear the chain of wrongs. Break, break thou the proud head of the oppressor;"

and further on the writer says that he personifies total destruction and that he is the venomous fangs of the snake. These passages, to my mind, indicate beyond any shadow of doubt that the revolution contemplated by the writer is a revolution built on blood and carnage by the destruction of those who are in the opposite camp; in other words, persons who are regarded as oppressors. The writer wants a total destruction of those oppressors, and he appears to enjoin upon the readers of the pamphlet that they should break and break the proud head of the oppressor. The writer desires that his cries should be heard by people far and near, that his call should be hearkened far far away across the hills, the jungles, across the rivers and rivulets and all those who hear should come forward to join the ranks in destroying the oppressor. He says that he is the messenger of death. He says that his revolutionary song signals at the door of each of the listners and signals to them to come out if they have life, if they have health, if they have courage to come and dash to pieces those who commit oppression on the mother; and he says with his blood and with the blood of those followers let the revolution grow in volume. About this symbolic mother, in a later passage, the writer observes that if mother-tongue be equal to mother, then the said language is the most revered goddess and disgrace should not be allowed to spread in her name. The pamphlet then winds up with an invocation to the readers which translated reads as follows :

"If you are true, if you are the gift of God, if you are not a bastard, then come forward with a fearless heart to struggle against the oppressor's improper conduct, oppression and injustice. We should not tolerate wrongful oppression. Oh, thou the people, with the burning pain of thine heart burn the heart of oppressive, highhanded oppressor. Let all wrongs, all highhandedness, all oppressions all tyrannies be burnt in the flame."

These passages I have only quoted to show that the document as a whole is a clear invocation to the readers to join a total and a deadly struggle to bring about a revolution by violence resulting in complete annihilation of those whom the writer considers as oppressors. There is a clear implication in the pamphlet that in the opinion of the writer the present order of society is totally oppressive and must be destroyed at all costs in which people should combine to lend a helping hand and fight to the finish. The "oppressor", it is true, is not very clearly defined in the body of the pamphlet. At one place the writer suggests that his protest is against parochial national politics. At another place the writer suggests to his readers to take up courage and dash to pieces those who commit oppression on the mother. At yet another place the writer suggests that the mother-tongue is equal to the mother, and that the said language is his most revered goddess: therefore no disgrace should be permitted to spread in her name. These expressions are undoubtedly vague. They may have reference to some language controversy which perhaps might have been going on at the time of the publication in Purulia; and the publication of the pamphlet under those circumstances must have clearly conveyed to the readers what the intention of the writer was and against whom the pamphlet was directed in particular; but the innuendoes contained in the publication have not been explained on behalf of the State. In the absence of any such material we cannot assume to whom the writer actually refers in those passages as being the perpetrators of the tyranny or the oppression against which he is raving.

[7] In the affidavit filed before us the State Government only say in para. 4 that the matter contained in "Sangram" may have the effect of inciting or encouraging violence or bringing into hatred or contempt the Government of Bihar established by law or of exciting disaffection towards the said Government. The affidavit in other words, suggests that the offending pamphlet falls under S. 4 (1) (d), Press Act. This was also the line adopted in argument by the learned Government-Advocate appearing on behalf of the State. There are, however, two serious difficulties in accepting this argument advanced on behalf of Government. The first difficulty is that in the notice served on the petitioner it is alleged that the matters specified in the schedule to the notice were of the nature described in cl. (a) to sub-s. (1) of S. 4, Press Act. There is no mention there that the published matter was of the nature described in cl. (d) to sub-s. (1) of the said section. It has been, therefore, argued on behalf of the petitioner that it is not open to Government now to alter their position and to urge that the offending pamphlet comes under S. 4 (1) (d) of the Act. In support of the argument reliance is placed on the observations of Divatia J. in the Special Bench case of Vishnu Gangadhar v. Government of Bombay, A.I.R, (32) 1945 Bom. 207 : (46 Cr. L. J. 643 S. B.) where it was contended in argument by the learned Advocate-General appearing on behalf of the Government of Bombay that the Court had to see whether the passages in question fell under any of the cls. (a) to (i) of sub-s. (1) of S. 4, and not merely cl. (a) or (b) of the said section; because the object of the notice given to the petitioner mentioned in general words of the nature described in sub-s. (1) of S. 4. In the case in question it was admitted that in the statement of objected words attached to the notice it had been expressly mentioned that the said statement fell under cl. (a) or (b) of S. 4 (1), Press Act; it was nonetheless contended by the learned Advocate-General that the Court was not bound by any such limitation mentioned in the notice, and the Court was entitled to see whether the statements fell within any one of the clauses mentioned in S. 4 (1) of the Act. This argument did not find favour with their Lordships who observed as follows :

"The statement is a part of the notice itself under S. 3 (3) which requires a 'notice in writing to the keeper of the press stating or describing such words, etc.' The statement is, therefore, a statutory provision and he is in the nature of a charge which gives particular about the specific clauses of the sub-section that are alleged to have been infringed. The petitioner has come to this Court to set aside an order which purports to be based on that charge. We do not think, therefore, that Government can now go behind or enlarge those particulars which are an integral part of the notice. The material clauses in the notice would be (a) and/or (b), but as the book falls under Expln. (1) to sub-s. (1), the only question before us is whether the book has a tendency to incite to or encourage the commission of any offence involving murder or violence as stated in cl. (a)."

These observations undoubtedly support the petitioner. Here also the notice specifies that the published matter mentioned in the schedule to the notice was of the nature described in cl. (a) to sub-s. (1) of s. 4 and not in cl. (d) of the said sub-section. There is, however, one difference that in the Bombay case there was a statement of objected words attached to the notice and in respect of those particular words it had been mentioned that they came either under cl. (a) or under cl. (b) of S. 4 (1), Press Act. Here the objection in the notice refers to the entire pamphlet and not to any particular words or phrases used therein. Under S. 23 of the Act the Court has to decide whether the document complained of was of the nature described in sub-s. (1) of S. 4. In construing the document or the offending passages if the Court comes to the conclusion that it falls under any particular clause of sub-s. (1) of S. 4, then the Court, in my opinion, can hold that the order made under sub-s. (3) of S. 3 was a valid order. The mere defect in the frame of a charge so long as it does not prejudice the accused has been held to be curable under the Code of Criminal Procedure; and similarly, in my opinion, the defect in the frame of a notice of this character cannot have any more serious consequences. It is true that if the objection in the notice is confined only to particular passages in the document, then it would not be open to Government to enlarge the discussion by reference to many other offending passages and to invite the Court to come to a decision that those other passages fell within one or the other of the various clauses of S. 4 (1) of the Act. That would be asking the Court to enter into a roving enquiry as to passages or words in the document to which exception had not been taken originally in the notice itself, and such a procedure may well be deprecated as their Lordships appear to have done in the Bombay case, the procedure being evidently prejudicial to the accused. In the present case it does not appear to me to be necessary to go to the length of holding that merely because a particular clause of sub-s. (1) of S. 4 is specified in the notice, therefore, the Court must be confined merely to see whether the offending publication did come within that clause, even if on a perusal of the document as a whole the interpretation of the Court is that it comes under some other clause of S. 4 (1) of the Act. Here the Government are not asking the Court to broaden the enquiry and thereby prejudice the case of the petitioner. The objection in the present case relates to the entire pamphlet. I think, however, that the more serious difficulty is that on a construction of the document itself I cannot hold that it comes under cl. (1) (d) of S. 4 of the Act. I propose to reproduce here the two relevant clauses of sub-s. (1) of S. 4 of the Act, namely, cls. (a) and (d). They are as follows :

"4 (1) Whenever it appears to the Provincial Government that any printing-press in respect of which any security has been ordered to be deposited under S. 3 is used for the purpose of printing or publishing any newspaper, book or other document containing any words, signs or visible representations which —

(a) incite to or encourage, or tend to incite to or to encourage, the commission of any offence of murder or any cognizable offence involving violence, or

(d) to bring into hatred or contempt His Majesty or the Government established by law in British India or the administration of justice in British India or any class or section of His Majesty's subjects in British India, or to excite disaffection towards his Majesty or the said Government."

Now, there are no words in the document which can be said to bring into hatred or contempt the Government established by law or the administration of justice in the province or to excite disaffection towards the said Government. The words "oppressor" or the words which refer to those who encourage parochial national politics or those who bring disgrace to the mother-tongue cannot be regarded as having any reference to the Government established by law and nothing has been brought before us on behalf of Government to explain that in the circumstances or the conditions prevailing in the district of Purulia or amongst persons for whom the circulation was intended the words or phrases conveyed a veiled reference to Government established by law and intended thereby to create or excite disaffection against that Government. That may or may not be so. It is, therefore, not possible to hold that the publication was necessarily meant to bring into hatred or contempt or excite disaffection towards the State Government or the authorities of the State Government. The question then arises whether they refer to any class or section of the people and tend to bring into hatred or contempt such class or section of people. It appears to be well established that the "class or section" of people referred to in the clause must be a determinate and an ascertainable class. There is no such thing here. The references are completely vague at least to the mind of a person who has nothing else before him except the offending pamphlet. In this context I may refer to a decision of the Special Bench of this Court in Badri Narain Singh v. Chief Secretary to Government of Bihar, A. I. R. (28) 1941 Pat. 132 : 22 P. L. T. 260 : (42 Cr. L. J. 548 S. B.) where their Lordships relying upon a decision in Maniben Liladhar v. Emperor, 57 Bom. 253 : (A. I. R. (20) 1933 Bom. 65: 34 Cr. L. J. 231) held that cl. (d) contemplates "definite or ascertainable class." I cannot, therefore, hold on a consideration of the entire document that it comes under cl. (d) of S. 4 (1) of the Act.

[8] I shall now turn to see whether it does fall under cl. (a) of S. 4 (1). I have already analysed in detail the various paragraphs of the pamphlet and the effect which it produces upon the mind of the reader. The general effect of the document unmistakably is to produce an impression that it excites and encourages a bloody revolution in which the revolutionaries are to fight to the bitter and fight to death even if it resulted in the loss of hundreds of sons and husbands. To put it in the language of Harries C. J., in the case of Badri Narain v. Chief Secretary, Bihar Government, (A.I.R. (28) 1941 Pat. 132 : 22 P. L. T. 260 : 42 Cr. L. J. 548 S.B.) aforesaid :

"In my judgment, words tending to, incite to or to encourage bloody revolution and the destruction of the present social order by bloodshed and force clearly come within S. 4 (1) (a) of the Act. Bloody revolution and forcible and violent destruction of the present social order involve all kinds of cognizable offences involving violence and would in all probability involve murder. In my view it is unnecessary to show that the words tend to incite to, or to encourage the commission of a particular offence or offences. It is sufficient if they tend to incite to or to encourage the commission of cognizable offences of violence in general."

I respectfully agree with these observations of his Lordship (though not without some irony to myself). It is true that the pamphlet in the present case does not encourage any particular kind of violence or murder but in general it talks of violence and destruction and of bloodshed in order to bring about a revolution in the country after destruction of the oppressors, under whose tyranny the writer of the pamphlet appears to be smarting and groaning. For the petitioner it has been very strenuously urged by Mr. Ghosh that the language of the pamphlet should not be too literally construed, and that the expressions used are merely figures of speech in order to make the appeal of the writer effective. The learned counsel urges that even if they refer to bloodshed and violence the reference is only to the persons engaged in the struggle who have to die struggling and court death and destruction. It does not talk of violence or destruction of anybody else, and, therefore, it cannot be said that it encourages the commission of any offence of murder or cognizable offence involving violence. In my opinion, this cannot be the correct reading of the pamphlet in question. Expressions like the following which have been so often used in the document, namely, "Let all oppressors perish;" "death is my darling;" "I am blood-thirsty goddess Kali who lives and moves in the cremation ground;" "I am thirsty, I want blood, I want revolution;—break, break the proud head of the oppressor;" "I am total destruction;" "I am the messenger of death:" "if you have got courage come and dash to pieces those who commit oppression on the mother" unquestionably connote that the writer of the pamphlet does not merely want that he and his followers should alone spill their own blood but that they should also spill the blood of others. Total destruction of those against whom they are struggling, namely, persons who in the opinion of the writer are the oppressors or who are directors of wrong and injustice or who take part in parochial national politics or who bring into disgrace the mother-tongue is the chief object of the publication. I, therefore, cannot but hold that the pamphlet to which exception has been taken by Government does fall under S. 4 (1) (a) of the Act, and I cannot agree with the contention of Mr. Ghosh that it contains mere empty slogans carrying no particular meaning except some amount of figurative expression or language borrowed at random from various authors with a touch of poetic flourish about it. The central meaning of the writer of the document is absolutely clear. The central theme which runs through the whole gamut of the offending pamphlet is that the author is anxious to bring about a bloody revolution and challenge completely the present order of things by causing a total annihilation of the persons and the policies of those who, according to him, are in the opposite camp. Such a pamphlet, therefore, does come within the mischief of the clause referred to in the notice and the demand for security would be justified under the Act unless we were to hold that the said provision of the Act was repugnant to the Constitution of India and infringed the fundamental right of freedom of speech and expression as provided in Art. 19 (1) (a), Constitution Act.

[9] I shall, therefore, now address myself to an examination of this constitutional problem. Of course it goes without saying that a demand of security from the press for publishing a certain material is a restriction put upon the freedom of speech and expression. The writer has endeavoured to express himself through the press and under the Constitution of India, he should be free to do so except within the bounds of limitation put by the Constitution Act itself. The only limitation to this freedom of speech and expression is provided by Art. 19 (2), Constitution Act. Article 19 (2) runs as follows:

"Nothing in sub-cl. (a) of Cl. (1) shall affect the operation of any existing law in so far as it relates to, or prevent the State from making any law relating to, libel, slander, defamation, contempt of Court or any matter which offends against decency or morality or which undermines the security of, or tends to overthrow, the State."

That the Press Act is an existing law must also be conceded. Now, in so far as the provisions of the Press Act relate to matters specified in cl. (2) of Art. 19, its operation cannot be affected by cl. (1) (a) of that Article. These, therefore, are the only exceptions and it will have to be examined whether S. 4 (1) (a), Press Act, falls under any of these exceptions mentioned in cl. (2) of Art. 19 of the Constitution of India.

[10] The point undoubtedly is one of far-reaching importance, and as the learned Government Advocate stated that he had not had sufficient time to meet the point, it having been raised for the first time in arguments, we heard the parties again in the matter at a later stage. On behalf of the State it is contended that S. 4 (1) (a), Press Act, relates to matter which "undermines the security of or tends to overthrow the State." As such, it is stated, it is saved under Art. 19 (2). It is contended that this clause must be read in conjunction with the various other clauses contained in the section, and in the context it must be assumed that the clause in question refers to political assassination or violence subversive of the security of the State. It must be observed in this connection that several of the clauses mentioned in S. 4 (1) refer to matters which unmistakably relate to the security of the State e. g. cl. (c) refers to seduction of any officer of the army, the navy or the air force or any police officer from his allegiance to the State; cl. (f) deals with interference with the administration of the law or with the maintenance of law and order; while cl. (g) deals with attempts to induce a public servant to forbear or delay the exercise of his public functions; and cl. (i) with attempts to prejudice recruiting to the armed forces. On the strength of these clauses it may be urged with great plausibility that the intention of the law was to prevent bringing about a general insurrection in the land by persons or parties who wanted to effect a coup-de-tate and usurp by force the reigns of the Government. Indeed the statement of objects and reasons, at the time when the Act was put on the legislative anvil, leads to the same conclusion. It says :

"it was the policy of many newspapers consistently... to foster conditions of disorder and that a section of the press was giving direct or indirect incitement to violent and revolutionary crime."

It must, however, be noted that cls. (c) to (i) were introduced at a later stage in the Act by Act XXIII [23] of 1932. In that view it seems difficult to accept the contention that all the various clauses of sub-s. (1) of S. 4 must be read together so as to form a component and an integral part of the legislation intended to prevent actions which may have the effect of undermining the security of the State or that of overthrowing it. Now let us examine whether cls. (a) and (b) of S. 4 (1) of the Act taken conjointly lead to the inference that they were directed mainly and solely towards crimes of violence and political assassination subversive of the State. Clause (a) deals with a publication that incites or encourages the commission of any offence of murder or any cognizable offence involving violence, whereas cl. (b) refers to direct or indirect approval or admiration of any such offence, or of any person, real or fictitious who has committed or is alleged to have committed any such offence. It may be argued that the two clauses must refer to political assassinations or murders or subversive crimes of that character, because otherwise it was not possible to expect that any person would approve or admire the commission of any such offence by any person real or fictitious. The plain grammatical meaning of the two clauses does not necessarily lead to any such inference, and where the language of the Statute is perfectly clear and unambiguous reference to statement of objects and reasons is irrelevant and unwarranted. Cases may be conceived where the publication may relate to murders or offences involving acts of violence without any political motives and yet publications relating to such murders may come within the mischief of S. 4 (1) (a) of the Act. Cases may also be conceived where directly or indirectly murders or acts of violence of that kind may be approved or admired. Let us, for instance, take the case of an individual who is a terror in a particular locality because of his being the head of a gang of dacoits and robbers. The man may have been clever enough to escape the clutches of the law, yet the people in the locality are so tired of him that pamphlets or leaflets are published inciting his murder or assassination. It may also be that even after the man is murdered, the people of the locality or some of them may publish documents approving the conduct of the murderer. Evidently, these acts have been done not with any political motive, yet these publications come as much within the mischief of S. 4 (1) (a) and (b) as any other publication relating to crime of a political character. As I said, according to the plain language of the two clauses, there would be nothing to differentiate between the two kinds of publications, and Government would be justified in demanding security from the press for printing and publishing any such matter. It cannot be said that in such a case the High Court would be justified in setting aside the order demanding security because it would not be a case of misapplication of the law. On the contrary, the conduct of the authorities in making the demand would be perfectly justified within the meaning of the law.

[11] Article 19 (2) of the Constitution Act came in for consideration in two very recent decisions of the Supreme Court : Romesh Thappar v. State of Madras, A.I.R. (37) 1950 S.C. 124 : (51 Cr.L.J. 1514) and Brij Bhushan v. State of Delhi, A.I.R. (37) 1950 S.C. 129 : (51 Cr.L.J. 1525). Romesh Thappar's case, (A. I. R. (37) 1950 S.C. 124 : 51 Cr. L. J. 1514) was a case which arose under the Madras Maintenance of Public Order Act, 1949. This Act, as the preamble shows, was for the purpose of preventing "disorders involving menace to the peace and tranquillity of the Province" and affecting "public safety". The Government of Madras acting within the provisions of the said law had prohibited the entry and circulation of a certain journal called 'Cross Roads' (printed and published in Bombay) in the Province of Madras. The printer, publisher and editor of the journal then moved the Supreme Court under Art. 32 of the Constitution for a writ of mandamus and certiorari on the ground that the order of the Madras Government contravened the fundamental right of the petitioner to freedom of speech and expression conferred upon him by Art. 19 (1) (a) of the Constitution, and was, as such, a void order being inconsistent with the fundamental right aforesaid. The majority of the Judges constituting the Bench held that "public safety" or "public order" were matters of wide connotation and could not necessarily be confined to matters which undermine the security of the State or tend to overthrow the same. A legislation, therefore, which put limitation upon the right of freedom of speech and expression on these grounds was illegal and void. The language of Patanjali Sastri, J. who delivered the judgment of the Supreme Court is quite explicit. He says :

"whatever aims its framers may have had in view, its application and scope cannot, in the absence of limiting words in the statute itself, be restricted to those aggravated forms of prejudicial activity which are calculated to endanger the security of the State."

In this case even if it is held that S. 4 (1) (a), Press Act, was intended to apply mainly to political assassinations or cognizable offences involving violence subversive of the State, yet there are no words of limitation in the language of the section itself which would restrict their operation only to such cases and not to ordinary murders and cognizable offences involving violence. Their Lordships further observed as follows :

"Thus, very narrow and stringent limits have been set to permissible legislative abridgement of the right of free speech and expression and this was doubtless due to the realisation that freedom of speech and the press lay at the foundation of all democratic organisations, for without free political discussion no public education so essential for the proper functioning of the processes of popular Government is possible.

We are therefore of opinion that unless a law restricting freedom of speech and expression is directed solely against the undermining of the security of the State or the overthrow of it, such law cannot fall within the reservation under cl. (2) of Art. 19, although the restrictions which it seeks to impose may have been conceived generally in the interests of public order."

Similarly, here also it may be observed that although the impugned provision of the Press Act may have been conceived generally for the purpose of safeguarding the security of the State, yet it could not be said that the provision was solely directed to that purpose. It was further contended before the Supreme Court that if the provision fulfils two purposes, namely, that it is intended to safeguard against matters which undermine the security of the State or tend to overthrow it and may at the same time be applicable to offences of minor character, the provision should not be declared wholly void ; it should be upheld so far as it is within the bounds of permissible legislation as required by Art. 19 (2), Constitution Act. This argument was naturally thrown out by their Lordships because in their view the language of the provision was not severable. In doing so, their Lordships made the following pertinent observations :

"Where a law purports to authorise the imposition of restrictions on a fundamental right in language wide enough to cover restrictions both within and without the limits of constitutionally permissible legislative action affecting such right, it is not possible to uphold it even so far as it may be applied within the constitutional limits, as it is not severable."

These observations apply with equal force to the present case. It cannot be argued that the language of cl. (a) of S. 4 (1) or that of cl. (b) are severable in their effect so as to be consistent with the Constitution for one purpose and inconsistent for another purpose. Both these provisions are worded in general terms and they may apply both to aggravated forms of offences like political assassinations as also to ordinary murders or cognizable offences involving violence. I cannot, therefore, hold that to any extent these clauses of S. 4 (1) can be saved as permissible legislation under Art. 19 (2), Constitution Act. I make no pronouncement so far as the other clauses of S. 4 (1), Press Act, are concerned, because, in my opinion, those later provisions of the Act are clearly severable from the provisions aforesaid.

[12] The other case before the Supreme Court, namely, Brij Bhusan's case, (A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 129 : 51 Cr. L. J. 1525) related to the validity of S. 7 (1) (c), East Punjab Safety Act, which provided that

"the Provincial Government or any authority authorised by it in this behalf if satisfied that such action is necessary for the purpose of preventing or combating any activity prejudicial to the public safety or the maintenance of public order may, by order in writing addressed to a printer, publisher or editor

(c) require that any matter relating to a particular subject or class of subjects shall before publication be submitted for scrutiny."

The printer and publisher as also the editor of a certain weekly of Delhi called 'Organiser', to which Province also the Act in question had been extended, moved the Supreme Court for writs of certiorari and prohibition under Art. 32, Constitution Act, impugning an order passed by the Chief Commissioner of Delhi under the said Act. In this case again their Lordships observed that the imposition of pre-censorship on a journal was a restriction on the liberty of the press which was an essential part of the right of freedom of speech and expression under Art. 19 (1) (a) of the Constitution; and they held that inasmuch as the order in question was not saved under cl. (2) of the said article, as decided by them in Romesh Thappar's case, A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 124 : (51 Cr. L. J. 1514) they directed the order of the Chief Commissioner to be quashed. There can be no doubt that having regard to the seriously disturbed condition of the Punjab at the time when the Act in question was passed, the Act was primarily intended to safeguard the security of the State and to prevent acts which tended to its overthrow; yet, as the provision in question was directed against publishing an objectionable matter constituting a threat to public law and order, their Lordships having already held that the words "public law and order" being far too general in their application, could not necessarily be confined to matters affecting the security of the State, they, therefore, found the provision in the Act could not come within the bounds of permissive legislation as required by Art. 19 (2). These two decisions, in my opinion, sufficiently conclude the matter, and in the circumstances I feel constrained to hold that cls. (a) and (b) of S. 4 (1), Press Act, are void being inconsistent with the fundamental right given under Art. 19 (1) of the Constitution, and that these provisions are not saved under cl. (2) of the said Article. As the demand for security in this case has been made for violation of S. 4 (1) (a) of the Act, the order demanding security is void and must be quashed. The learned Advocate-General who appeared for the State of Bihar at one stage of the hearing also conceded that in view of the aforesaid decisions of the Supreme Court, it was difficult to hold that the said provisions of the Press Act were not inconsistent with the fundamental right of freedom of speech and expression guaranteed under the Constitution Act and were saved under the saving clause of the Constitution.

[12a] The question may again arise whether the impugned provisions of the Press Act refer to matters which offend against decency or morality and are thus saved under the Constitution Act. I must observe in this connection that the learned Government-Advocate has not relied upon these phrases in Art. 19 (2) in support of his contention. Prima facie it may appear that a publication which incites or encourages murder or cognizable offences involving violence must be opposed to all sense of decency or morality, as we understand these expressions in common parlance. Ordinarily one may be inclined to think that the Constitution Act does not limit the meaning of those expressions to some peculiar kind of offence. Here again the trend of the Supreme Court judgments, above referred to, stand in the way of our giving such a wide meaning to the expression "offends against decency or morality." The classification of offences in the Penal Code places these various kinds of offences under distinct categories; for instance, offences against the State are dealt with in Chap. VI, offences against public tranquillity in Chap. VIII, offences against public health, safety, convenience decency and morals in Chap. XIV, whereas offences affecting the human body are in Chap. XVI of the Code. These offences against decency and morality are put in a class altogether distinct from offences of murder and cognizable offences involving violence. Therefore the offences must be deemed to be such offences as are mentioned in those classifications. This purports to be their Lordships' view. The framers of the Constitution must have been conscious of these provisions in the Penal Code when the Constitution came to be drafted, and the expressions used in the Act may be deemed to have been used in the same sense in which they were used in the Penal Code. From that point of view, it is impossible to hold that the provisions of S. 4 (1) (a) and (b) of the Act can be justified on the ground that they relate to matters which offend "against decency and morality" as these expressions have been given a narrower connotation in the Penal Code and may be deemed to have been used in the same sense in the Constitution Act as well.

[13] I am compelled to observe that from the above discussions of the Supreme Court judgments, it follows logically that if a person were to go on inciting murder or other cognizable offences either through the press or by word of mouth, he would be free to do so with impunity inasmuch as he would claim the privilege of exercising his fundamental right of freedom of speech and expression. Any legislation which seeks or would seek to curb this right of the person concerned would not be saved under Art. 19 (2) of the Constitution and would have to be declared void. This would be so, because such speech or expression on the part of the individual would fall neither under libel nor slander nor defamation nor contempt of Court nor any matter which offends against decency or morality or which undermines the security of or tends to overthrow the State. I cannot with equanimity contemplate such an anomalous situation but the conclusion appears to be unavoidable on the authority of the Supreme Court judgments with which we are bound. I, therefore, wish that my decision on the point would sooner than ever come to be tested by the Supreme Court itself and the position re-examined in the light of the anomalous situation pointed out above. It seems to me that the words used in the Constitution Act should be assigned a wide and liberal connotation even though they occur in a clause which provides an exception to the fundamental right vouchsafed under Art. 19 (1) (a) of the Constitution Act: (vide 1930 A. C. 124 at p. 136.)

[14] It may well be observed that the Press Act which was an emergency legislation was not intended to be a part of the permanent statute of the land. Indeed, it must be so; but if the circumstances which necessitated the enactment of a statute of that character do operate, it cannot be said that the emergency has completely vanished.

[15] It is not without much hesitation that I have come to the decision given above. In forming my conclusion I have not been unmindful of the fact that in a country like England a pre-censorship of this character on the press does not exist. It must be, however, borne in mind that in England the traditions of democracy are so firmly established that it would be generally unthinkable for any press to indulge in inciting acts of political violence and murder; and if it does, which of course would be rare, it is proceeded against under the general law of the land and punished accordingly. In a country like India where the roots of democracy have not yet taken a firm hold on the soil and where already dangerous and disruptive forces are working to destroy the sapling of freedom and democracy, a legislation of this character could not be said to be altogether ill-advised. I have no doubt that the saner section of the press will always utilise its freedom of speech and expression to the furtherance of the cause of democracy but a press which is brought into being with the specific purpose of creating discord and disaffection and preaching violence and disorder on a mass scale cannot be expected to upset its freedom of expression. These are, however, matters with which this Court is not concerned and may better be left to the wisdom of the legislators.

[16] The result is that the application must be allowed and the order complained against demanding security from the petitioner must be quashed.

[17] Shearer J.—The Constitution of India contains no express declaration in favour of the freedom or liberty of the press, and the reason or one of the reasons for this omission may, I imagine, be that in no period in history and in no country in the world has the press been free, in the sense that the keeper of a press may print and publish any matter he chooses without thereby incurring any risk of punishment. The invention of printing led to the propagation and dissemination, on a far wider scale than had hitherto been possible, of ideas which were subversive of the existing order in Church and State. In 1501 Pope Alexanter VI published a bill against unlicensed printing. After the Reformation and the break up of the Holy Roman Empire, the sovereigns of the national states which came into existence, took similar steps to control the press. In England until 1695 no book or pamphlet could be printed without the imprimatur of the Crown licensor, and the printers and authors of books or pamphlets, which had been issued without it, were liable to be brought before special Court such as the Star Chamber, and most severely punished. Although in 1695, when the House of Commons declined to continue the Licensing Act, the press in England was emancipated from direct state control, in other countries on the Continent of Europe a system of pre-censorship continued until long afterwards. In 20th century Europe, in more than one country, the press, on its political side at least, has again been subjected to strict Government control. In Facist Italy the responsible editor of every newspaper had to be approved by the prefect of the province. A prefect might warn a newspaper editor who published matter or news to which he took exception and might revoke his recognition of an editor who had been so warned twice in a year. In Soviet Russia there is no independent press, and any person venturing to propagate ideas, which are, in any way, inconsistent with the communist creed, are liable to the most severe punishment. When we speak of the freedom or liberty of the press, we mean that freedom—no doubt a very substantial freedom but nevertheless, a freedom which is definitely limited and circumscribed which is enjoyed by the press in the English speaking world. In 1784 in the celebrated case of Rex v. Dean of St. Asaph, (1784) 3 T. R. 431 Lord Mansfield said :

"The liberty of the press consists in printing without any previous license subject to the consequences of the law."

Now, in England and in America, it is a crime to print and publish matter of certain kinds. It is obvious that the existence of such laws and the consequent dread of punishment must act as a deterrent on persons, who hold certain ideas or opinions, seeking to propagate and disseminate them. Moreover under the law of libel, including the law of seditious libel, not merely is the author of the libel responsible. Responsibility also extends to the publisher and printer and, indeed to every vendor of the publication. As ordinarily, a writer must find a publisher, the publisher must employ a printer, and the printer, in his turn must rely on booksellers to sell the book or pamphlet which he prints, it is clear that the possibility of a writer succeeding in communicating to any large body of the public ideas or opinions the dissemination of which the law regards as culpable is small. In India until 1910 the press was in very much the same position as it was in Great Britain and the Dominions and in America. In 1910 the Press Act, however, empowered the executive to demand security from the keeper of a press and the publisher of a newspaper, and in certain circumstances, to declare such security forfeited. The Press Act of 1910 was repealed in 1922, but in 1931 was re-enacted in a modified form. The statute of 1931 was described as "an Act to provide against the publication of matter exciting to or encouraging murder or violence". In the following year it was amended in certain particulars by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1932, one such amendment being in the title which was altered to "an act to provide for the better control of the press". The question that arises in this case is whether, in consequence of Art. 19 (1) (a) in the Constitution, it is still open to the executive to require the keeper of a press, which has published matter of the kind referred to in cls. (a) and (b) of S. 4 (1), Press (Emergency Powers) Act, 1931, to deposit security. The boject of requiring security is, it is clear to ensure that the keeper of a press, who prints matter of a certain kind, may not evade liability or escape punishment. Such also, it may be observed, is the object of the law which requires the printer of every book or pamphlet to exhibit his name and address on the first or the last page of the book or pamphlet. In England, until the law so provided persons, who were libelled, very often found it a matter of the greatest difficulty to ascertain who was responsible, and in order to enable them to do so, general search warrants had to be issued. There can, of course, be no doubt that a system under which the keeper of a printing press can be required to deposit security is a system of control over the press, but the control so exercised is substantially the same kind of control as is exercised by making it a crime to publish matter of a certain kind. The author of the book or pamphlet, which contains or may appear to contain a libel on an individual or a seditious libel, will ordinarily find it difficult to get it printed which is what the law intends, and he may find it more difficult to get it printed by a printer who has been required to furnish security than by a printer who has not yet been required to to do so, which again is what the law intends. Is there, however, in principle any objection to the exercise of this further measure of control by the State? Professor Dicey in his Law of Constitution, 8th Edn., p. 244, observes:

"No sensible person will argue that to demand a deposit from the owner of a news-paper or to impose other limitations upon the right of publishing periodicals is of necessity inexpedient or unjust."

A fortiori this observation applies to the keeper of a printing press, such as the appellant is, who publishes leaflets or pamphlets of the kind we are now concerned with. It is, and always has been, well settled both in England and in India that security may be taken from a person who has committed certain crimes or who, having committed a certain crime, is thought to be likely to commit that crime again. As will appear later, a person who publishes matter of the kind referred to in cls. (a) and (b) of S. 4 (1), Press (Emergency Powers) Act, 1931, commits a crime. It is true that security is, in the first instance, demanded by the executive but against its order there is a right of appeal, and the appeal must be heard by a Bench of three High Court Judges. There is, in substance, in such a case at least no serious departure from what Professor Dicey calls the rule of law. It is also true that, in recent times, so far as I can ascertain, security has never in England been demanded from a printer. But security has, on occasion, been demanded from persons proposing to address public meetings, Wise v. Dunning, (1902) 1 K. B. 167 : (71 L. J. K. B. 165). In other words, the taking of security has sometimes been used to fetter the expression of opinion. I am unable to subscribe to the sweeping generalisation of my brother Ramaswami, on which his whole judgment appears to me to be based, that the taking of security is something alien and repugnant to the concept of the freedom of the press. Article 21 of the Constitution is so drawn as to preserve to the Courts the power to demand security under Chap. VIII, Criminal P. C. Why should it be supposed that the Constituent Assembly intended that the practice of requiring the keeper of a printing press to deposit security in order to prevent the publication of seditious libels should cease? In construing the relevant provisions of the constitution, it is, in my opinion, necessary to keep any such a priori assumption out of one's mind. Indeed if any assumption at all is to be made, it ought, I think, to be an assumption the other way.

[18] Article 19 (1) (a) of the Constitution provides that all citizens shall have the right to freedom of speech and expression. It is clear that the word "expression" is used by way of amplification of the word "speech" which immediately precedes it. Subject to what is contained in Art. 19 (2), Art. 19 (1) (a) renders immune from punishment not merely the individual citizen who gives expression to his opinions in conversation or at a public meeting, but also to the journalist, the writer, the printer, the sculptor, the dramatist, and, in short, every kind of creative artist. The editor of a newspaper, who moulds or is in a position to mould public opinion, may perhaps come within the purview of the article, but in my opinion, the keeper of a printing press, quite certainly, does not. Printing may sometimes be an art, but the generality of printers do not give expression to ideas and opinions of their own. They are merely engaged or employed by other persons to give a wider publicity, than could otherwise be achieved, to ideas and opinions of theirs. Indirectly, no doubt, the article may operate in such a way as to prevent certain restrictions being imposed on printers. It is, for instance, not open to Parliament to enact a law that, before printing any book or pamphlet, which he may have been employed to print, the printer shall submit it for pre-censorship. The reason, however, why such a law would now be an unconstitutional law is not that it imposes a restriction on the printer, but that, in substance, it is a restriction imposed on the writer or author. It is well known that the Constituent Assembly examined the constitutions of other countries. Now, there are constitutions in which not merely the right to speak, write and publish, but also the right to print is conferred on all citizens. An instance in point is Art. 18 of the Belgium Constitution of 1832 which is reproduced in Dicey's law of the Constitution, Edn. 8, p. 234, and the constitutions of some of the competent States in the United States of America (vide Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, Vol. 2, p. 876). I refer particularly to the Belgium Constitution of 1832 as, not only does it confer on every citizen the right to print, but also prohibits, the taking of security from the keeper of a printing press. It will be observed that, under it, the keeper of a printing press is immune from punishment if the author of the book or pamphlet, which he has printed, is a person who is known and who is domiciled in Belgium. So long as the keeper of a printing press takes the precaution of ascertaining who the author is and that he is domiciled in Belgium and can, in consequence be made liable for the publication of matter which offends against the law, the printer is no more responsible than is the colourman who supplies the canvas and paints with which an artist paints an obscene picture. The article appears to have been drawn in such a way as to enable writers and authors to obtain without any difficulty the services of a printer and so disseminate to the widest possible extent their opinions and ideas. In other words, the right conferred on printers was, in substance, a right conferred on writers and authors. As, however, I have already pointed out it is an integral part of the system of control, albeit indirect control over the press which obtains in the English speaking world that the printer shall be as much responsible at law as is the writer or author, I am unable to read into the word "expression" in Art. 19 (1) (a) any implied right in writers and authors to obtain the services of printers to enable them to reach the widest possible public. In other words, I can find nothing in the five words contained in this article which leads me inevitably to the conclusion that the power to demand security from the keeper of a printing press is a power which the executive may no longer exercise.

[19] If this is the correct interpretation of Art. 19 (1), there is an end of the matter. But I will assume, for the sake of argument, that the article does, in fact, confer on the keeper of a printing press a right to print whatever he may choose, and proceed to consider whether the taking of a deposit is not one of the restrictions which may be imposed on the exercise of this fundamental right under Art. 19 (2). It is clear that the principle object of the Constituent Assembly in enacting this article was to define the limits within which Parliament might, and beyond which Parliament might not, make the dissemination and propagation of ideas and opinions a crime. More particularly, the Constituent Assembly would seem to have restricted within narrower limits the crime, which is ordinarily known as the crime of seditious libel, and given to the citizens of India a right to criticise the Government, which is at least as ample as that enjoyed by the citizens of the United States of America and more ample than has ever been enjoyed by the citizens of Great Britain and the Dominions of the British Commonwealth. If, however, this had been the sole object of the Constituent Assembly, it would not have used the language which it did. The expression "law relating to libel" cannot possibly be construed as connoting nothing more than a law which makes libel punishable. If that were so the provisions of law which requires the name and address of the printer to appear on every book and pamphlet and requires the name of every editors, pinter and publisher of a newspaper to appear on every copy of a newspaper would have ceased to be a valid law. For the reasons which I have already indicated, these provisions are part of the law relating to libel. By a parity of reasoning it must, I think, be concluded that the provisions contained in S. 4 (1) (a) and (b), Press (Emergency Powers) Act, 1931, which enable security to be demanded from the keeper of a printing press, are part of the law relating to seditious libel. In order to prevent any misunderstanding I wish at this stage to point out that cls. (c) to (i) in S. 4 (1) of the Act enable security to be demanded in a wide variety of circumstances. If the construction which I am myself disposed to put on Art. 19 (1) is wrong and if printers have a fundamental right to print any matter they may choose, it may well be that, in certain of these circumstances the demand for security can no longer be supported. But the narrow point which I have to decide here is whether security may be demanded from the keeper of a printing press who has published matter of the kind referred to in cls. (a) and (b) which are severable from the other clauses. In construing these clauses, it is permissible and indeed necessary to employ the method of historical investigation. The Press Act of 1910 was enacted in order to combat terrorist or revolutionary crime. It was repealed in 1922, because such crime had become far less common. It was re-enacted in 1931, because there had been a recrudescence of such crime, and in the following year it was enlarged and modified in consequence of the non-co-operation movement. Although the promoters of this movement desired it to be peaceful and non-voilent movement, certain persons took advantage of it to commit violent crime in order to effect a revolution and overthrow the existing system of Government. Bearing this in mind, it seems to me quite clear that cl. (a) of S. 4 (1) was aimed at political assassination and the commission of violent crimes intended to overthrow or weaken the State and that cl. (b) was aimed at those who glorified such crime and, more particularly preached the doctrine that in certain cricumstances and in order to achieve certain ends, murder was no crime at all. Mr. Basanta Chandra Ghosh, for the appellant, conceded that the language used in cl. (a) of S. 4 (1) might justify a demand for security from the keeper of a press who had published a seditious libel, but contended that it might also justify a demand for security from the keeper of a press who had published a document which was not a seditious libel. In this connection the learned advocate, for the appellant, put forward a very extraordinary argument. Mr. Ghosh asked us to suppose that some individual had made himself a terror to the locality in which he lived and that eventually certain persons in that locality decided to print and circulate a leaflet suggesting that he should be killed. I agree with Mr. Ghosh that, if security was demanded from the keeper of a press at which such a document was printed, this Court would have to set the order aside as such a document is not a seditious libel, and quite possibly, not a libel at all. But in doing so, it would be incumbent on this Court to point out to the authorities that other and more appropriate action might be taken. In the Queen v. Most, (1881) 7 Q. B. D. 244 : (50 L. J. M. C. 113) one Johann Most was indicted for having published an article in a newspaper extolling the assassination of the Empress of Russia and holding it up as an example to revolutionaries throughout the world. Johann Most was tried and convicted for having published a seditious libel, but was also tried and convicted under 24 and 25 vict. Caput 4, which made it an offence for persons to "conspire, confiderate and agree to murder any person" the reason being that the punishment provided for that crime was a more severe punishment than could be inflicted for the crime of seditious libel. It was contended that Johann Most could not be convicted as it was not shown that he had come into direct contact with any of the persons who read the newspaper and could not, therefore, be said to have incited them. This argument was overruled. I am inclined to think that if ever a case of this kind suggested by Mr. Ghosh arises, it will not be impossible for the persons responsible to be prosecuted under the Penal Code. Much reliance was placed by Mr. Ghosh on two recent decisions of the Supreme Court : Romesh Thappar v. State of Madras, 1950 S. C. R. 594 : (A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 124 : 51 Cr. L. J. 1514) and Brij Bhushan v. State of Delhi, 1950 S. C. R. 605 : (A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 129 : 51 Cr. L. J. 1525). The orders complained of in these cases were orders prohibiting the entry into or the circulation, sale or distribution in the State of Madras in the one case and in the State of Delhi in the other of two newspapers. In Ireland, from time to time power has been conferred on the executive to seize and destroy newspapers or their publications containing seditious libels. A power of that kind is in effect a power of pre-censorship, and, under the Indian Constitution, cannot be conferred on the executive except in periods of emergency. The power conferred by the State of Madras and the State of Delhi, namely, a power to seize a certain newspaper, whether it contained matter amounting to a seditious libel or not was a still wider power and one which is clearly prohibited by the Constitution. Pre-censorship and still more what done or authorised to be done in Madras and Delhi is a direct invasion of the fundamental right of the editor and journalist who used the columns of these newspapers to give expression to their opinions. What has been done here does not amount to an invasion of the fundamental right of the author of this pamphlet or leaflet. It is true that the press itself has been subjected to a further measure of control, but a control of exactly the same kind as is already imposed by the existence of a law which makes seditious libel a crime. If it is a restriction on any fundamental right possessed by the printer—and I do not myself think he has any—it is a restriction permitted by Art. 19 (2). I have read and re-read the judgments of the Supreme Court, and I can find nothing in them myself which bears directly on the point at issue and leads me to think that, in their opinion, a restriction of this kind is no longer permissible. I do not think it necessary to refer to any of the observations of their Lordships except one which occurs towards the end of the judgment and on which Mr. Ghosh greatly relies. Sastri J., there said :

Now, it is clearly possible to sever cls. (a) and (b) from the clauses which follow them in S. 4 (1), Press (Emergency Powers) Act. There can be no doubt that a person who publishes a pamphlet or leaflet, such as has been published by the appellant, in which assasination and violence are advocated as a means of bringing about a change in the existing order in the State, is guilty of publishing a seditious libel. That is so even within the narrower definition of "seditious libel" contained in Art. 19 (2) of the Constitution. The language used by Sastri J. cannot, in my opinion, possibly support the argument of Mr. Ghosh that, as security may be demanded from the publisher of a leaflet advocating, for personal reasons, the murder of a private individual, security cannot be demanded from the keeper of a press which has published a seditious libel. As I have just pointed out, the action appropriate in such a case, if it ever arises, would be not to demand a security from the press but to prosecute the keeper of the press and other persons concerned for conspiracy to murder. The mere circumstance that a wholly wrong and unjustified use may conceivably be made of a power conferred on the executive is no reason whatever for supposing that that power is one which cannot be conferred under the Constitution. At the present time in this country, as in other countries, subversive ideas are abroad, and there is reason to believe that some of those who propagate and disseminate such ideas have already been guilty of great and atrocious crimes such as the derailment of passenger trains attended with great loss of life and suffering as well as material loss and damage to the State. It is notorious that the leaders of such subversive movements make use of small printing presses to put into circulation leaflets and pamphlets which they hope, may win converts to their cause. It is also notorious that the keepers of such printing presses are frequently, as is this appellant, pardanashin women or persons whom it would be useless to prosecute for seditious libel. In other words, by having resort to such printing presses, the promoters of such movements are seeking to evade the law which makes seditious libel a crime, and, in requiring the keepers of such printing presses to deposit security, the State is taking counter measures. The Constitution of India has peculiarity that, instead, of leaving it to Parliament to examine the statute book and repeal any law which infringes on a fundamental right, it imposes on the Judiciary the duty of declaring that law void. In discharging this onerous duty, the Judiciary in my opinion, ought to proceed with caution and circumspection. It ought not to declare an existing law to be void unless it is ineluctably driven to the conclusion that it is, and it ought also to hesitate to come to that conclusion when the consequences of it will be to deprvie the executive of a weapon which it may need to combat subversive movements and preserve the safety of the infant State. I do not feel myself driven to any such conclusion in the present case. It ought to be, and indeed, under the Constitution, must be, left to Parliament in its own good time and wisdom to repeal such provisions as are contained in the Press (Emergency Powers) Act, 1931, as it thinks fit. I would, therefore, myself dismiss this application, but, as my learned brothers are both of opinion that S. 4 (1) (a) and (b), Press (Emergency Powers) Act has ceased to be a constitutional law, the order of the Court must be that the application is allowed, and the order complained of is set aside.

[20] Ramaswami J.—The important question raised in this case is whether S. 4 (1) (a), Press (Emergency Powers) Act of 1931 (which will be referred to as the Press Act) is constitutionally valid.

[21] The petitioner, Sm. Shaila Bala Devi, is the keeper of a printing press, known as "Bharati Press" in Purulia town. On 8-9-1949, the Governor of Bihar in exercise of the powers conferred under sub-s. (3) of S. 3 of the said Act, ordered the petitioner to make a deposit of Rs. 2000 with the Deputy Commissioner of Manbhum. It was alleged in the notice that the "Bharati Press" was used for the purpose of printing and publishing matters in a Bengali leaflet entitled "Sangram" which was of the nature described in cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of S. 4, Press Act.

[22] The order of the Government states:

"Whereas it appears to the Governor of Bihar that the Bharati Press, Purulia, is used for the purpose of printing and publishing matters specified in the schedule annexed hereto which are of the nature described in cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of S. 4, Press (Emergency Powers) Act 1931 (XXIII [23] of 1931);

Now, therefore, the Governor of Bihar, in exercise of the powers conferred by sub-s. (3) of S. 3 of the said Act, is pleased to order the keeper of the said Press to deposit with the Deputy Commissioner Manbhum on or before 19-9-1949, security to the amount of Rs. 2000 (Rupees two thousand) in money or in Government securities."

[23] The petitioner asserts that this order violates the fundamental right to freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by Art. 19 (1) (a) of the Constitution. She impeaches the validity of S. 4 (1) (a) as being void under Art. 13 (1) of the Constitution by reason of its being inconsistent with the fundamental right.

[24] At this stage I should state that upon the construction of the pamphlet I agree with my learned brother Sarjoo Prasad that it encourages violent revolution and overthrow of the existing social and political order by bloodshed and destruction, and falls within the mischief of S. 4 (1) (a), Press Act. Even so, the order of the State Government demanding security should be set aside; if we hold that S. 4 (1) (a), Press Act is not constitutionally valid.

[25] It cannot be doubted that the freedom of press is included in the concept of "freedom of speech and expression," and connotes in the main exemption from previous restraints upon publication. The principle is inconsistent with any scheme of licence or censorship, or a regulation requiring the keeper of a press to make a deposit of cash which would be liable in specified circumstances to forfeit. In Rex v. Dean of St. Asaph, (1784) 3 T. R. 431, note) Lord Mansfield states:

"To be free is to live under Government by law. The liberty of the press consists in printing without any previous license, subject to the consequences of law."

" 'The law of England,' says Lord Ellenborough, 'is a law of liberty and consistently with this liberty we have not what is called an imprimatur; there is no such preliminary license necessary; but if a man publishes a paper, he is exposed to the penal consequences, as he is in every other act, if it be illegal'" (Rex v. Cobbett, (1804) 29 St. Tr. 1 at p. 49).

[26] It is, therefore, manifest that the order of the Governor of Bihar would be a violation of the petitioner's fundamental right under Art. 19 (1) (a) unless S. 4 (1) (a) of Act XXIII [23] of 1931 is saved by the reservation mentioned in cl. (2) of Art. 19 which (omitting immaterial portión) saves the operation of any "existing law in so far as it relates to any matter which undermines the security of, or tends to overthrow the State."

[27] Section 3 (3) of Act XXIII [23] of 1931 states:

"Whenever it appears to the Provincial Government that any printing press . . . . is used for the purpose of printing or publishing any newspaper, book or other document containing any words, signs or visible representations of the nature described in S. 4, sub-s. (1), the Provincial Government may, by notice in writing . . , . order the keeper to deposit with the Magistrate within whose jurisdiction the press is situated security to such an amount, not being less than five hundred or more than three thousand rupees as the Provincial Government may think fit to require. . . . ."

Section 4 (1) (a) empowers the Provincial Government to forfeit the security if—

"any printing press in respect of which any security has been ordered to be deposited under S. 3 is used for the purpose of printing or publishing any newspaper, book or other document containing any words, signs or visible representations which—

(a) incite to or encourage, or tend to incite to or encourage, the commission of any offence of murder or any cognizable offence involving violence. . . . ."

The question, therefore, arises whether the impugned section of the Act so far as it authorises the State Government to order the keeper of the press to make a deposit on the ground that such a press is used for the purpose of printing and publishing a document which "tends to incite the commission of any offence of murder or any cognizable offence involving violence" is a law which relates to any matter which undermines the security of or tends to overthrow the State.

[28] In criminal law, offences are classified into broad categories: (1) offences against the external and internal order and security of the State, (2) offences against administration of justice and public authority, (3) acts injurious to the public in general, (4) offences against the person and (5) offences against property. In the Penal Code, chap. VI enumerates "offences against the State" which include waging war against the Queen (S. 121), sedition (S. 124A) etc., because they are calculated to overthrow or undermine the security of the State. Chapter VIII enumerates "offences against the public tranquillity" which include unlawful assembly (S. 141), rioting (S. 146), promoting enmity between classes (S. 153A), etc. Chapter XVI contains "offences affecting the human body" which include murder, hurt, criminal force and assault, etc. It is inevitable that the categories should overlap to a certain extent—riot, insurrection, rebellion and levying are offences which run into each other and boundaries are not clear cut. But it is plain that the offences of murder and of violence form a distinct category from offences which tend to overthrow or undermine the security of the State. To illustrate the distinction reference may be made to the summing up of the Lord President in the trial of Andrew Hardie, (1820 State Trials New Series, Vol. I, 610 at 623):

"The distinction seems to consist in this, although they may often run very nearly into each other: where the rising or tumult is merely to accomplish some private purpose interesting only to those engaged in it, and not resisting or calling in question the King's authority or prerogative, then the tumult, however numerous or outrageous the mob may be, is held only to be a riot. For example, suppose a mob to rise, and even by force of arms to break into a particular prison and rescue certain persons therein confined; or to oblige the Magistrate to set them at liberty; or to lower the price of provisions in a certain market; or to tear down certain inclosures, which they conceive to encroach on the town's commons. All such acts, though severely punishable, and though they may be resisted by force, do not amount to treason."

[29] In the present case the question to be determined is whether S. 4 (1) (a), Press Act which refers to commission "of any offence of murder or any cognizable offence of violence" is a law "which concerns or relates to any matter which undermines the security of or tends to overthrow the State". It was argued by the learned Government Advocate that S. 4 (1) (a) should be construed to refer only to offences of political assassination or insurrection or mass violence which would undermine the security of the State. Learned counsel urged that the object of the Act was to combat the Civil Disobedience Movement which had taken a subversive form at the time of the passing of the Act. Reference was made to the Statement of Objects and Reasons in which it is said that "it was the policy of newspapers consistently . . . . . to foster conditions of disorder and that a section of the press was giving direct or indirect incitement to violence and revolutionary crime."

In my opinion this argument is unwarranted and cannot be sustained. For the principle is settled that when the language of the Act is clear and explicit it is not permissible to speculate as to what the Legislature probably meant. In Administrator-General of Bengal v. Prem Lal Mullick, 22 I. A. 107 : (22 Cal. 788 P.C.), Lord Watson pointed out that in construing an Act proceedings of the legislature cannot be legitimately referred to but must be excluded from consideration. In a subsequent case Krishna Ayyangar v. Nallaperummal Pillai, 47 I. A. 33 : (A.I.R. (7) 1920 P. C. 56), the Judicial Committee reiterated the rule that

"No statement made on the introduction of the measure or its discussion can be looked at as affording any guidance as to the meaning of the words."

Reference should also be made to Queen v. Capel, (1840) 12 Ad. & E. 382 : (2 L. J. (N. S.) M. C. 65) in which Denman C. J. said :

"We are pressed with a history of the introduction of this proviso into the Act in its passage through Parliament. Of such facts, if capable of being ascertained, we are not permitted judicially to take notice. The law must ever be interpreted by the general rules of construction and we cannot travel out of its language in search of any supposed intention."

The function of a judicial tribunal is, therefore, limited to construing words employed in the Act. It is not justified in forcing into them a meaning which they cannot reasonably bear. The question is not what may be supposed to have been intended by the Legislature but what has been said. The duty of the Court is to interpret and not to enact.

[30] In the present case it is manifest that S. 4 (1) (a) which plainly refers to "the commission of any offence of murder or any cognizable offence of violence" cannot without strain upon the language be restricted in its scope and connotation to such aggravated forms of murder, insurrection or violence which tend to overthrow or undermine the security of the State. In my opinion, S. 4 (1) (a) of the Act cannot be construed as directly concerning or relating to any matter "which undermines the security of the State or tends to overthrow the State". It follows that S. 4 (1) (a) is an infringement of the constitutional right of freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by Art. 19 (1) and is in consequence void.

[31] This conclusion is supported by the recent decision of the Supreme Court in Brij Bhushan v. State of Delhi, (1950) 13 S.C.J. 425 : (A.I.R. (37) 1950 S.C. 129 : 51 Cr.L.J. 1525) in which a question was raised as to the validity of S. 7 (1) (c), East Punjab Safety Act which enacted :

"The Provincial Government or any authority authorised by it in this behalf if satisfied that such action is necessary for the purpose of preventing or combating any activity prejudicial to the public safety or the maintenance of public order may, by order in writing addressed to a printer, publisher or editor—

* * * * *

(c) require that any matter relating to a particular subject or class of subjects shall before publication be submitted for scrutiny."

The petitioners before the Supreme Court were the printer and editor of an English weekly of Delhi called "Organizer" and they prayed for issue of writs of certiorari and prohibition to the Chief Commissioner, Delhi, with a view to quash an order made on 2-3-1950 under the impugned section of the East Punjab Safety Act 1949 directing them

"to submit for scrutiny, in duplicate, before publication, till further orders, all communal matter and news and views about Pakistan including photographs and cartoons other than those derived from official sources or supplied by the news agencies . . . ."

The order recited that the Chief Commissioner was satisfied that the "Organizer" had been publishing highly objectionable matter constituting a threat to public law and order and that action was necessary for the purpose of preventing or combating activities prejudicial to public safety and maintenance of public order. The Supreme Court held by majority that Art. 19 (2) of the Constitution only reserves a law which is directed solely against the undermining of the security of the State or overthrow of it and that S. 7 (i) (c), East Punjab Public Safety Act, 1949, which authorised imposition or restrictions for the wider purposes of securing public safety or the maintenance of public order fell outside the scope of authorised restrictions under cl. (2) of Art. 19 and was therefore void and unconstitutional.

[32] On behalf of the State, the argument was stressed that S. 4 (1) (a) of the Act could not be considered wholly void as under Art. 13 (1) an existing law inconsistent with fundamental right was void only to the extent of inconsistency and no more. It was contended that in so far as the matter encouraging the offence of murder or any cognizable offence involving violence would affect the security of the State, the impugned provision was covered by cl. (2) of Art. 19 and must, it was urged, be held to be valid. Learned counsel pointed out that S. 4 (1) (a) of the Act would include in its connotation and scope cases of political murder, insurrection and rebellion which doubtless undermine the security of the State and the application of the section to such cases cannot be held to be unconstitutional. But the argument must be rejected in view of the principle laid down in Romesh Thappar v. State of Madras, 1950 S. C. J. 418:(A.I.R. (37) 1950 S. C.124:51 Cr.L.J. 1514) in which the Supreme Court held that where a law purports to authorise the imposition of restrictions on a fundamental right in language wide enough to cover restriction both within and without the limits of constitutionally permissible legislative action affecting such right, it is not possible to uphold it even so far as it may be applied within the constitutional limits as it is not severable. In other words cl. (2) of Art. 19 having allowed the imposition of restrictions on the freedom of speech and expression only in cases where danger to public security is involved an enactment which is capable of being applied to cases where no such danger could arise cannot be held to be constitutional and valid to any extent.

[33] On behalf of the State Government, the argument was stressed that there is a presumption in favour of the constitutional validity of the impugned Act—that such a meaning should be given to the statute as to uphold its validity for the legislative body must be held to intend to keep within its powers. But no such presumption can be invoked in the present case. In the first place, the presumption does not apply to an Act, the language of which is unambiguous and the effect clearly beyond the competence of the Legislature by which the Act was passed. Only in case of doubt will "every possible presumption and intendment be made in favour of the constitutionality of the Act." The second and more important reason is that in the present case the presumption supporting legislation is balanced by the priority given in the scheme of the constitution to the fundamental liberties. When a statute appears on its face to invade the basic guarantee in the constitution the presumption is against the validity of the law and the burden of proof will rest upon those who defend it to show that the invasion of civil liberty is justified by the exceptions enacted. The doctrine has been stated by Rutledge J. in the American case Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516:

"The case confronts us again with the duty our system places on this Court to say where the individual's freedom ends and the State's power begins. Choice on that border, now as always delicate, is perhaps more so where the usual presumption supporting legislation is balanced by the preferred place given in our scheme to the great, the indispensable democratic freedoms secured by the First amendment. That priority gives these liberties a sanctity and a sanction not permitting dubious intrusions. And it is the character of the right, not of the limitation, which determines what standard governs the choice."

[34] It is manifest that the Constitution has set stringent limits to permissible legislation abridging the right of freedom of speech. The preamble solemnly proclaims that the framers of the Constitution have resolved that "liberty of thought and expression" shall be secured to all the citizens of the Republic. In the scheme of the Constitution, freedom of speech and expression has been designated as a "fundamental right." The phrase is not an empty one and so not lightly used. It reflects the belief of the framers of the Constitution that exercise of these rights lies at the foundation of free Government, and that without freedom of speech the appeal to reason which is the basis of democracy cannot be made. To adopt the language of Murphy J. in Thornhill v. State of Alabama, 310 U. S. 88 :

"The safeguarding of these rights to the ends that men may speak as they think on matters vital to them and that falsehoods may be exposed through the processes of education and discussion is essential to free government. Those who won our independence had confidence in the power of free and fearless reasoning and communication of ideas to discover and spread political and economic truth. Noxious doctrines in those fields may be refuted and their evil averted by the courageous exercise of the right of free discussion. Abridgment of freedom of speech and of the press, however, impairs those opportunities for public education that are essential to effective exercise of the power of correcting error through the processes of popular government."

[35] Upon all these grounds I hold that S. 4 (1) (a) of the Press Act is unconstitutional and void and the order of the State Government dated 8-9-1949 made against the petitioner should be set aside.

(Per *Sarjoo Prasad and Rai JJ; Shearer J. It is in this orthodox & juristic sense that the term 'judgment' appears to have been used. The term 'judgment' in Art. 133 has been used in the same sense as it was used in S. 205, Government of India Act, 1935 & the dropping of the word 'final' before the word 'judgment' did not make any difference whatsoever. Any judgment which the H. Ct. pronounces under S. 21 (5), Bihar Sales Tax Act in regard to the questions of law referred to it by the Revenue authorities is not a judgment in the technical sense of the term but merely a sort of opinion or advice. The fact that under S. 21 (3), Bihar Sales Tax Act, the H. Ct. calls for a reference from the Revenue-authorities does not lend any additional finality to the judgment which the H. Ct. comes to pronounce on the hearing of the reference. [Paras 30, 32, 38, 45]

(Per Ruben J. in the Order of Reference) — Reference to a third Judge of the H. Ct. on a difference of opinion between two Judges in a reference under S. 21 (3), Bihar Sales Tax Act (VI [6] of 1944) is not competent either under S. 98, Civil P. C. or under Cl. 28, Letters Patent, it being a case of jurisdiction under a special statute. But there being no procedure provided by law in such a case, it is open to the Chief Justice of the H. C. to mould a convenient form of procedure & refer the case to the third Judge. [Para 6] pretation of S. 5 (2) (a) (v), Bihar Sales Tax Act — Civil P. C. (1908), S. 109 — Sales Tax — Bihar Sales Tax Act (VI [6] of 1944), Ss. 5 (2) (a) (v) and 21 (3).

(Reuben and Das JJ., in the Order of Reference) —If Art. 133 can be applied to an opinion given by the H. ORDER OF REFERENCE.

Reuben J. — This is an appln. for leave to appeal to the S. C. from a decision of this Ct. on a reference under S. 21 (3), Bihar Sales Tax Act, 1944 (Bihar Act VI [6] of 1944), hereafter referred to as the taxing Act.

[2] The period of assessment is 1-10-1944, to 31-3-1945. The accepted gross turnover of the assessee company petnr. during this period is Rs. 3,41,98,000. Deduction is claimed under S. 5, sub-s. (2), cl. (a) (v) of the taxing Act in respect of a turnover of Rs. 2,93,15,000. Under this clause, the turnover of the assessee is exempted from liability to pay tax to the extent that it is derived from

"sales of goods which are shown to the satisfaction of the Comr. to have been despatched by, or on behalf of, the dealer to an address outside Bihar."

The exemption is claimed in respect of goods despatched by the assessee company to addresses outside Bihar in pursuance of an agreement between it & the Imperial Tobacco Company of India, Ltd. By this agreement, the assessee Company contracted to despatch the goods manufactured by it, on behalf of the Imperial Tobacco Company of India, Ltd. & in the name of that company, to destinations inside Bihar or out of Bihar according to the directions of that company, which on its side, agreed to pay to the assessee company by way of remuneration the full cost of manufacture plus 25 per cent. of such cost.

[3] The reference was first heard by my learned brother, Das & Sarjoo Prasad JJ. On a difference between them, it was referred to B. P. Sinha J., who while agreeing with Das J. & disagreeing with Sarjoo Prasad J. as to the correct interpretation of the relevant clause of the taxing Act, has on another line of reasoning arrived at the same conclusion as Sarjoo Prasad J. On the facts, all their Lordships are agreed that the transactions between the two companies amount to sales, & that the sales were completed & the property in the goods had passed to the Imperial Tobacco Company of India, Ltd., before the despatch of the goods. Das J. considered that the taxing Act, in accordance with the accepted principle of construing such Acts, must be interpreted strictly in favour of the subject & therefore, the physical despatch of the goods by the assessee was "despatch" by him within the meaning of the relevant clause of the taxing Act. In the opinion of Sarjoo Prasad J., S. 5, sub-s. (2), cl. (a) (v) has no application where the sale is complete before the despatch of the goods, & the title is no longer in the vendor. B. P. Sinha J. pointed out that S. 5, sub-s. (2), cl. (a) (v) lays stress on the Comr. being satisfied as to the despatch being by the dealer or otherwise. He held that the H. C. is bound to accept the finding of the Comr. that the goods were physically despatched by the assessee but the despatch was made by him on behalf of the vendee; in other words, the despatch must be held to be despatch by the vendee & therefore, not entitled to exemption from sales tax.

[4] A preliminary point has been raised as to whether the reference to B. P. Sinha J. was competent & whether there is a lawful decision of this Ct. disposing of the reference under S. 21, sub-s. (3) of the taxing Act, in respect of which decision leave to appeal can be asked for. The provision for a reference to a third Judge is contained in Cl. 28, Letters Patent of this H. C. & S. 98, Civil P. C. Clause 28 relates to a difference of opinion arising in the exercise of the H. C.'s "original or appellate jurisdiction". Section 98 relates to a difference arising in appeal; under sub-s. (3) this section is subject to the provisions in the Letters Patent. In Birendra Kishor v. Secretary of State, 48 Cal. 766 : (A.I.R. (8) 1921 Cal. 262) for the purpose of deciding whether counsel should be instructed by Vakil or by Attorney, a reference made under a similar provision in S. 51, Income-tax Act, 1918 (VII [7] of 1918) was treated as relating to the civil appellate jurisdiction of the H. C. This view was not accepted by Rankin & Page JJ. in Emperor v. Probhat Chandra Barua, 51 Cal. 504 : (A. I. R. (11) 1924 Cal. 668), which related to a difference of opinion in a similar reference under the Income-tax Act, 1922 (XI [11] of 1922). Relying on Tata Iron & Steel Co., Ltd. v. Chief Revenue Authority, Bombay, 50 I. A. 212 : (A. I. R. (10) 1923 P. C. 148), their Lordships held that this was a case of special jurisdiction to which the Code of Civil Procedure is not applicable, an opinion with which I respectfully agree. They held, however, that it was covered by Cl. 36, Letters Patent (corresponding to Cl. 28, Letters Patent of this Ct.) & disposed of the reference accordingly. The attention of their Lordships does not appear to have been drawn to the words "hereby directed" in the opening sentence of Cl. 36. With respect, I would observe that the provisions in this clause relate to a difference of opinion arising in the exercise of a function which is directed by the Letters Patent to be performed by the H. C. in the exercise of its original or appellate jurisdiction. There is nothing in the Letters Patent providing for the exercise of the jurisdiction in question, it being a jurisdiction that is vested in the H. C. by a special statute. These observations apply also to the present case & Cl. 28, Letters Patent of this Ct.

[5] Recognition to the view which I have just expressed has been given by an amendment of the Income-tax Act, 1922, which was made in 1926. By this amendment, S. 66A was inserted providing, inter alia, for the procedure to be followed in the event of a difference of opinion between the Judges in the hearing of a reference under the Act.

[6] In my opinion, neither Cl. 28, Letters Patent nor S. 98, Civil P. C., has any application. There is no provision in the taxing Act similar to S. 66A, Income-tax Act, 1922. This, however, creates no difficulty. There being no procedure provided by law, it was open to my Lord the Chief Justice to mould a convenient form of procedure, vide Smith v. Williams, (1922) 1 K. B. 158: (91 L. J. K. B. 156), which was followed in Maharajadhiraja of Darbhanga v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 9 Pat. 240 at p. 277: (A. I. R. (17) 1930 Pat. 81 S. B.). The preliminary objection, therefore, fails.

[7] There is more substance in the further objection, also of a preliminary nature, that the appln. is not maintainable. In reply to the objection, it has been stressed by Mr. P. R. Das that the appln. is under Art. 133, Const. Ind. which is wider in terms than the provision for appeal to the P. C. contained in the Letters Patent. It is pointed out that under Cl. 31, Letters Patent an appeal lay from "any final judgment, decree or order of the High Court at Patna made on appeal, and from any final judgment, decree or order made in the exercise of original jurisdiction, etc.," whereas, under Art. 133 an appeal lies from "any judgment, decree or final order in a civil proceeding of a High Court". (The italics are mine). Sub-section (5) of S. 21 of the taxing Act provides that the H. C., on the hearing of a reference, shall "decide" the question of law referred & shall deliver its "judgment", which it shall send to the Board of Revenue & the Board shall dispose of the case accordingly. It is contended, the decision of the H. C. in this case is, therefore, a judgment & since under Art. 133 it is not necessary that the judgment in question must be final, Tata Iron & Steel Co. Ltd. v. Chief Revenue Authority, Bombay, (50 I. A. 212: A. I. R. (10) 1923 P. C. 148 supra), which was decided under the earlier law, has no application. In my opinion, that decision does not proceed merely on the fact that the "judgment" sought to be appealed against was not final. That case related to an appeal from a decision of the Bombay H. C. upon a case stated by the Chief Revenue Authority under S. 51, Income-tax Act, 1918, the provisions of which were substantially the same as the provisions of the taxing Act. There, as here, it was provided that, on the hearing of the reference, the H. C. shall "decide" the question raised & shall deliver "judgment" thereon containing the grounds on which the decision is founded, & shall send the Revenue Authority a copy of this "judgment" under the seal of the Ct. & the signature of the Registrar, & the Revenue Authority shall dispose of the case accordingly. For an appeal to lie under Cl. 36 (39?) (corresponding to Cl. 31, Letters Patent of this Ct.) it was necessary that the decision of the H. C. should be either a "final judgment", or "final decree", or a "final order". Their Lordships first considered whether it was a "final judgment" & answered the question in the negative. They commenced with the definition of "final judgment" given by Lord Selborne in Ex parte Moore, 1885-14 Q. B. D. 627, that nothing more is necessary than a proper litis contestatio & a final adjudication between the parties to it on the merits —a definition applicable to the decision before their Lordships. Apparently, however, they preferred the definition given by Lord Esher, (Lord Lindley & Bowen L. J. concurring), in Onslow v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1890) 25 Q. B. D. 465 : (59 L. J. Q. B. 556). That case concerned a decision of the Ct. of Exchequer on a reference under S. 19, Stamp Act, 1870 (34 & 35 Vict. C. 7). Under that Act the Ct. was empowered to assess any duty it might decide to be chargeable on the instrument in question, and to order a refund if it found an excess charge to have been made; in the event of decision confirming the assessment, the costs of the Comrs. were payable by the opposite party. The Ct. decided in favour of Comrs. & the question arose whether the decision of the Ct. was a "judgment" or an "order" for the purposes of appeal. Lord Esher came to the conclusion that it was not a "judgment," observing :

> "A 'judgment,' therefore, is a decision obtained in an action, & every other decision is an order."

Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee showed their acceptance of this definition by observing :

"This decision clearly establishes that the decision & an order made by Ct. under S. 51 of the jurisdiction (sci) cannot be held to be a 'final judgment' within the meaning of Cl. 39, Letters Patent, since there is nothing to show an intention in the year 1862 to use those words in a sense more extended than their legal sense."

They marked their acceptance of Lord Esher's definition by adding :

"It is evident from this case of Onslow v Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 1890-25 Q. B. D. 465 : (59 L. J. Q. B. 556), that the use of the words 'determine' & 'decide,' or the direction that money paid in excess is to be refunded or the awarding of costs against the unsuccessful party, are not things which distinguish a judgment from an order where questions are referred to the Cts. by case stated.

The word 'judgment' is indeed popularly used in many different senses, as when one says a certain man is a man of sound judgment, meaning that he is possessed of the intellectul faculty of deciding rightly on facts or circumstances, or where even in legal matters the expression of the opinion formed in a case by a judge who dissents from his colleagues is commonly called his judgment, though it can have no effect whatever on the determination of the suit or action in which it is delivered."

[8] It is true that their Lordships concluded by deciding that the decision was not a "final judgment," but this was because they were considering whether the decision was covered by Cl. 36, Letters Patent, & that clause speaks of a "final judgment."

[9] My view of what their Lordships found is supported by their discussion of the provision in S. 51, Income-tax Act, that the H. C. shall "decide" & shall "deliver judgment" &c., at the end of which discussion they remark:

"It would appear clear to their Lordships that the word 'judgment' is not here used in its strict legal & proper sense.

It is not an executive document directing something to be done or not to be done, but is merely the expression of the opinions of the majority of the judges who heard the case, together with a statement of the grounds upon which those opinions are based. It amounts only to a ruling that a certain deduction claimed by a tax payer to be allowed from the sum for which he has been already assessed to income-tax is not permissible."

If the decision is only an expression of opinion it cannot be a judgment.

[10] In the course of considering whether the decision of the H. C. was a "final order" their Lordships referred to In re Knight and the Tabernacle Permanent Building Society, (1892) 2 Q. B. 613 : (62 L. J. Q. B. 33) and Peter Johnson v. Glassgow Corporation, 1912 S. C. 300 & pointed out that in spite of the use of terms "decision" & "determination" the function of the Ct. may be merely advisory, even though the opinion of the Ct. be binding on the functionary who states the case for decision & they ended up with a relevant citation from the judgment of Lord Esher in the former case :

" 'In the case of Ex parte County Council of Kent, 1891-1 Q. B. 725, where a statute provided that a case might be stated for the decision of the Ct. it was held that though the language might prima facie import that there has to be the equivalent of a judgment or order, yet when the context was looked at it appeared that the jurisdiction of the Ct. appealed to was only consultative, & that there was nothing which amounted to a judgment or order."

[11] Again, because of the terms of Cl. 36, Letters Patent, their Lordships concluded that the decision of the H. C. was not "final order" but it appears from their judgment that in their opinion the decision was neither a "judgment" nor an "order". To exclude the application of Art. 133, however, it is sufficient that the decision is not a "final order".

[12] The words which their Lordships were interpreting were "final judgment, decree or order" occurring in the Letters Patent of the H. C. We are concerned here with the same words in the same juxtaposition: "judgment, decree or final order", & I would interpret them similarly. The "judgment" & the "decree" are no longer required to be "final" but that does not indicate that they are to be otherwise different in kind from the "judgment" & the "decree" contemplated by the previous law. I am strengthened in my opinion by Art. 136, Const. Ind. providing for special leave to appeal from "any judgment, decree, determination, sentence or order". The opinion expressed by the H. Cs. on a reference of the kind with which we are concerned would appear to be a "determination" within the meaning of this clause.

[13] On the view I have taken, Art. 133 has no application & it is not necessary to consider whether the proceeding in which that decision was given was a "civil proceeding" within the meaning of Art. 133. It has been suggested that this term has been used in contradistinction to the term "criminal proceeding" in Art. 134 which is not criminal. But Art. 132 of the Constitution seems to contemplate that the H. C. may exercise jurisdiction in "other proceedings" besides "civil proceedings" & "criminal proceedings," & the special jurisdiction of the H. C. under the taxing Act may be one instance of such "other proceedings." In this respect Art. 133 would not appear to be as wide as Cl. 31, Letters Patent, which provides for appeals in regard to matters "not being of criminal jurisdiction."

[14] Our attention has been drawn to the order of Agarwala C. J. & Nageshwar Prasad J. dated 9-3-1949, in granting leave to appeal in F. C. A. No. 71 of 1948. That was a case of an appeal against an order of this Ct. refusing to call upon the Board of Revenue to state a case under the Bihar Sales Tax Act, 1944. Their Lordships granted leave under Cl. 31, Letters Patent, following a decision of a Full Bench of the Lahore H. C., the appeal in which case was dismissed on the merits by the Judicial Committee without deciding the "serious" question whether cl. 29, Letters Patent of the Lahore H. C. (corresponding to Cl. 31, Letters Patent of this H.C.) had any application. Feroze Shah v. The Commissioner of Income tax, 12 Lah. 166: (A. I. R. (18) 1931 Lah. 138 F. B.), Feroze Shah v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 14 Lah. 682: (A.I.R. (20) 1933 P. C. 198). There is a considerable difference between an order refusing to call for a reference & a decision on a reference made, & the case of Tata Iron & Steel Co., Ltd. v. Chief Revenue Authority, Bombay, 50 I. A. 212: (A. I. R. (10) 1923 P. C. 148) is an authority that Cl. 31, Letters Patent has no application to the latter. The decision in F. C. A. No. 71 of 1948 is clearly distinguishable & Mr. P. R. Das has not pressed this appln. as one under the Letters Patent.

[15] In view of the opinion I have expressed, it is unnecessary to consider the final contention of the learned Advocate General that, on the merits, the petn. should be dismissed. Prima facie, a certificate would appear to be justified where three Honourable Judges of this Ct. have expressed differing views & such a larger sum of money is involved.

[16] Das J.—I regret I am unable to agree with my learned brother as to the effect of the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Tata Iron & Steel Co., Ltd. v. Chief Revenue Authority, Bombay, 50 I.A. 212: (A. I. R. (10) 1923 P. C. 148). No doubt, there are observations in the said judgment, with particular reference to an English decision relating to the Stamp Act, 1870 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 7), which seem to show that a judgment is a decision obtained in an action, & every other decision is an order. But the decision itself was on the question whether the judgment delivered by the H. C. on 28-2-1921, on a reference by case stated under S. 51, Income-tax Act, 1918, was a final judgment within the meaning of Cl. 39, Letters Patent of the Bombay H. C., corresponding to Cl. 31, Letters Patent of the Patna H. C. Lord Atkinson, who delivered the judgment of their Lordships, thus propounded the question for decision of their Lordships :

"In order, therefore, that the appeal in this case should be held to be competent, the decision & order of the H. C. under S. 51, Income-tax Act, must come within Cl. 39, Letters Patent. It must be either a final judgment or a final decree or a final order."

His Lordship then referred to Ex parte Moore, (1885) 14 Q. B. D. 627 at p. 632, where Lord Selborne laid down that to constitute an order a final judgment, nothing more is necessary than that there should be a proper litis contestatio & a final adjudication between the parties to it on the merits. His Lordship then referred to Onslow v. Commissioner of Inland Revenue, (1890) 25 Q. B. D. 465 : (59 L. J. Q. B. 556), which was a case under the Stamp Act, 1870. After referring to the observations of Cotton L. J., in Ex parte Chinery, (1884) 12 Q. B. D. 342 at p. 345 : (53 L. J. Ch. 662) with which Bowen & Kay L. JJ., concurred, his Lordship quoted Lord Esher as saying that a judgment is a decision obtained in an action, & every other decision is an order. But the decision which their Lordships of the Judicial Committee gave was thus expressed :

"This decision clearly establishes that the decision & an order made by the Ct. under S. 51 of the jurisdiction (sic) cannot be held to be a 'final judgment' within the meaning of Cl. 39, Letters Patent, since there is nothing to show an intention in the year 1862 to use those words in a sense more extended than their legal sense."

The words "final judgment" were put in quotation marks. Having decided that the decision was not a final judgment within the meaning of Cl. 39, Letters Patent, their Lordships went on to consider whether it was a final order within the meaning of that clause. The final decision of their Lordships was thus expressed :

"It would appear to their Lordships that having regard to the authorities cited, & for the reasons already stated, the decision, judgment or order made by the Ct. under S. 51, Income-tax Act in this case, was merely advisory, & not in the proper & legal sense of the term final, & thus so far as these considerations are concerned that the appeal is incompetent."

It is significant to note the use of the word 'judgment' in respect of the decision or order of the Ct. under S. 51, Income-tax Act. I think that it would be wrong to take the P. C. decision in a more extended sense than what their Lordships in express terms, stated the decision to be. The observations in Onslow v. The Commissioner of Inland Revenue, (1890) 25 Q. B. D. 465 : (59 L. J. Q. B. 556) which dealt with a different statute, were referred to in order to fortify the decision of their Lordships that the order of the H. C. was merely advisory & not in the proper & legal sense of the term 'final.' It is to be observed that the statute under which the decision of the H. C. was given in this case itself speaks of the decision as a 'judgment.' In Onslow v. The Commissioner of Inland Revenue, (1890) 25 Q. B. D. 465 : (59 L. J. Q. B. 556), the question whether the order of the Comrs. was a judgment arose, not because the Stamp Act of 1870 used the word 'judgment' in connection with the order of the Comrs., but because of R. 15 of O. 58 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883.

[17] Article 133, Const. Ind. uses the word 'final' before the word 'order' only, & does not use the adjective 'final' in connection with 'judgment' & 'decree.' The word 'judgment' did not occur in S. 109 or S. 110, Civil P. C. The words used there were

"any decree or final order passed on appeal by a High Court or by any other Court of final appellate jurisdiction," "any decree or final order passed by a High Court in the exercise of original civil jurisdiction" and "any decree or order when the case is certified to be a fit one for appeal to His Majesty in Council."

In Cl. 31, Letters Patent of the Patna H. C. the expression used is

"any final judgment, decree or order of the High Court of Judicature at Patna made on appeal, and any final judgment, decree or order made in the exercise of original jurisdiction by the Judges of the said High Court, etc."

In my opinion, the scope of Art. 133 of the Constitution is wider than the scope of Ss. 109 & 110, Civil P. C., & Cl. 31, Letters Patent; because it must be taken that the Constituent Assembly which made the Constitution, were aware of the previous state of the law, & advisedly dropped the word 'final' before the word 'judgment.'

[18] There is, however, a still further question which arises in this connection, & that question is if the judgment of the H. C. in a sales-tax matter is a judgment in a civil proceeding (I have underlined (here italicised) the important words). It has been contended before us that the expression "civil proceeding" has been used in Art. 133 in contra-distinction to the expression "criminal proceeding" used in Art. 134. Our attention has not been drawn to any direct decision on this question. After we had heard arguments in this case, I find that there are certain general observations in a judgment of the S. C. which have some bearing on the question. The decision is reported in the September issue of the All India Reporter, Pritam Singh v. The State, A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 169 : (51 Cr. L. J. 1270). Their Lordships were dealing with the case of an appeal by one Pritam Singh against the decision of the H. C. of Punjab at Simla, upholding his conviction on the charge of murder of one Buta Singh. His Lordship Fazl Ali J., who delivered the judgment of the Ct. referred to the relevant articles of the Constitution dealing with the appellate jurisdiction of the S. C. in the following words :

"The relevant articles of the Constitution dealing with the appellate jurisdiction of the S. Ct. are Arts. 132 to 136. Article 132 applies both to civil & criminal cases & under it an appeal shall lie to the S. Ct. from any judgment, decree or final order of a H. Ct. whether in a civil, criminal or other proceeding, if the H. Ct. certifies that the case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution. Article 133 deals with the appellate jurisdiction of this Ct. in Civil matters only, & it has been drafted on the lines of Ss. 109 & 110, Civil P. C., 1908. Article 134 constitutes the S. Ct. as a Ct. of criminal appeal in a limited class of cases only, & clearly implies that no appeal lies to it as a matter of course or right except in cases specified therein. Article 135 merely provides that the S. Ct. shall have jurisdiction & powers with respect to any matter to which the provisions of Art. 133 or Art. 134 do not apply, if the jurisdiction & powers in relation to that matter were exercisable by the F. C. immediately before the commencement of the Constitution under any existing law."

It is to be observed that Art. 135 of the Constitution has reference to the Abolition of the Privy Council Jurisdiction Act, 1949, which came into force on 10-10-1949, & under which all the powers that were possessed by the Judicial Committee of the P. C. in regard to cases or matters arising in India became exercisable by the F. C. of India, whether those powers were exercisable by reason of statutory authority or under the prerogative of the King.

[19] His Lordship then quoted Art. 136 & summarised the position thus:

"The points to be noted in regard to this article are firstly, that it is very general & is not confined merely to criminal cases, as is evident from the words 'appeal from any judgment, decree, sentence or order' which occur therein & which obviously cover a wide range of matters; secondly, that the words used in this article are 'in any cause or matter', while those used in Arts. 132 to 134 are 'civil, criminal or other proceeding', & thirdly, that while in Arts. 132 to 134 reference is made to appeals from the H. Cs. under this article, an appeal will lie from any Ct. or tribunal in the territory of India."

His Lordship then stated that by authority of Art. 136 the S. C. can grant special leave in civil cases, in criminal cases, in income-tax cases, in cases which come up before different kinds of tribunals & in a variety of other cases. It is worthy of note that income-tax cases are referred to separately from civil cases. The same point has been referred to again in the Bharat Bank Ltd., Delhi v. Employees of the Bharat Bank, A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 188 : (1950 S. C. R. 459). I must say that the question whether income-tax cases, or for that matter, sales tax cases, are civil proceedings within the meaning of Art. 133 of the Constitution, did not specifically arise for decision in Pritam Singh's case, A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 169 : (51 Cr. L. J. 1270); but the observations made therein seem to imply that income-tax cases or sales tax cases are not civil proceedings within the meaning of Art. 133, Const. Ind. In F. C. App. No. 71 of 1948 leave was granted by a Division Bench of this Ct. in a Bihar Sales Tax case on the assumption that the proceeding was a civil proceeding. The matter, therefore, requires consideration by a larger Bench.

[20] By the Court.—We are agreed that, if Art. 133, Const. Ind. applies, leave to appeal should be granted under cl. (1) sub-cl. (c) of that Article. But, for the reasons which we have given above, we are not agreed whether the order of this Ct. against which the right of appeal is claimed, is or is not a judgment within the meaning of Art. 133. The further question if it was a civil proceeding within the meaning of that Article also requires consideration by a larger Bench in view of the Division Bench decision in F. C. App. No. 71 of 1948, regarding the correctness of which we entertain some doubt. In the circumstances, we submit the case to his Lordship the Chief Justice with the suggestion that it may be referred to a larger Bench for disposal.

Opinion of the Full Bench

[21] Sarjoo Prasad J. — This is an appln. for leave to appeal to the S. C. from a decision of this Ct. arising out of a reference under S. 21 (3), Bihar Sales Tax Act, 1944 (Bihar Act VI [6] of 1944).

[22] The matter was at first placed for hearing before Reuben & Das JJ. Their Lordships were agreed that if Art. 133, Const. Ind. applied leave to appeal should be granted under cl. (1) sub-cl. (c) of that Article. There was, however, a difference of opinion between them as to whether the order of this Court from which the right of appeal was claimed is or is not a "judgment" within the meaning of Art. 133. The further question which arose for consideration by them was whether the decision in question related to or was a decision in a "civil proceeding' under the said Article. On this point, they doubted the correctness of the decision of this Ct. in F. C. App. No. 71 of 1948 in which leave was granted by a Division Bench in a Bihar Sales Tax Act case on the assumption that the proceeding was a civil proceeding. Reuben J. was of the view that the decision of this Ct. against which the present appln. is directed was not a decision in a "civil proceeding' as contemplated by Art. 133 of the Constitution Act. Das J. was inclined to the same view; but as both of their Lordships entertained doubt about the correctness of the aforesaid order in F. C. App. No. 71 of 1948 granting leave to appeal, they suggested that the matter should be referred for disposal to a larger Bench. Accordingly the matter has been placed before us.

[23] Mr. P. R. Das appearing on behalf of the appct. has conceded that the appln. for leave to appeal in the present case does not fall under ss. 109 & 110, Civil P. C., because the decision in question is neither a decree nor a final order coming under any of the said provisions. He also concedes that he has no right of appeal under the Letters Patent of this Ct. He, however, contends & very strongly contends that he is entitled to appeal under Art. 133, Constitution Act, & leave to appeal should, therefore, be granted to him.

[24] Article 133, Const. Ind. provides that "an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree or final order in a civil proceeding of a High Court in the territory of India if the High Court certifies (c) that the case is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court."
(I have omitted the irrelevant portions of the Article). It would, therefore, appear from the above that the two essential requisites of the Article in question are (1) that the appeal should be from any judgment, decree or final order & (2) that the said judgment, decree or final order must have been passed in a civil proceeding. It is, therefore, to be determined whether these two requisites of the Article have been satisfied before the appct. can be held entitled to a right of appeal to the S. C. As I have stated above, Reuben J. was definitely of the view that the decision of this Ct. from which the appeal is sought to be preferred does not fulfil either of these requirements. Das J. on the contrary, was of the view that it was a judgment & fulfils the first requirement but is doubtful in regard to the second requirement. His own view seems to be that it did not relate to a 'civil proceeding' though he felt some difficulty on account of the order of a Division Bench of this Ct. passed in F. C. App. No. 71 of 1948 following a F. B. decision of the Lahore H. C. in Feroze Shah v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 12 Lah. 166 : (A. I. R. (18) 1931 Lah. 138 F. B.). The net result is that both the learned Judges were of the opinion that the essential conditions of Art. 133 were not fulfilled. The co-existence of the two requisites being essential as enjoined by Art. 133, the appln. for leave to appeal should have been dismissed by their Lordships. The reference to this Bench, however, appears to have been necessitated merely because of the Division Bench order in F. C. App. No. 71 of 1948. Mr. P. R. Das for the appct. did not seriously press for our consideration the correctness of that order. He conceded that the said order had been passed at a time when the Constitution Act was not in force & he could not rely upon it in support of his present appln. for leave. My learned brother Reuben J. also observes that "the decision in F. C. App. No. 71 of 1948 is clearly distinguishable & Mr. P. R. Das has not pressed his appln. as one under the Letters Patent."

There was, therefore, no further point to be considered. It is necessary to mention in this context that the S. C. has since decided the appeal in which leave had been granted by this Ct. in F. C. App. No. 71 of 1948. I will have occasion to refer to this case at a later stage, but it may be sufficient to point out that the S. C. approved of the decision of this Ct. in Sri Harihar Gir v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., A. I. R. (28) 1941 Pat. 225 : (20 Pat. 561 S.B.) which refused to accept the view taken by the F. B. of the Lahore H. C.

[25] Mr. P. R. Das for the appct., however, argues that it should be held in disagreement with Reuben J. & in agreement with Das J. that the decision of this Ct. from which the appeal is sought to be preferred is a judgment, & it should also be held in disagreement with both the learned Judges that the decision in question did arise out of a civil proceeding. As elaborate arguments have been advanced at the Bar, I will deal with both these arguments separately. I may, however, say at once that I feel no hesitation in agreeing with my learned brother Reuben J, as to his decision on both the points canvassed before us. In doing so, I find that whatever doubts I may have had in the beginning have been more than dispelled & dissipated not only by the decision of the Judicial Committee in Tata Iron and Steel Co. v. Chief Revenue Authority, Bombay, 50 I. A. 212 : (A. I. R. (10) 1923 P. C. 148) on which Reuben J. relies, but also, as I shall presently show by a number of other authoritative pronouncements in all of which the same meaning of the term "judgment" has been consistently adopted. In order, however, to appreciate the legal aspect of the matter, it would be just as well to refer briefly to some of the salient facts giving rise to this appln. for leave.

[26] At the instance of the appct. who is also the assessee, this Ct. called upon the Board of Revenue to state a case in regard to certain points formulated by this Ct. This was done under authority of S. 21 (3), Bihar Sales Tax Act, 1944 (Bihar Act VI [6] of 1944), the relevant taxing statute. The Board of Revenue accordingly made a reference to this Ct. on those points of law affecting the assessment of the appct. during the period running from 1-10-1944 to 31-3-1945. The accepted gross turnover of the assessee during this period was Rs. 3,41,98,000. The petnr. claimed deduction under S. 5, sub-s. (2), cl. (a) (v) of the taxing Act in respect of a turnover of Rs. 2,93,15,000. This clause provides that the assessee is exempted from liability to pay sales tax on turnover derived from "the sales of goods which are shown to the satisfaction of the Comr. to have been despatched by, or on behalf of, the dealer to an address outside Bihar."

The exemption was claimed in respect of goods despatched by the assessee Company to an address outside Bihar though the sale itself had been completed in this province.

[27] This reference under S. 21 (3) of the taxing statute was first heard by my learned brother Das J. & myself, & as there was a difference of opinion between us in regard to this deduction claimed by the assessee, it was referred to my learned brother B. P. Sinha J. who by another line of reasoning arrived at the same conclusion as myself. On the facts we were all agreed that the transactions amounted to sales, & that the sales were completed & the property in the goods had passed to the vendee before the despatch of the goods outside the province. Das J. considered that the physical despatch of the goods by the assessee was all that was contemplated by the relevant clause of the taxing Act, &, therefore, the assessee was entitled to the deduction; whereas my own view was that the sale having been completed in this province before the despatch of the goods, & the title being no longer in the vendor, the exemption clause could not operate to the benefit of the assesee inasmuch as the taxing statute operated on all sales of goods in the Province. In my opinion, the exemption clause applied only with reference to sales of goods which were despatched by the dealer to an address outside the province, & in which the dealer retained a title in the goods before he despatched them. B. P. Sinha J. held that the clause laid stress on the comr. being satisfied as to despatch being by the dealer or otherwise, & the H. C. was bound to accept the finding of the Comr. on the point that the despatch was on behalf of the vendee. Thus the ultimate effect of these decisions was that all the points on which the Board of Revenue had been called upon to state a case under S. 21 (3) of the Act were answered against the petnr. It is against this decision of the Ct. that the petnr. has presented the above appln. for leave to appeal to the S. C.

[28] Mr. P. R. Das argues that the decision given by this Ct. under S. 21 (5) of the taxing statute is a judgment inasmuch as that sub-section itself provides that the H. C. on the hearing of a reference "shall decide the question of law" referred to & "shall deliver its judgment" which it shall send to the Board of Revenue "& the Board shall dispose of the case accordingly." Mr. Das, therefore, urges that this decision of the Court being a 'judgment' as provided by S. 21 (5) of the taxing statute, it must be held to be appealable under Art. 133, Constitution Act which does not speak of any final judgment but of "any judgment, decree or final order." Here he contrasts the language of Cl. 31, Letters Patent, which speaks of "any final judgment, decree or order of the High Court." According to the learned counsel, a judgment in order to be appealable need not be a 'final judgment,' & even if it is of an interlocutory character, it would still be appealable as the right of appeal appears to have been enlarged under Art. 133, Constitution Act, by dropping the word 'final' before 'judgment.' He also points out that the word 'final' has been used in that article with reference to an 'order' but not with reference to a 'judgment,' & from this he submits that it was never intended that the judgment from which the petnr. has a right of appeal must necessarily be in the nature of a final judgment.

[29] In order to understand the import of the term 'judgment' Reuben J. relied upon a decision of the P. C. in Tata Iron & Steel Company v. Chief Revenue Authority, Bombay, (50 I. A. 212: A.I.R. (10) 1923 P. C. 148) (supra). The decision, in consonance with old English precedents, adopts the meaning of the term 'judgment' which in legal phraseology has been all along attributed to it. I do not propose to encumber my discussion of the subject with long quotations from the aforesaid decision specially when the case has been succinctly analysed by my learned brother Reuben J. But I cannot help referring to a passage from the judgment of Lord Esher which the P. C. has quoted with approval and which has been so often quoted in Indian decisions. The passage runs as follows :

"In the same case Bowen L. J. says there is an inherent distinction between judgments and orders, & that the words 'final judgment' have a professional meaning, by which expression I think he meant to say, as Cotton L. J. had previously said, that a 'judgment' is a decision obtained in an action; and if that was his meaning, both these learned Lords Justices gave judgment to the same effect, and Fry L. J. agreed with him. A 'judgment', therefore, is a decision obtained in an action, and every other decision is an order. . . . . That is, in my opinion, a proper distinction. . . . . "

Following the above distinction the Privy Council held :

"This decision clearly establishes that the decision and an order made by the Court under S. 51 of the jurisdiction (sic) cannot be held to be a 'final judgment' within the meaning of Cl. 39, Letters Patent, since there is nothing to show an intention in the year 1862 to use those words in a sense more extended than their legal sense."

[30] I may observe in the context that Cl. 39, Letters Patent under consideration by the P. C. corresponds to Cl. 31, Letters Patent of this Court. Their Lordships further pointed out the danger of confusing the meaning of the expression 'judgment' in a popular or loose sense with the 'professional' or legal sense of the term. I will quote their own words :

"The word 'judgment' is indeed popularly used in many different senses, as when one says a certain man is a man of sound judgment, meaning that he is possessed of the intellectual faculty of deciding rightly on fact or circumstances, or where even in legal matters the expression of the opinion formed in a case by a judge who dissents from his colleagues is commonly called his judgment, though it can have no effect whatever on the determination of the suit or action in which it is delivered."

Therefore, the use of the term 'judgment' or 'final judgment' in the eye of law does not bear any different significance, and the use of the word 'final' as qualifying 'judgment' is merely ex cautela. It is in this orthodox and juristic sense that the term 'judgment' appears to have been used in Ss. 205 & 206, Government of India Act, 1935 or for the matter of that in Arts. 132, 133 and 134 of the present Constitution of India.

[31] Mr. P. R. Das, however, seeks to distinguish the above decision of the P. C. in Tata Iron & Steel Co. (50 I. A. 212 : A. I. R. (10) 1923 P. C. 148) (supra) in two ways. He contends in the first place that the decision is based upon the language of Cl. 39, Letters Patent, which used the expression 'final judgment'. If I may say so, this was the main point of distinction pressed by Mr. Das which found favour with the other learned Judge. The other point of distinction was sought to be evolved by the learned counsel out of a suggestion which fell from one of us in course of his reply to the arguments of the learned Govt. Pleader. The point is that under the Income-tax Act, 1918, there was no power in the H. C. to call upon the taxing authorities to state a case & that, therefore, the H. C. in deciding the points of law referred to it by the revenue authorities acted merely in an advisory capacity. It is for this reason that it was suggested that the judgment pronounced by the H. C. was not a judgment in the real sense of the term & the observations of the Judicial Committee should be confined only to that contest.

[32] It is true that under the law of Income-tax in India as it now stands or for the matter of that under S. 21 (3), Bihar Sales Tax Act, the H. C. is also empowered to call for a reference from the Revenue Authorities. This is what was done in the present case; but this factor to my mind does not improve the position & does not lend any additional finality to the judgment which the H. C. comes to pronounce on the hearing of the reference. Whether the Revenue authorities state a case to the H. C. on certain points of law arising out of their judgment or the H. C. calls upon them to state a case on such points of law, in either event the H. C. after the hearing of the case shall "deliver its judgment" & "shall send to the Board of Revenue a copy of such judgment" & "the Board shall dispose of the case accordingly." The position was exactly the same under S. 51, Income-tax Act, 1918 which came in for consideration by the P. C. If, therefore, the H. C. was then held to be acting in advisory capacity in delivering its judgment, the capacity of the H. C. is not altered when acting under S. 21 (5), Bihar Sales Tax Act, 1944. That the aforesaid change in the law has not affected the function of the H. C. in delivering its 'judgment' on such references is clear from another decision of the Judicial Committee in Rajendra Narayan Bhanj Deo v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 21 P. L. T. 869 : (A. I. R. (27) 1940 P. C. 158). In that case the H. C. had called for a reference under S. 66 (3), Income-tax Act, from the Revenue-authority & answered the points of law against the assessee who obtained special leave to appeal from the judgment of the H. C. The Judicial Committee, while disposing of the appeal, observed :

"The function of the H. C. in cases referred to it under S. 66 of the Act is advisory only & is confined to considering & answering the actual question referred to it."

[33] This is exactly the function under S. 21 (5), Sales Tax Act which says : "The High Court upon the hearing of any such case shall decide the question of law raised thereby . . ." (Italics are mine).

[34] In my opinion, there is no substance at all in this ground of distinction.

[35] The other point of distinction, namely, that the decision in Tata Iron and Steel Co., (50 I. A. 212 : A.I.R. (10) 1923 P. C. 148) (supra) being based only upon the language of Cl. 39, Letters Patent, can have no application to a case where the right of appeal is claimed under Art. 133, Constitution Act, is equally without merit. True it is that the right of appeal in that case was claimed under Cl. 39, Letters Patent where the expression 'final judgment' occurs but the decision proceeds not so much upon the language of Cl. 39 as upon the language of S. 51, Income-tax Act, which uses the word 'judgment' & which is very similar to S. 21 (5), Sales Tax Act.

[36] The question which the Judicial Committee posed for consideration was

"what is the nature & character of the acts which S. 51, Income-tax Act, authorizes & empowers the H. C. to do."

It then proceeds to analyse the various provisions of S. 51, Income-tax Act, which under sub-s. (3) provides 'that on the hearing of the case the High Court shall 'decide' the questions raised thereby, and shall 'deliver judgment' thereon containing the grounds on which the decision is founded and shall send to the Revenue-authority a copy of this judgment under the seal of the Court and the signature of the Registrar, and the Revenue-authority shall dispose of the case accordingly . . . .".

In view of this provision the P. C. observed as follows :

"This last provision merely means that the Revenue Officer in proceeding with the work in the course of which he was engaged when the question referred arose, shall be guided by the decision given, & shall make his assessment accordingly—the ultimate result being that he assesses the taxpayer at an amount which in his instructed opinion he Judges to be right . . . . The decision of the H. C. does not in any way enforce the discharge of that liability. It would appear clear to their Lordships that the word 'judgment' is not here used in its strict legal & proper sense."

[37] At another place with reference to such a judgment the Judicial Committee says :

"It amounts only to a ruling that a certain deduction claimed by a taxpayer to be allowed from the sum for which he has been already assessed to income-tax is not permissible."

and then the judgment finally concludes with these pertinent observations :

"It would appear to their Lordships that having regard to the authorities cited, & for the reasons already stated, the decision, judgment or order made by the Ct. under S. 51, Income-tax Act in this case, was merely advisory, & not in the proper & legal sense of the term final, & thus so far as these considerations are concerned that the appeal is incompetent."

[38] These observations apply with equal force to the language of S. 21 (5), Bihar Sales Tax Act, & it is perfectly clear from these observations that any judgment which the H. C. pronounces in regard to the questions of law referred to it by the Revenue-authorities is not a judgment in the technical sense of the term but merely a sort of opinion or advice; undoubtedly on those questions of reference the Revenue authorities are governed & they have to mould their order of assessment in the light of the advice so tendered by the H. C.

[39] It is significant to note that in the decision in question the P. C. relied upon the observations of Lord Esher in the case of Onslow v. Commissioner of Inland Revenue, (1890) 25 Q. B. D. 465 : (59 L. J. Q. B. 556) which arose under the Stamp Act, 1870 (34 & 35 Vict. C. 7). Under S. 19 of the said Statute a person dissatisfied with the order of the Comrs. could appeal to the Ct. of Exchequer & require the Comrs. to state a case upon the points on which the opinion of the Ct. was required & the Comrs. were bound to do so. On the hearing of the case the Ct. had the power to determine the questions submitted, & if the instrument in question in the opinion of the Ct. was chargeable with any duty, the Ct.

could assess that duty. If, on the other hand, the Ct. decided that the Comr.'s assessment is erroneous, any excess of duty which may have been paid thereunder or any penalty in respect thereof could be ordered by the Ct. to be refunded to the applts. with costs incurred in relation to the appeal. Under R. 15 of the Supreme Court Rules, the question arose whether such an order of the Ct. of Exchequer was a judgment or an order, & I have already shown, it was held that the order in question was not a 'judgment,' & therefore, special leave had to be obtained in order to enable the party to appeal within the meaning of the rule, Sections 56 to 59, Indian Stamp Act (II [2] of 1899) also provide for such references to the H. C. to be made by the Revenue-authority & the language of S. 59 also shows that the H. C. upon the hearing of any such case shall decide the question raised thereby & shall deliver its 'judgment' thereon containing the grounds on which such decision is founded; & the Ct. shall then send a copy of such judgment to the Revenue authority by which the case was stated, & the said authority shall dispose of the case conformable to such a 'judgment.' Here also although the word 'judgment' has been used, I do not know of any case where a party has been held entitled to prefer an appeal to the P. C. against a judgment of this character. Nor, in my opinion, such an appeal could be entertainable, the Stamp Act itself not having provided for such a contingency, because a judgment of such a nature is not a 'judgment' in the real sense of the term although it has its finality in respect of the points which are stated to the Ct. for its decision.

[40] The learned Govt. Pleader has further drawn our attention to the fact that Arts. 132 & 133, Constitution Act, are very much on the same lines as Ss. 205 & 206, Government of India Act, 1935. In Ss. 205 & 206, Government of India Act the expression 'judgment decree or final order' also occurs, & the decisions bearing on the interpretation of these sections of the Government of India Act a fortiori must have an important bearing upon the interpretation of Arts. 132 & 133, Constitution Act. He points out that the language of Arts. 132 & 133 in using the expression 'judgment, decree or final order' is not altogether new, & it must be assumed that when the Const. Ind. was framed, the framers of the Constitution must have been conscious of the law as it then stood. Indeed, my learned brother Das J., has very rightly pointed out that "it must be taken that the Constituent Assembly which made the Constitution, were aware of the previous state of the law & advisedly dropped the word 'final' before the word "judgment".

With great respect, I entirely endorse this view; but it appears that the attention of my learned brother was not drawn to the language of Ss. 205 & 206, Government of India Act, 1935, & the various decisions bearing on the point which support the conclusion that the word 'judgment' as used in the Government of India Act was used in the technical sense as understood in the English precedents, namely, in the sense in which Lord Esher understood it & Lord Atkinson approved of it in the aforesaid decision of Tata Iron and Steel Co. (50 I. A. 212 : A. I. R. (10) 1923 P. C. 148 (supra)).

[41] I shall now refer to one or two cases on the point. The first is the decision in S. Kuppuswami Rao v. The King, A. I. R. (36) 1949 F. C. 1 : (49 Cr. L. J. 625). There the question arose on the interpretation of S. 205, Government of India Act, in connection with a criminal appeal in which the H. C. had granted a certificate for leave to appeal to the F. C., Kania, C. J., in dealing with the preliminary objection as to the maintainability of the appeal observed that in order to determine that the Ct. had jurisdiction under the provisions of S. 205, it was necessary "to ascertain whether the appeal is really from judgment, decree or final order of the H. C.". He then considered the question as to what was the meaning of 'judgment, decree or final order of a High Court' within the meaning of the section, & following the decisions in various English & Indian precedents his Lordship held that it was not a final judgment. His Lordship next proceeded to ascertain the meaning of the words 'judgment & decree' & referred to the historic observations of Lord Esher M. R. in the case of Onslow v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1890-25 Q. B. D. 465 : 59 L. J. Q. B. 556) (supra). Then his Lordship observes :

"These & other English decisions make it clear that in England when the word judgment or decree is used, whether it is preliminary or final, it means the declaration or final determination of the rights of the parties in the matter brought before the Ct".

His Lordship further observes :

"In our opinion, the decisions of the Cts. in India show that the word 'judgment', as in England means the determination of the rights of the parties in the matter brought before the Ct.".

[42] An argument was advanced before their Lordships, as it has been advanced before us, that Cl. 39, Letters Patent of the H. Cts. of Calcutta, Bombay & Madras provided for appeals to His Majesty in Council from 'any final judgment, decree or order', & it was urged that in the absence of the qualifying word, 'judgment' in S. 205 (1), Constitution Act, it must be held to include a preliminary or interlocutory judgment, and that the order now under appeal fell under that category. His Lordship disposed of the argument thus :

"We are unable to accede to this view. In our opinion, the term 'judgment' itself indicates a judicial decision given on the merits of the dispute brought before the Ct."

[43] It has been argued that this decision being a decision in a criminal case can be no guide to us in the interpretation of Art. 133 of the Constitution Act. This contention does not appeal to me; nor did it appeal to their Lordships who said :

"The words are used in S. 205(1), Constitution Act, & impart jurisdiction to the F. C. to entertain appeals both in civil & criminal matters. As the same words give jurisdiction to the Court in both classes of cases, it will be improper to construe them in a certain way when applicable to appeals in civil matters & give them a wider meaning when considered in connection with appeals from criminal proceedings. The words judgment & final order, in connection with civil appeals, have received a definite judicial interpretation. In connection with civil appeals to this Ct. therefore, that interpretation has to be accepted. If so, the same interpretation has to be accepted in case of appeals from criminal proceedings brought to this Ct. under S. 205 (1), Constitution Act."

[44] The words 'judgment, decree & final order' are common to both Arts. 132 & 133 of the Constitution, & it cannot be doubted that Art. 132 applies to all proceedings including 'civil' & 'criminal'.

[45] To a similar effect is another decision of the F. C. in Mohammad Amin Brothers Ltd., v. The Dominion of India, A. I. R. (37) 1950 F. C. 77 : (1949 F. C. R. 842). This appeal did not arise out of a criminal proceeding but was directed against an order of the H. C. setting aside an order of another learned Judge of the same Ct. directing the compulsory winding up of the applt. Company. A preliminary objection was raised that the appeal was incompetent under S. 205 (1), Government of India Act, 1935, under which the H. C. had granted a certificate. The question which, therefore, arose was if the decision of the H. C. appealed from did or did not amount to "a final order, judgment or decree", B. K. Mukherjea J., who delivered the judgment of the Ct. observed that all the relevant authorities bearing on the question had been reviewed by the Ct. in the recent pronouncement of Kuppuswami Rao v. The King, A. I. R. (36) 1949 F. C. 1 : (49 Cr. L. J. 625) (supra), & the law on the point so far as that Ct. was concerned seemed to be well settled. His Lordship observed :

"The fact that the order decides an important & even a vital issue is by itself not material. If the decision on issue puts an end to the suit, the order will undoubtedly be a final one, but if the suit is still left alive & has got to be tried in the ordinary way, no finality could attach to the order."

I should observe that the effect of the H. C. order which was appealed against in that case was to keep the appln. for winding up on the file to be taken up for hearing after the final determination of certain income-tax & excess profits tax cases which were then pending. It was lastly contended before their Lordships that although the order in question may not have the effect of a final order "it could still be regarded as a judgment", & as such coming within the purview of S. 205, Government of India Act. This argument also did not find favour with their Lordships & they disposed of the same in the following words :

"In English Cts. the word 'judgment' is used in the same sense as a 'decree' in the Civil P. C., & it means declaration or final determination of the rights of the parties in the matter brought before the Ct; vide, S. Kuppuswami Rao v. The King, 1947 F. C. R. 180 at p. 189: (A.I.R. (36) 1949 F.C. 1: 49 Cr. L. J. 625). According to the definition given in the Civil P. C., a judgment is the statement of reasons given by a Judge on which a decree or order is based. If the order which is made in this case is an interlocutory order, the judgment must necessarily be held to be an interlocutory judgment & the collocation of the words 'judgment, decree or final order' in S. 205 (1), Government of India Act, makes it clear that no appeal is provided for against an interlocutory judgment or order."

Mr. P. R. Das has frankly conceded that the judgment in the present case was in the nature of an interlocutory judgment, but he argued, as it was argued on behalf of the applt. before their Lordships, that it was nonetheless a 'judgment' because it finally disposed of all the points of law referred to this Ct. by the Revenue-authorities. Having regard to these decisions, it is now too late to contend that a judgment of the character with which we are concerned is a 'judgment' within the meaning of Art. 133, Constitution Act. I have no doubt that the term 'judgment' in Art. 133 has been used in the same sense as it was used in S. 205, Government of India Act, & the dropping of the word 'final' before the word 'judgment' did not make any difference whatsoever.

[46] It is, therefore, unnecessary for me to refer to several other decisions on which reliance has been placed by Mr. P. R. Das. There has been undoubtedly a great deal of controversy over the meaning of the word 'judgment' as used in the Letters Patent of the Indian H. Cs. The decision of Page C. J. in the F. B. case of In re Dayabhai Jiwandas v. Murugappa Chettiar, 13 Rang. 457 : (A. I. R. (22) 1935 Rang. 267 F.B.) is remarkably refreshing for its hisoric details, its originality of thinking & boldness & clarity of expression. In that case, after a close analysis of numerous authorities on the point, his Lordship fell back upon the meaning which was attached to the word in the English precedents & held that the word 'judgment' in the Letters Patent meant a decree in a suit by which "the rights of the parties at issue in a suit are determined". In doing so, his Lordship observed as follows :

"Moreover, the view that we take of the meaning & effect of the term 'judgment' in the Letters Patent is in consonance with the opinion that has been expressed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on no less than three occasions; &, I apprehend, it is not open to the Cts. in India to construe the term 'judgment' as used in the Letters Patent in any other sense."

His Lordship then referred to the observations of Sir John Edge in Sevak Jeranchod Bhogilal v. The Dakore Temple Committee, 30 C. W. N. 459 : (A.I.R. (12) 1925 P. C. 155) & the observations of Lord Atkinson in Tata Iron & Steel Company, 50 I. A. 212 : (A. I. R. (10) 1923 P. C. 148) (supra) which I have already discussed above. He also referred to another decision of the Judicial Committee in Sabitri Thakurain v. Savi, 48 Cal. 481 : (A. I. R. (8) 1921 P. C. 80) and then summed up in these words :

"It appears, therefore, that the Judicial Committee in three cases have expressly & plainly laid down that the term judgment' in the Letters Patent of the H. C. means 'decree' & not 'order,' in the strict legal sense in which those terms are understood & defined."

Page C. J. has very rightly conceded that the construction which in the opinion of the Full Bench was placed upon the term 'judgment' in the Letters Patent had not found favour in other H. Cs. in India. But at the same time, in my opinion, his Lordship was justified in asserting that this was of no consequence, when he found ample support for his construction on the repeated pronouncements of the Judicial Committee based on English precedents as to the right & technical meaning of the word 'judgment.' I am not here unmindful of the doubt expressed by Rankin C. J. in Brajagopal Roy v. Amar Chandra, 56 Cal. 135 : (A. I. R. (16) 1929 Cal 214 F. B.) as to whether for the purposes of interpreting S. 15 of the Letters Patent "the correct technical use of the word 'judgment' in England is safe guide." Speaking for myself, with great respect, I do not see why it should not be so especially when the Judicial Committee itself in dealing with various cases on the point from Indian Cts. arising under the Letters Patent has repeatedly expressed itself in consonance with the English precedents. Instead of being tossed about on the waves of doubts & uncertainties in a vast sea of literature on the subject, I consider it safe to adhere to old & well-established moorings. The matter, as I have shown appears now to be concluded by the view taken in the F. C. decisions mentioned by me above pertaining to the construction of the very same expression 'judgment-decree or final order' used in S. 205, Government of India Act of 1935.

[47] Fortunately for us there is another very recent decision of the S. C. which has a direct bearing upon the interpretation of S. 21, Bihar Sales Tax Act, & the meaning of the word 'judgment' as used in that Section. I refer to the decision of Premchand Satramdas v. The State of Bihar, Supreme Court Appeal No. 61 of 1950 : (A.I.R. (38) 1951 S. C. 14). I have already shown that the decision relates to the F. C. App. No. 71 of 1948 in which leave had been granted by this Ct. The assessee applt. in that case had applied to the H. C. for requiring the Board of Revenue to state a case but his appln. was summarily rejected. He then applied for leave to appeal to the F. C. which the H. C. granted following the decision of a F. B. of the Lahore H. C. in Feroze Shah v. Income-tax Commissioner, Punjab & N. W. F. P. Lahore, (12 Lah. 166 : A.I.R. (18) 1931 Lah. 138 F.B.) (supra). The said appeal from the judgment of the Lahore H. C. was dismissed by the Privy Council on merits though the Privy Council did not decide the objection as to competency of the appeal which it characterised to be a serious objection. At the commencement of the hearing of the appeal before the S. C., a preliminary objection was raised that the appeal was not competent & their Lordships upheld the objection as well founded. In that connection their Lordships referred with approval to a Special Bench decision of this Ct. in Harihar Gir v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., A.I.R. (28) 1941 Pat. 225 : (20 Pat. 561 S.B.) where it was held on an exhaustive review of various authorities that

"no appeal lay to His Majesty in Council under Cl. 31, Letters Patent of the Patna H. C. from an order of the H. C. dismissing an appln. under S. 66 (3), Income-tax Act (a provision similar to S. 21 of the Act before us) to direct the Commissioner of Income-tax to state a case."

Their Lordships then proceeded to construe S. 21, Bihar Sales Tax Act, & held as follows :

"All that the H. C. is required to do under S. 21, Bihar Sales Tax Act is to decide the question of law raised & send a copy of its judgment to the Board of Revenue. The Board of Revenue then has to dispose of the case in the light of the judgment of the H. C. It is true that the Board's order is based on what is stated by the H. C. to be the correct legal position but the fact remains that the order of the H. C. standing by itself does not affect the rights of the parties, & the final order in the matter is the order which is passed ultimately by the Board of Revenue. This question has been fully dealt with in Tata Iron & Steel Co. v. Chief Revenue Authority Bombay, 50 I. A. 212 : (A. I. R. (10) 1923 P. C, 148) where Lord Atkinson pointed out that the order made by the H. C. was merely advisory & quoted the following observations of Lord Esher in In re Knight & the Tabernacle Permanent Building Society, (1892) 2 Q. B. 613 at p. 617 : (62 L. J. Q. B. 33).

In the case of Ex parte County Council of Kent, (1891-1 Q. B. 725) where a statute provided that a case might be stated for the decision of the Ct. it was held that though the language might prima facie import that there has to be the equivalent of a judgment or order, yet when the context was looked at it appeared that the jurisdiction of the Ct. appealed to was only consultative, & that there was nothing which amounted to a judgment or order."

Their Lordships also held that the decision in question was not given by the H.C. in the exercise of either original or appellate jurisdiction because the H. C. acquired jurisdiction to deal with the case by virtue of an express provision of the Bihar Sales Tax Act, & they held that

"the crux of the matter, therefore, is that the jurisdiction of the H. C. was only consultative & was neither original nor appellate."

Having regard to the categorical observations it is beyond any shadow of doubt that the judgment of the H. C. pronounced on such references under the taxing statute cannot be called such a 'judgment' as to give the appct. a right of appeal under Art. 133, Constitution Act, Mr. P. R. Das further relied upon a decision in P. A. Raju Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, (1949) 17 I. T. R. 353 (Mad.). This decision no doubt supports Mr. Das, but, in my opinion, the decision of the S. C. now puts the matter beyond the pale of controversy.

[48] On the other question as to whether the decision from which the petnr. seeks to appeal to the S. C. arises out of a 'civil proceeding,' both Reuben & Das JJ. seem to be in agreement that it did not, & the contention of Mr. P. R. Das that a 'civil proceeding' means & includes all proceedings except those that are criminal does not appear to have found favour with their Lordships. Indeed, as Reuben J. observed, Art. 132 itself contemplates that the H. C. may exercise jurisdiction in 'other proceedings' besides 'civil proceedings' & 'criminal proceedings' & the special jurisdiction of the H. C. under the taxing Act may be one instance of such 'other proceedings.' Therefore, it follows that 'civil proceedings' cannot be held to include all proceedings save 'criminal proceedings.' The learned Govt. pleader has contended that proceedings under the taxing statutes stand entirely on a different footing inasmuch as the ruling authority in such cases proceeds to levy taxes in exercise of its sovereign rights. The proceeding, therefore, under the taxing statute cannot be regarded as a 'civil proceeding.' He relies upon a decision of the Judicial Committee of the P. C. in Raleigh Investment Co., Ltd. v. Governor-General in Council, A. I. R. (34) 1947 P. C. 78 : 74 I. A. 50 where it was pointed out that a jurisdiction to question the assessment of income-tax otherwise than by use of the machinery expressly provided by the Act would appear to be inconsistent with the 'statutory obligation to pay arising by virtue of the assessment. Their Lordships did not lend countenance to the claim of the assessee to question the assessment in a Civil Ct. on the ground that the assessing officer had taken into account an ultra vires provision of the taxing statute. Their Lordships observed that the Act contained the machinery which enabled an assessee to effectively raise the question whether or not a particular provision of the Act bearing on the assessment made upon him is ultra vires, & the assessee should avail himself of that provision for getting redress against the order of assessment & could not institute a civil suit for the purpose. It may be that this decision may in some respects have to be considered in the light of the fundamental rights vouchsafed under the Constitution Act. But at any rate it is quite clear from this decision that the proceedings under the taxing statutes are something quite different from 'civil proceedings'. Das J. if I may say so with respect, has very aptly referred in this context to the decisions of the S. C. in Pritam Singh v. The State, A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 169 : (51 Cr. L. J. 1270) & Bharat Bank Ltd. Delhi v. Employees of the Bharat Bank, A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 188 : (1950 S. C. R. 459), which also support the same inference. The provisions of Art. 136, Constitution Act, indicate that the S. C. can grant special leave in civil cases, in criminal cases, in income-tax cases, in cases which come up before different kinds of tribunals and in a variety of other cases. I agree with Das J., therefore that the observations made in those cases seem to imply that income-tax cases and sales tax cases are not 'civil proceedings' within the meaning of the Constitution Act.

[49] The result is that the application before us does not fulfil either of the two requirements of Art. 133 of the Constitution Act. It may be that, as in the present Income-tax law a right of appeal has been specifically provided for, the State Government or the Union of India may provide in the taxing statute itself dealing with the levy of sales tax for a right of appeal to the S. C., but so long as it is not done, a right of appeal cannot be claimed as a matter of course ; and it is impossible for me now to attach any different meaning to the term 'judgment', as used in Art. 133, Constitution Act, than what has been attributed to it consistently by the various authoritative pronouncements which I have discussed above. For these reasons, I hold that the petnr. has no right of appeal to the S. C., and, therefore, leave to appeal cannot be granted. The application fails and must be dismissed with costs, hearing fee five gold mohurs.

[50] Rai J. — I entirely agree with the Hon'ble Sarjoo Pd. J. I have nothing more to add.

[50a] Shearer J. — The marginal note to Art. 133 of the Constitution is "appellate jurisdiction of S. C. in appeals from H. C. in regard to civil matters." This is very similar to the marginal note to Art. 73, Australian Constitution Act, 1900, which is "appellate jurisdiction of H.C." Whereas, however, the opening words of Art. 73, Australian Constitution Act, 1900, are

"The High Court shall have jurisdiction, with such exceptions and subject to such regulations as the Parliament prescribes, to hear and determine appeals from all judgments, decrees, orders and sentences," the opening words of Art. 133 (1) are

"an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree or final order in a civil proceeding of a High Court in the territory of India if the High Court certifies."

It is thus clear that Art. 133 (1) of the Constitution confers, as S. 205, Government of India Act 1935, conferred, a general right of appeal. In England, where civil actions were until very recent times ordinarily tried with the aid of a jury, the word 'judgment' does not mean & has never meant what it means in this country. A judgment in England was & still is, the formal order drawn up at the conclusion of a trial embodying the decision of the Ct. To be more strictly accurate, it was originally the formal order drawn up at the conclusion of trials in the Common Law Cts. At the conclusion of trials in the Ct. of Chancery, the formal order was denominated a decree. When the first of the codes of Civil Procedure was enacted by the Indian legislature in 1859 the legislature chose to direct that the decisions of Civil Courts should be embodied in decrees & not in judgments & it gave to the word 'judgment' the meaning which it still has today. In consequence, under that Code & under each successive Code, appeals have lain from decrees or orders but not from judgments. Why is it then that the word 'judgment' appears along with 'decree' 'order' in S. 205, Government of India Act, 1935 & in Art. 133 (1) of the Constitution? The answer is, I think, to be found in history. The Judicial Committee of the P. C. as it now exists, was constituted in 1844 & S. 1 of 7 & 8 vict, C. LXIX under which it was constituted, enacted:

"That it shall be competent to Her Majesty, by any Order or Orders to be from time to time for that purpose made with the Advice of Her Privy Council, to provide for the Admission of any Appeal or Appeals to Her Majesty in Council from any judgments, Sentences, Decrees, or Orders of any Ct. of Justice within any British Colony or possession abroad .... & it shall also be competent to Her Majesty, by any such Order or Orders as aforesaid, to make all such Provisions as to Her Majesty in Council shall seem meet for the instituting & prosecuting any such Appeals."

It will be observed that the words used by the Imperial Parliament in 1844 were used by it again in 1900 in enacting S. 73, Commonwealth of Australia Act & still again in 1935 in enacting Ss. 205 & 206, Government of India Act except that in the latter Act the word "sentence" was for obvious reasons, omitted. There is no doubt, I think, that the words used in the statute of 1844 were used advisedly to embrace every kind of decision. There may in the British Empire, as it existed in 1844, have been colonies in which, the original settlers having carried the Common Law with them, the decisions of the Cts. were embodied in formal judgments based on the writs with which the action was commenced or in the formal decrees in use in the Ct. of Chancery in England, but in India & in other colonies or dependencies this was certainly not so. That appears to me to be a strong reason for supposing that the word 'judgment' was not used in S. 205, Government of India Act, 1935, on which Art. 133 (1) of the Constitution is based, in any narrow or technical or, as it has been called professional sense. In construing the words "any judgment, decree or final order," which appear in both of them, there are in my opinion two assumptions which can reasonably & ought to be made. One is that the draftsman of the Government of India Act, 1935, perfectly well aware of the meaning which the word "judgment" had in this country. The other is that, in using the words "judgment", the draftsman was not using it as synonymous with the word "decree", but as can nothing something which was or might not be either a decree or a final order. It is impossible, & indeed absurd, to suppose that the words "judgment" & "decree" were used in contradistinction to one another & as connoting a decision given, in the one case in the exercise of legal, & in the other in the exercise of equitable jurisdiction. That being so, it appears to me that the words "judgment, decree or final order" must be read together as a single phrase compediously including every decision except a decision which is an order & is not a final but a preliminary or interlocutory order. It is important to notice that these words occurred not only in S. 205, Government of India Act, but also in the section immediately following. Now. S. 206 conferred on the Indian Legislature power to abolish the jurisdiction exercised by His Majesty in Council in civil appeals. If the word "judgment" was intended to exclude a judgment under S. 21 (5), Bihar Sales Tax Act, 1944, it would also have excluded a judgment under S. 66A, Income-tax Act. In other words, while the Indian Legislature, in exercise of the power conferred on it by S. 206, Government of India Act, 1935, might have abolished the jurisdiction of His Majesty in Council in every other class of civil appeals, appeals against orders made by the H. C. on references under the Income-tax Act would still have lain to the Judicial Committee, & in order to transfer such appeals to the F. C., an Act of the British Parliament amending S. 206, Government of India Act, 1935, would have been necessary. Such a situation could not possibly have been intended. That it was not intended is, I think, made quite clear when one considers the amendment made in S. 206, Government of India Act, 1935, by the India Provincial Constitution Order, 1947. The words "judgment, decree or final order" were retained in the amended section. As, in 1947, the intention of His Majesty in Council in amending S. 206 was to enable the Dominion Legislature forthwith to abolish any right of appeal to the Judicial Committee, it is perfectly clear that the British Parliament & also the Govt. of India considered that the expression "judgment, decree or final order" was wide enough to cover decisions of the H. C. on references under S. 66A, Income-tax Act, &, if it is wide enough to cover such decisions it must also cover decisions under S. 21 (5), Bihar Sales Tax Act, 1944.

[51] In the course of the argument a large number of decisions were cited, but, as the question is one of first impression, these decisions are of no assistance, & it is, I consider, unnecessary to refer to them. Indeed, while decisions as to the construction to be put on S. 205, Government of India Act, 1935, may be in point, any other decisions cited were not strictly relevant, & to place any reliance on them would be to be in danger of falling into the cardinal error of attempting to construe one document by reference to the manner in which another & possibly similar, but nevertheless, different document has been judicially interpreted. I ought, however, to refer to the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Tata Iron & Steel Co. Ltd. v. Chief Revenue Authority Bombay, 50 I. A. 212 : (A. I. R. (10) 1923 P. C. 148). The recent decision of the Supreme Court in Premchand Satramdas v. The State of Bihar, Civil Appeal No. 61 of 1950 : (A. I. R. (38) 1951 S. C. 14) on which much reliance was placed by the learned Govt. Pleadar, merely affirmed the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee. In considering the applicability of the decision in Tata Iron & Steel Co. Ltd., v. Chief Revenue Authority Bombay, 50 I. A. 212 : (A I. R. (10) 1923 P. C. 148) it is necessary to bear in mind what exactly happened in that case. An assessee to income-tax, being dissatisfied with the assessment made on him, applied to the Chief Revenue Authority to state a case for the consideration of the H. C. The Chief Revenue Authority declined to do so, &, thereupon, the assessee applied under S. 45, Specific Relief Act, to the H. C. asking that a writ of mandamus should issue on the Chief Revenue Authority requiring him to do what he had declined to do. This appln. was successful, & in response to the writ which was issued, the Chief Revenue Authority stated a case. The decision of the H. C. was however, adverse to the assessee, & the assessee then applied for & was granted leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council. The ground on which, apparently, leave was asked for & was granted was that the decision of the H. C. was "a final judgment . . . . . made in the exercise of original jurisdiction". When the appeal came on for hearing, it was contended that no appeal lay & that leave ought not to have been granted by the H. C. The expression "final judgment", which occurs in the Letters Patent, occurs also in the English Bankruptcy Act, & Lord Atkinson, who delivered the judgment of their Lordships, strongly relied on interpretations which had been put on the expression in cases under the Bankruptcy Act. Under that Act a person, against whom a final judgment had been obtained & who had omitted to pay the judgment debt within a certain period after a notice had been served on him, was deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy. In Ex Parte Chinery, (1884) 12 Q. B. D. 342 : (53 L. J. Ch. 662) the question that arose was whether or not a garnishee order absolute was a final judgment & in Ex Parte Moore, (1885) 14 Q. B. D. 627 the question that arose was whether a judgment under which costs were awarded & under which also an enquiry had to be made as to damages was a final judgment or merely a preliminary or an interlocutory judgment. It was held that the latter was a final judgment, whereas the former was not & Bowen L. J. observed in the earlier case that the provisions in the Bankruptcy Act defining acts of bankruptcy should be construed as strictly as if they had occurred in a section which was defining a misdemeanour, because the commission of an act of bankruptcy entailed a disability on the person who commits it. Lord Atkinson, in following these decisions & pointing out that, technically in English law, a judgment was the decision obtained in an action & that any other decision was an order, did not explain why he considered it necessary to construe the language used in the Letters Patent with the same strictness as Bowen, L. J. had in a somewhat different case, thought desirable. The reason, however is. I venture to think, reasonably clear on general principle. In Sandback Charity Trustees v. North Staffordshire Railway Co., (1878) 3 Q. B. D. 1 : (47 L. J. Q. B. 10) Bramwell, L. J. observed :

"An appeal does not exist in the nature of things, a right to appeal from any decision of any tribunal must be given by express enactment."

In the British Commonwealth of Nations the Sovereign, as the head of the State is entitled, except in so far as He has parted with his prerogative right, to entertain appeals against any decision of any tribunal throughout His Dominions. His Majesty parts with this prerogative right either to entertain or to decline to entertain an appeal when any statute either expressly bars or expressly confers a right of appeal, the reason why, in such a case, the prerogative right is surrendered, being that His Majesty is an integral part of the legislature which has enacted the statute, & if assent to the statute is not, as in the case of Acts of the British Parliament, given by His Majesty himself, assent to it is given in His name. The Indian Income-tax Act, 1918, did not confer any right of appeal, nor, on the other hand, did it expressly bar an appeal. The appellant in Tata Iron & Steel Co., Ltd. v Chief Revenue Authority, Bombay, (50 I. A. 212 : A. I. R. (10) 1923 P. C. 148) was, therefore, entitled to ask for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council. In order to avoid the inconvenience which would be caused by requiring every suitor, who desired to appeal to His Majesty in Council, to apply for and obtain leave in London, His Majesty in Council has delegated to various tribunals in His Dominions the power to grant leave to appeal on His behalf. It was commonly said, but incorrectly, that a litigant in India had a right to appeal under the Letters Patent. In constitutional law, the real position in such a case, was that the H. C. had power to grant him leave to appeal. It necessarily followed that, when leave had been granted by a H. C. in India, the resp. in the appeal was entitled to contend in London that leave had been wrongly granted. In such a case the onus was on the applt. to show that, in granting him leave, the H. C. had not exceeded the power which had been delegated to it. That, in my opinion, was why their Lordships of the Judicial Committee took the words "final judgment, decree or order" as having been used in the Letters Patent distributively & why also they construed each of them strictly. Although, as I have said, Lord Atkinson did not explain why he chose to interpret the Letters Patent in the manner in which he did, his observation in the earlier part of the judgment that no general right of appeal, such as was conferred by the Judicature Act, 1873, existed strongly suggests that some such considerations weighed with him. Incidentally, it may be observed that the language used in the judicature Act, 1873, is not dissimilar to that used in S. 205, Government of India Act, 1935. In construing any Constitution Act, the Cts. are bound to give it a broad & liberal interpretation. For that reason, the words "judgment", "decree" "order" in Art. 133 (1) are not to be construed distributively. Regard must be had to the cumulative effect of them, & the phrase "any judgment, decree or final order" made in a civil proceeding must be regarded as a single compendious phrase, embracing every decision in a civil proceeding which is not a final but is merely a preliminary or an interlocutory order. It is in this manner that the very similar language used in S. 73, Commonwealth of Australia Act, 1900, appears to have been construed by the Cts. in Australia (see Quick & Garran on the Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth, p. 741). Apparently, in the Australian Cts., while the meaning of the individual words may be looked to in order to appreciate in effect of the whole it is the combined scope of the words to which regard is invariably had. If Art. 133 (1) of the Constitution is construed in this way, then, it appears to me that an appeal now lies agaist a decision of the H. C. given under S. 21 (5), Bihar Sales Tax Act, 1944. The decision is described in the Act itself as a judgment. There is no reason to assume that an appeal does not lie merely because the judgment is one given in exercise of a consultative or advisory jurisdiction. In Onslow v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1890) 25 Q. B. D. 465 : (59 L. J. Q. B. 556) a decision on which much reliance has been placed by the learned Govt. pleader, an appeal did lie against such a decision, the only question at issue being whether the decision of the Ct., against which an appeal was sought to be preferred, was a judgment or an order, the point being of importance as if the decision was a judgment, an appeal lay, whereas, if it was an order, an appeal was barred by limitation. I said a moment ago that, in my opinion, no decisions were directly relevant except decisions under S. 205, Government of India Act, 1935. Both parties have relied on two such decisions of the F. C. Mohammad Amin Brothers Ltd. v. The Domi- nion of India, A. I. R. (37) 1950 F. C. 77 : (1949 F. C. R. 842) & Kuppuswami Rao v. The Governor General of India, A.I.R. (36) 1949 F. C. 1: (49 Cr. L. J. 625) Mr. P. R. Das, for instance, says that a judgment under S. 21 (5), Bihar Sales Tax Act, 1944, is, in the words of the learned Chief Justice of India, "a judicial decision given on the merits of the dispute brought before the Ct.". It is Mr. Das says, immaterial that, before an actual assessment can be made, the matter has to go back to the Income-tax Officer. What is material, Mr. Das contends, is that, in making the assessment, the Income-tax Officer is bound by the judgment of the H. C. It is, I must confess, possible to isolate passages in each of the two judgments as supporting the other point of view. It has, however, to be remembered that in both cases the order against which an appeal was sought to be preferred was, quite plainly, a preliminary or interlocutory order, & the question that really arose was whether or not, although it was a preliminary or an interlocutory order it might not also be regarded as a judgment. While I feel some difficulty in accepting the contention of Mr. P. R. Das that these decisions support his argument, I am also unable to take the view that they can be relied on by the learned Government Pleader as completely decisive.

[52] The constitution, it appears to me, proceeds on the assumption that proceedings are either civil proceedings or criminal proceedings. In England proceedings arising out of references made after under fiscal statutes are governed by a special procedure & are heard by the King's Bench Division on the revenue side. Nevertheless, they are, I believe, regarded as civil proceedings. I am unable to regard the observation of Fazl Ali J. in Pritam Singh v. The State, A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 169: (51 Cr. L. J. 1270) that the S. C. can by virtue of Art. 136, grant :

"special leave in civil cases, in criminal cases, in income-tax cases, in cases which come up before different kinds of tribunals & in a variety of other cases."

as an authority for the proposition that a proceeding on a reference made under the Indian Income-tax Act or under the Bihar Sales Tax Act, 1944, is not a civil proceeding. His Lordship was there merely explaining the scope of the power conferred on the S. C. to grant special leave to appeal. For the reasons already given, the British Parliament & the Govt. of India must have been of opinion that decisions of the H. C. on references made under the Income-tax Act were "civil cases" within the meaning of the expression as used in S. 206, Govt. of India Act, 1935, & it appears to me necessarily to follow that under Art. 133 of the Constitution a proceeding arising out of such a reference is a civil proceeding. Reuben J. has drawn attention to the words "other proceeding" which appear in Art. 132 (1) & to the word "determination" which appears in Art. 136 (1) of the Constitution. These words appear to me to have been inserted pro majore cautela. It is obviously desirable that, when any question as to the interpretation of the Constitution arises, a decision on that question should not have to be postponed because of any doubt arising as to whether the proceeding in which the question arose was neither a civil nor a criminal proceeding. Similarly, it is desirable that there should be no doubt as to power of the S. C. to grant special leave to appeal in any case whatsoever. It has to be remembered that the Constituent Assembly was legislating not for today, nor for tomorrow, but for an indefinite future, & it presumably realised that at some time or other a question might be raised as to whether a proceeding was or was not a civil proceeding. More particularly, it may perhaps have considered that such a doubt might arise regarding proceedings in connection with one of the writs which the H. Cs. are empowered to issue under Art. 226 (1). In England, a doubt appears at one time to have arisen as to whether proceeding in quo warranto were civil proceedings, & S. 15, Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1884, was, in consequence, enacted providing that they should be deemed to be civil proceedings, whether for purposes of appeal or otherwise. I have read & considered with the care which it deserves the judgment which has been prepared by my learned brother Sarjoo Prasad J. The difference between us is a difference as to the method of interpretation to be employed. My learned brother adopts the method of interpretation which has been employed in construing the Letters Patent. The Letters Patent are, however, an instrument containing a delegation of power by His Majesty in Council to the H. Cs. in India, & in construing such an instrument, it is not merely reasonable but essential that a strict interpretation should be put on the expression "final judgment made in exercise of original jurisdiction", which expression, taken as a whole, does not, in any case, readily import more than a decision in an action. The constitution of a great people is not to be interpreted in precisely the same manner as a power of attorney which can be cancelled or modified at will. More particularly is that so when the provision in it which is under examination, confers a right on every citizen. Article 133 confers a right of appeal to the highest tribunal in the land. A right of that kind must, in the nature of thing be as restricted right. The first part of the article imposes one restriction, namely, that the decision from which an appeal is sought to be brought is not a preliminary or an interlocutory order which is what the Federal Ct. held in the two cases already cited & the second part of the article imposes another restriction namely, as to the value of the subject-matter & the difficulty or importance of the point of law which arises. Construed in this broad and liberal manner, the petitioner has now a right of appeal which he did not have previously. When I am invited, as I have been by the learned Government Pleader to isolate as it were, the word "judgment" & to give to it a meaning which in this country is an esoteric meaning, the origin & scope of which I did not myself appreciate until I consulted Seton on Judgments & Orders, I must decline to do so on the ground that the Constitution was not the result of a revolution but the outcome of an orderly progress towards self-government, that the S. C. is the heir of the F. C. & of the Judicial Committee, that in the Acts of the British Parliament constituting each of these great Tribunals & defining their jurisdiction the word "judgment" was used as part of a comprehensive phrase which, in my opinion, admits of no such construction & that that comprehensive phrase has been adopted by the makers of the Indian Constitution. I would myself grant leave to appeal. But as each of my learned brother is of a contrary opinion, the appln. must be disposed of in the manner just stated by Sarjoo Prasad J.

Dayanand Modi — Petnr. v. The State of Bihar and others.

Cr. Misc. Nos. 590, 613, 610, 536, 535 and 537 of 1950, D/-5-1-1951.

✠(a) Public Safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3 (1) (a) (iii)—Interpretation of.

The words "the maintenance of supplies and services essential to the community" occuring in S. 3 (1) (a) (iii), Preventive Detention Act, 1950, are taken from Entry 3, List III of Sch. VII, Constitution of India. On a careful consideration of English Statutes, namely, Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, & 1940, Defence Regulations made thereunder as also the Defence of India Act, 1939 & the Rules made thereunder it is clear that the word "and" between the words "supplies" & "services" is not used in any restrictive sense, but in a comprehensive sense. The manifest intention of Parliament, therefore, in the use of the expression "maintenance of supplies and services essential to the community" in S. 3 (1) (a) (iii), Preventive Detention Act, 1950, is to provide for preventive detention for reasons connected with the maintenance of supplies essential to the community or the maintenance of services essential to the community or both. [Para 8]

Hence any activity which directly interferes with or threatens the maintenance of the supply of such primary necessities of life as food or cloth attracts the operation of S. 3 (1) (a) (iii). The supply of an essential commodity cannot be contemplated as entirely divorced from service; because an essential supply is a service to the community. Thus any apprehended act of blackmarketing or hoarding will directly affect maintenance of supply & service essential to the community. [Paras 9, 10, 11]

(b) Constitution of India, Sch. VII, List II, Entries 26, 27 & List III, Entry 3 — Entries whether mutually exclusive — "For reasons connected with"—Detention under Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3 (1) (a) (iii).

It is wrong to say that because production, supply & distribution of goods or trade & commerce within the State are separate entries in the State List, namely, Entries 26 & 27, List II of Sch. VII, Constitution of India, therefore, the expression used in S. 3 (1) (a) (iii), Preventive Detention Act, 1950, has a narrow or restricted meaning. For, the entries in the Legislative Lists are not to be treated as water-tight compartments. It is worthy of note that Entry 3, List III of Sch. VII, Constitution of India, talks of preventive detention for reasons (inter alia) connected with the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community. The expression "for reasons connected with" is important : it means that the detention is for reasons connected with the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community. Such detention may affect the supply of goods, but that does not mean that the detention is for an object other than what is contemplated by Entry 3 of that List. [Para 12]

(c) Public Safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3 (1) (a), cls. (ii) and (iii) — Clauses whether to be construed on principle of ejusdem generis.

Section 3 (1) (a) (iii) need not be construed on the principle of ejusdem generis as being related to cl. (ii) which precedes cl. (iii) & which relates to the security of the State or the maintenance of public order. The ejusdem generis rule is one to be applied with great caution & not pushed too far. Where the words are clearly wide in their meaning, they ought not to be qualified on the ground of their association with other words. Hence the contention that the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community referred to in cl. (iii) must have some relation to the maintenance of public order or the Security of State mentioned in the proceeding cl. (ii) cannot be accepted as it leads to a narrow construction of cl. (iii). [Para 13]

✠(d) Public Safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3 (1) — More courses than one open to State Government — It may take any effective course.

In starting proceedings against a person where more courses than one are open to the State Govt. to wit, cancellation of the licence issued in his favour under one of the Control Orders, prosecution under the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act, 1946, or detention under the Preventive Detention Act, 1950, it is for the State Govt. to decide which alternative it should adopt or which is most effective in the circumstances of the case. It is not for the Ct. to decide the matter or even to express any opinion as to which alternative should be the most effective. [Para 15]

(e) Public safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3 (1) — Detention and prosecution whether be simultaneously made—Test to be applied.

Whether detention of a person & prosecution started against him can be simultaneously made does not depend on any rule of law: the question has to be approached, & answered in each case, on the footing whether the order of detention, in view of the pending prosecution, is bona fide or not. For answering the question the uncontroverted facts may have to be considered, & the test will be whether the order of detention is for the purpose it purports to be or really for any ulterior or collateral purpose. [Para 15]

(f) Public safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3 (1)—Satisfaction of State Government — Function of Court — Contravention of Constitution of India, Art. 22 (5).

The satisfaction, which S. 3 (1) speaks of, is the satisfaction of the State Govt. It is not open to the Ct. to substitute its own judgment for that of the State Govt. Thus, the sufficiency or adequacy of the facts on which the grounds of an order of detention are based is not a question which can be agitated in the Ct., though if the grounds are vague & indefinite & afford no real opportunity to make a representation, the Ct. may hold that there has been a contravention of the mandatory provisions of Art. 22 (5) of the Constitution. [Para 20]

✠(g) Public safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3 (1) — Bona fide order—Court's power to test — Mala fide order, meaning of — Constitution of India, Art. 22 (5).

The Ct. can examine the grounds in order to see if the order of detention is bona fide or whether the grounds on which the order of detention is founded are based on materials of rationally probative value. If the alleged grounds or the facts on which they are stated to be based do not exist at all, then the order of detention cannot be said to be bona fide order. When it is stated that the order is mala fide, no dishonest motive is necessarily imputed: It merely means that the order is bad for want of necessary care & caution, or is for some purpose other than what is stated in the order of detention. If an order of detention is stated to be based on certain grounds but on uncontroverted facts it appears that those grounds do not really exist, then it follows that the order of detention is made for reasons other than those disclosed in the grounds: in that sense the order will be a mala fide order, & will also contravene Art. 22 (5) of the Constitution. [Para 20]

(h) Public safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3 (1) — Mala fide order — Onus to show lies on detenu — Onus how may be discharged.

The onus of showing that the order is bona fide rests on the detenu; and the onus is a heavy onus which may be very difficult to discharge. One of the ways by which a detenu can show that the order is not bona fide is by stating facts by means of an affidavit, & if those facts are uncontroverted, they may be taken into consideration by the Ct. for the purpose of seeing if the order is bona fide or if the order is based on materials of a rationally probative value, or if the order contravenes the fundamental right guaranteed by Art. 22 (5) of the Constitution. A mere denial by the detenu would not be enough to discharge the onus which rests on him; but the detenu may be in a position to state definite facts which would show that the order of detention was bad either for want of good faith, or on the ground that it was based on materials which did not at all exist in fact. [Para 20]

(i) Public safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3 (1) — Alleged facts or ground non-existing — Detention order fails.

Where the facts alleged by the State Govt. exist but two inferences are possible, it is for the State Govt. to make up its mind as to the inference to be drawn. The Ct. cannot say that a particular inference should have been drawn from the facts. But if the affidavit on behalf of the detenu discloses such specific circumstances as to show that the alleged facts or grounds are non est, then the order has no legs to stand upon. [Para 22]

Advocate (in Nos. 613 & 610); Government Advocate (in No. 537) — for the State.

Das J.— Since the latter part of November 1950, we heard, with occasional breaks, a large number of habeas corpus appls. in which common questions of law & fact arose for our consideration & decision. We reserved judgment in these cases to enable learned counsel, arguing the different applns. to make all their submissions before we pronounced judgment. We are now proceeding to judgment in these cases in batches. The first batch of cases, which will be governed by this judgment, consists of six applns. the numbers of which have been mentioned in the first two pages of this judgment.

[2] All the applns relate to, & are on behalf of, certain persons who have been detained by an order of the State Govt. under S. 3, Preventive Detention Act, 1950 (to be referred to hereinafter as the Detention Act). The State Govt. states, in the orders of detention, that it is satisfied that it is necessary to make the orders, with a view to preventing the detenus from acting in any manner prejudicial to "the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community"; in other words, the orders purport to have been made under S. 3 (1) (a) (iii) of the Detention Act. In the grounds communicated to the detenus, the expression used, in some of the cases, is that "the State Government is satisfied that if the detenu is allowed to remain at large, he will indulge in activities prejudicial to the maintenance of "supplies essential to the community", the expression "and services" having been dropped. I am mentioning this fact at this stage, as one of the main contentions of learned counsel for the petnrs. relates to this matter. It would, I think, be convenient if we first consider in these cases the questions of law that have been raised, & then go into the grounds of detention, in detail, of each detenu. The questions of law are common to all the applns. but the grounds communicated though similar in nature, vary from case to case & would require a separate treatment in each case.

[3] The principal contention of law, which is common to all these applns. & has been very strenuously canvassed at the bar, may be thus put in nutshell; it is contended that the activities on the basis of which the orders of detention have been made (which activities are loosely & commonly called "blackmarketing" or "hoarding" in food or cloth) do not attract the operation of cl. (iii) of sub-sec. 1 (a) of S. 3 of the Detention Act. To understand this contention, it is necessary to give some more details. The relevant portion (omitting unnecessary details) of S. 3 of the Detention Act reads thus:

"The State Government may, if satisfied with respect to any person that with a view to preventing him from acting in any manner prejudicial to the maintenance of supplies and services essential to the community, make an order directing that such person be detained."

Learned counsel for the petnrs. have emphasised the word "and" occurring between the words "supplies" & "services". It is contended that the word "and" has been used in the ordinary conjunctive sense, & mere maintenance of supplies or maintenance of services does not attract the operation of cl. (iii) aforesaid. It is argued that what attracts the operation of that clause is the maintenance of both supplies & services essential to the community; in other words, the "supplies" must go together with the "services."

[4] This argument has been further developed with reference to the three Lists—Union List, State List & Concurrent List—in the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution of India. The Detention Act is an Act made by Parliament & extends to the whole of India. It is a temporary Act in the sense that it shall cease to have effect on 1-4-1951, save as respects things done or omitted to be done before that date, vide S. 1 (3) of the Detention Act. Entry 9 of the Union List is:

"Preventive detention for reasons connected with Defence, Foreign Affairs, or the security of India; persons subjected to such detention."

The concurrent list also deals with preventive detention in Entry 3, which reads thus:

"Preventive detention for reasons connected with the security of a State, the maintenance of public order, or the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community; persons subjected to such detention."

It is to be noted that cl. (iii) of S. 3 (1) (a) of the Detention Act is taken from Entry 3 of the Concurrent List. It should be made clear at the very outset, that the question raised before us is not really one of legislative competency: it is conceded that by reason of Entry 3 above, Parliament had power to legislate for preventive detention for reasons connected with the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community. What is contended before us is that the kind of activities to which a reference has been made in the grounds of detention in these cases, does not attract the operation of cl. (iii). It is pointed out that Entries 26 & 27 of the State List relate to:

"26. Trade and commerce within the State, subject to the provisions of Entry 33 of List III.

27. Production, supply and distribution of goods, subject to the provisions of Entry 33 of List III."

Entry 33 of List III relates to a different matter & need not detain us. What is contended before us is that the activities in respect of which the orders of detention have been made come more properly under Entry 27, or possibly Entry 26, of the State List; & under Art. 246, Constitution of India, the Legislature of the State had exclusive power to make laws with regard to those items: therefore, those activities do not come within the meaning of the expression "maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community" as contemplated in Entry 3 of the Concurrent List. It is contended that that expression embraces such matters as the supply of electric energy, public water works, etc., the maintenance of which comprises both "supplies and services essential to the community."

[5] Learned counsel for the petnrs. took us through the Defence of India Act & the Rules made thereunder, Ordinance XVIII [18] of 1946 & Ordinance XX [20] of 1946. A reference was also made to the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act, 1946. It was pointed out that S. 2 (1), Defence of India Act, used the expression "for maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community." Clause (ix) of sub-s. (2) of S. 2 & Cl. (xx) of the same sub-section also used the same expression. In the Rules made under the Defence of India Act, the expression used was "maintenance of supplies and services essential to the community" in some Rules; in other Rules, "maintenance of essential services or supplies;" in some other Rules, the word "services" was dropped altogether, & the expression used was "maintaining supplies essential to the life of the community" (see in this connection Rr. 65, 77A, 80, 81D & 88, Defence of India Rules). It is contended that by reason of the use of the aforesaid expressions in the Defence of India Act and the Rules made thereunder, the expression "maintenance of supplies and services essential to the community" with the use of the conjunctive 'and' therein, acquired a technical meaning, & Parliament when it enacted the Detention Act, must have had that meaning in mind when it used the expression "maintenance of supplies and services essential to the community." It is contended that the technical meaning of the expression is such as to relate to the supply of electrical energy, water & such other articles as are dealt with by what are known as public utility concerns. It is pointed out that the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act, 1946, & Ordinance XVIII [18] of 1946, on the other hand, purport to legislate for production, supply & distribution of goods, or trade & commerce in certain commodities; in other words, they relate to Entries 26 & 27 of the State List. By Ordinance XX [20] of 1946, R. 81, Defence of India Rules was altered, & the expression used was "maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community in connection with regulating or prohibiting the production, distribution, use or consumption of electric energy, etc.:" therefore, it is contended that the expression "maintenance of supplies and services essential to the community" has a connotation which is different from mere production, supply & distribution of goods, or trade & commerce; & the activities of the detenus in these cases, assuming the activities to be such as are mentioned in the grounds, come more properly under the latter than the former category.

[6] In order to dispose of these arguments & contentions, the details whereof I have stated above, it is necessary to make a brief reference to the "activities" on the basis of which the orders of detention have been made. I shall, latter on, refer to the grounds of detention in detail when I take up the case of each detenu. Here, I shall refer to the grounds in two of the cases by way of illustration only. In the case of Dayanand Modi (Cr. Misc. No. 590 of 1950), which was the first case heard by us & in which the legal contentions mentioned above were elaborated by Sir Sultan Ahmed, the grounds, after referring to the duties of a licensee under the Bihar Cotton Cloth and Yarn (Control) Order 1948 & the artificial scarcity in cloth created by withholding from sale of certain varieties of cloth, stated that on a search of the shop of the detenu an excess of some dhotis & saris & of several thousand yards of a popular variety of cloth was found which, it was stated, was evidently kept for blackmarketing. In Cr. Misc. 613 of 1950, the detenu is one Mohan Lal. The grounds communicated to him show that on a search of his shop, he was found to be in possession of 138 pairs of dhotis & saris in excess of the quantity shown in his accounts. The accounts also disclosed a shortage of 458½ yards of yardage cloth. It was further alleged that he attempted to mislead the checking officer by counting only ten pieces of saris in each bundle when they contained twenty pieces. For the purpose of the argument which we are now considering, it must be assumed that the grounds, or the facts relating thereto, are correct & do exist in fact. In this batch of cases, when we originally heard them, there were some cases which related to similar activities in the matter of foodstuff, such as rice & wheat. By reason of the fact that some of the detenus have already been released by the State Govt., this batch now no longer contains any case relating to food, but the nature of the activities with regard to food is the same as with regard to cloth, & the question of law which we are now deciding will apply equally to both classes of cases.

[7] Now, the question is whether activities of the nature referred to above come within the expression "maintenance of supplies and services essential to the community" occurring in cl. (iii) of S. 3 (1) (a) of the Detention Act. In my opinion, the answer to the question should be in the affirmative, & my reasons are these.

[8] The expression "maintenance of supplies and services essential to the community" which was used in the Defence of India Act & the Rules made thereunder was, in all probability, copied from the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, passed in England during the last war (2 & 3 Geo. VI, C. 62). Section 1 of that Act enabled His Majesty to make Defence Regulations by Orders in Council for, among other things, "maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community". The entire fascicle of Defence Regulations made under that statute were not available to us, but in two of the English decisions which were brought to our notice, some of the Defence Regulations were quoted. In the celebrated case of Liversidge v. Anderson, (1942) A. C. 206: (1941-3 ALL E. R. 338), Regn. 18B was quoted, in para (1A) of which the expression used was "the maintenance of supplies or services essential to the life of the community." It is worthy of note that though the parent statute used the expression "and" the Regulation made thereunder used the expression "or". In Point of Ayr Collieries, Ltd. v. Lloyd George, (1943) 2 ALL E. R. 546, Regn. 55 (4) was quoted: the expression used in this Regulation was "for maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community". It would, thus, appear that in the Regulations made under the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, the word "supplies" and the word "services" were sometimes coupled with the conjunctive "and" & sometimes with the disjunctive "or", though the statute itself used the expression "for maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community". In the subsequent statute, Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1940, which extended the powers under the previous statute, the expression used was "for maintaining supplies or services essential to the life of the community". On a careful comparison of the English Statutes & the Regulations made thereunder as also the Defence of India Act & the Rules made thereunder, it seems to me that the word "and" between the words "supplies" & "services" was not used in any restrictive sense, but in a comprehensive sense; in other words, authority was given to make Regulations or Rules, as the case might be, for maintaining supplies essential to the life of the community, or for maintaining services essential to the life of the community, or for both. That is the reason why in some of the Defence Regulations made under the English statute & in some of the Rules made under the Defence of India Act in India, the expression "and" was used while in some others the expression 'or' was used. The authority was there to make Regulations or Rules for either of the two matters, essential supplies & essential services, & also for both together. I do not think that there was any necessary intendment to restrict the operation of the expression to such matters only as the supply of electrical energy, public water supply, etc., as is contended by learned counsel for the petnrs. I think that exactly same is the meaning of the expression used in the Detention Act of 1950. With regard to the use of the conjunctions "or" & "and", Maxwell has made the following observations (Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes, 9th Edn., p. 244) :

"To carry out the intention of the Legislature, it is occasionally found necessary to read the conjunctions 'or' & 'and' one for the other. The 43 ELIZ. C.3, for instance, in speaking of property to be employed for the maintenance of 'sick and maimed soldiers, referred to soldiers who were either the one 'or' the other, & not only to those who were both."

It is observed in Stroud's Judicial Dictionary (2nd Edn., p. 82), that the word 'and' had generally a cumulative sense; some times, however, it is by force of context read as 'or'. It seems to me that the manifest intention of Parliament in the use of the expression "maintenance of supplies and services essential to the community" in cl. (iii) of S. 3 (1) (a) of the Detention Act was to provide for preventive detention for reasons connected with the maintenance of supplies essential to the community or the maintenance of services essential to the community or both.

[9] The matter may also be looked at from another point of view. A supply of food or cloth which is essential to the community has, indeed, a service aspect as well. If the supply is stopped or interfered with, then the service which that supply ensures is also stopped or interfered with. The word "service" has a wider connotation, & one can think of "services" which do not necessarily depend on a supply of goods or commodities; e.g., the service rendered by workers in essential undertakings. But the supply of an essential commodity cannot be contemplated as entirely divorced from service; because an essential supply is a service to the community.

[10] One can easily imagine a situation in which the supply of food or cloth is more essential to the life of the community than the supply of electric energy. To say, in that situation, that the supply of electric energy is a service to the community, but the supply of food or cloth is not a service to the community will, in my opinion, be absurd. I am definitely of the opinion that any activity which directly interferes with or threatens the maintenance of the supply of such primary necessities of life as food or cloth attracts the operation of cl. (iii) of S. 3 (1) (a) of the Detention Act.

[11] One word of caution is, however, necessary here. The word "maintenance" has to be given its due meaning : it means "act of maintaining," "keeping up," "continuance." In my opinion, any apprehended act of blackmarketing or hoarding will directly affect maintenance (as that word is ordinarily understood) of supply & service essential to the community.

[12] It is, I think, wrong to say that because production, supply & distribution of goods or trade & commerce within the State are separate entries in the State List, therefore, the expression used in cl. (iii) of S. 3 (1) (a) of the Detention Act has a narrow or restricted meaning. It has been said more than once that the entries in the Legislative Lists are not to be treated as water-tight compartments. For judging legislative competence, what is to be seen is the primary object of the legislation or the pith & substance. We are not here concerned with legislative competency. As observed by Patanjali Sastri J., in Machindar Sivaji v. The King, (1949) 11 F. C. R. 827 : (A. I. R. (37) 1950 F. C. 129) there is a distinction between legislation in exercise of the power granted under an entry in the legislative list & action taken by the executive in pursuance of such legislation. When Parliament enacted cl. (iii) of S. 3 (1) (a) of the Detention Act, the primary object was preventive detention of a person who was likely to act in a manner prejudicial to the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community: the apprehended act may incidentally have reference to the production, supply or distribution of goods, but that would not necessarily take it out of the mischief sought to be reached by cl. (iii) of S. 3 (1) (a) of the Detention Act. It is worthy of note that entry 3 of the Concurrent List talks of preventive detention for reasons (inter alia) connected with the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community. The expression "for reasons connected with" is important: it means that the detention is for reasons connected with the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community. Such detention may affect the supply of goods, but that does not mean that the detention is for an object other than what is contemplated by Entry 3 of the Concurrent List.

[13] Mr. Basanta Chandra Ghose, who argued some of these cases raised another contention to which a passing reference may be made at this stage. He contended that cl. (iii) of S. 3 (1) (a) of the Detention Act should be construed on the principle of ejusdem generis as being related to cl. (ii), which precedes cl. (iii) & which relates to the security of the State or the maintenance of public order. His contention is that the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community referred to in cl. (iii) must have some relation to the maintenance of public order or the security of the State. I need only say that I am unable to accept this narrow construction of cl. (iii). The ejusdem generis rule is one to be applied with great caution & not pushed too far. The caution given by Farwell L. J., that "unless you can find a category, there is no room for the application of the ejusdem generis doctrine" can bear repetition, & where the words are clearly wide in their meaning, they ought not to be qualified on the ground of their association with other words (see Craies on Statute Law, Edn. 4, p. 167). In Rex v. Basudeva, A. I. R. (37) 1950 F. C. 67: (51 Cr. L. J. 1011), the question of the relation between blackmarketing in essential commodities & the maintenance of public order was considered by the F. C. It was observed by their Lordships:

"It is true that blackmarketing in essential commodities may at times lead to a disturbance of public order, but so may, for example, the rash driving of an automobile or the sale of adulterated food stuffs. Activities such as these are so remote in the chain of relation to the maintenance of public order that preventive detention on account of them cannot, in our opinion, fall within the purview of Entry 1 of List II."

The Entry to which their Lordships were referring in that case was Entry I of List II of Sch. VII, Government of India Act, 1935, which related, among other things, to "preventive detention for reasons connected with maintenance of public order." There was no such expression as "maintenance of supplies and services essential to the community" in that Entry. It may well be that the scope of Entry 3 of the Concurrent List was advisedly widened by including the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community, as one of the matters in connection with which a law for preventive detention could be made.

[14] For all these reasons, I must overrule the contention that the activities referred in the grounds of detention in these cases do not attract the operation of cl. (iii) of S. 3 (1) (a) of the Detention Act.

[15] The other contention of law which has been raised in some of these cases is this. It is pointed out that S. 3 (1) of the Detention Act says that the State Govt. must be satisfied that it is necessary to make the order with a view to preventing a person from acting in any manner prejudicial to the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community. The argument before us is that three courses were open to the State Govt.: (a) cancellation of the licence; (b) prosecution under the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act, 1946; (c) detention. It is contended that when cancellation of the licence or prosecution of the offender would have more effectively served the purpose, it was not open to the State Govt. to pass an order of detention. Another contention has been that it was not at all open to the State Govt. to detain a person against whom a prosecution for an alleged offence was pending. As to the first argument, the short answer, I think, is that it was for the State Govt. to decide which alternative it should adopt or which was most effective in the circumstances of the case. I do not think that it is for this Ct. to decide the matter, or even to express any opinion as to which alternative should be the most effective. I can do no better than quote the observations of Lord Greene M. R. in Point of Ayr Collieries Ltd. v. Lloyd George, (1943) 2 ALL. E. R. 546:

"If one thing is settled beyond the possibility of dispute, it is that, in construing regulations of this character expressed in this particular form of language, it is for the competent authority, whatever Ministry that may be, to decide as to whether or not a case for the exercise of the powers has arisen."

As to the second argument that it was not open to the State Govt. to detain a person against whom a prosecution was pending, we recently considered this question in Cri. Misc. Nos. 626 & 627 of 1950, D/- 21-12-1950. I do not wish to repeat what I said there, after a careful consideration of the cases cited at the bar. I need merely summarise the conclusions at which we arrived. The answer to the question whether detention & prosecution can be simultaneously made does not depend on any rule of law : the question has to be approached, & answered in each case, on the footing whether the order of detention, in view of the pending prosecution, is bona fide or not. For answering the question the uncontroverted facts may have to be considered, & the test will be whether the order of detention is for the purpose it purports to be or really for any ulterior or collateral purpose. One point of distinction between some of these cases & Cri. Misc. Nos. 626 & 627 of 1950 must be noted here. We found in Cri. Misc. Nos. 626 & 627 of 1950 that the grounds of detention & the grounds on which prosecution was made were not the same. In these cases, however, the prosecution, if any, for an offence under the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act, 1946, arose out of the same facts which ultimately led to the detention. In the course of his arguments the learned Govt. Advocate stated before us that the State Govt. had passed orders for taking necessary steps for the withdrawal of pending prosecutions in cases where such prosecution was pending on the same facts. In view of this statement it is, I think, unnecessary to consider this matter any further, except to state that I am unable to accept the extreme proposition of Mr. Basanta Chandra Ghose to the effect that when an offence is alleged to have been committed, the State Govt. has no authority to detain, but must launch a prosecution & wait for the decision of the Ct. Nor am I impressed by the other argument that the withdrawal of a pending prosecution will, in certain cases, amount to an acquittal & therefore, deprive the State Govt. of any legal authority to make an order, of detention on the same facts. These contentions fail to take note of the basic distinction between preventive detention & punitive detention, & if accepted, will defeat the very object of the Detention Act. Mr. Ghose relied on certain observations of Ram Labhaya J. in Labaram Deka v. The State, (a decision of the Assam High Court) 55 C. W. N. 13 : (A. I. R. (38) 1951 Assam 43) which seem to lend some support to his contention. Thadani C. J., another member of the Bench, made it clear that he was not a party to those observations. With due respect, I am unable to accept those observations as laying down any rule of law. The other decisions cited at the bar on this point we considered in Cri. Misc. Nos. 626 & 627 of 1950.

[16] Having disposed of the contentions of law which are common to these cases, I now proceed to a consideration of the grounds of detention in each case in order to determine (a) if there has been any failure to comply with the mandatory provisions of Art. 22 of the Constitution; (b) if the order of detention is mala fide; or (c) if it is bad for any other reason. For the sake of convenience, I would take each case separately.

[17] Cri. Misc. No. 590 of 1950. (Name of the detenu is Dayanand Modi) — The order of detention in this case was passed on 11-10-1950, & the petnr. was arrested on 13-10-1950. The grounds of detention were communicated to the petnr. on 22-10-1950. In the grounds it was stated that the petnr. Sri Dayanand Modi was the director & one of the proprietors of the firm of Messrs Modi & Sons, which firm held a licence under S. 3, Bihar Cotton Cloth and Yarn (Control) Order, 1948. It was stated that in the capacity of a licensee the firm was appointed as one of the cloth importers in Bihar. In paras. 2 & 3 of the grounds, a reference was made to the method by which importers of cloth in the State of Bihar got their quota of the cloth allotted to them, & also to the conditions of the licence under which a register of daily transactions has to be maintained. In para. 4, reference was made to the scarcity of cloth artificially created by some anti-social cloth dealers who withheld from sale certain varieties of cloth. Then follow paras. 5, 6 & 7 which I had better quote in extenso :

"5. The stock & account of the firm, relating to cloth were accordingly checked on 4-10-1950, & it was discovered that account books had not been written properly from 3-8-1950 to 4-10-1950, in respect of the receipt & sale of cloth from the mill by the Textile Comr. & received by the licensee.

6. According to the stock register they should have the following cloths in their shop on 4-10-1950.

Dhotis & saris	...	14,460 pairs
Yardage	...	3,01.668 yards
Chadars	...	3,722
Fents	...	14 lbs.

But on physical verification the following stocks were found in the shop,

Dhotis & saris	...	16,491 pairs
Yardage	...	3,37,412¼ yards
Chadars	...	1,454
Fents	...	240

Thus an excess of 2031 saris & dhotis & 35,743¼ yards of popular variety cloth was found in the shop which was evidently kept for black-marketing during the Puja & Muharram. The shortage of 2268 chadars had evidently been sold in blackmarket.

7. The following past history of the proprietors of the firm shows that Shri Dayanand Modi habitually indulged in hoarding cloth & selling the same in black market at exorbitant prices. (a) Shri Dayanand Modi was prosecuted under S. 81 (4), Defence of India Rules, read with Ss. 353/188, I. P. C., for snatching the cloth seized on account of forged stamping from the hands of the cloth Inspector. He was, however, acquitted of the charges. (b) In accordance with the instructio contained in telegram No. 75TRX, dated 4-2-1948, the S. D. O. Sadar reserved 20% of the cloth for supply to the low paid Govt. servants. But this firm disposed of the stock in black-market for getting more money than what he would have got by selling to Govt. servants at controlled price. (c) In spite of a decision of Cloth Controller that distribution of popular & non-popular variety of cloth to the retailers from the stock of Messrs. Modi & Sons will be made by the D. C. Ranchi, Shri Dayanand Modi disposed of 18,000 yards of popular variety of cloth on 25-7-1950 to retailers of his own choice. (d) On 3-8-1950, the retailers linked to this importer, staged a demonstration of dissatisfaction with black flags & bundle of non-saleable cloth kept in rickshaw protesting against the firm as they had sold popular varieties of cloth in blackmarket & supplied them only non-popular varieties which had no market. (e) A truck load of cloth sent by Shri Dayanand Modi outside Ranchi towards the Daltonganj was detected near Kuru barrier by the Inspector of anti-smuggling force."

In the concluding portion of the grounds, it was stated that the State Govt. was satisfied that if the petnr. was allowed to remain at large, he would indulge in activities prejudicial to the maintenance of supplies essential to the community.

[18] It has been contended before us that the order of detention in this case is mala fide & bad, because (a) the alleged grounds have no existence in fact, & (b) there is no firm of the name of Messrs Modi & Sons, & the petnr. is not one of the proprietors of any such firm. It is stated that there is a limited liability company of the name of Modi & Sons Limited; but the petnr. was neither the managing director, nor the manager of the said company.

[19] To appreciate contention (a) above, it is necessary to refer to the affidavit made by one Sitaram Lohia, a relative of the detenu, in support of the petn. In this affidavit, it was stated that on 3-8-1950, the District Supply Officer of Ranchi removed the stock register, vouchers & other papers. These papers were demanded back several times, but were not returned: therefore, it was stated that the allegation in para. 5 of the grounds had no existence in fact, because in the absence of the stock register & other books of account which had been removed on 3-8-1950, it was physically impossible to write up the books which were not in the possession of the company. As to the allegations in para. 6 of the grounds, they were denied; moreover, it was stated that as the stock register had been taken away on 3-8-1950, & no entries could be made therein between 3-8-1950 & 4-10-1950, on which date the physical verification was made, there would inevitably be a discrepancy between what was shown in the stock register & what was found on physical verification. As to the allegations in para. 7 of the grounds, it was stated that ground (a) of para. 7 showed that the order was mala fide, because even after the acquittal of the petnr. on merits, the State Govt. were alleging a prosecution which had failed as one of the grounds for detention. As to ground (b) of para. 7, it was alleged that the order of the Sub-Divisional officer dated 4-2-1948, was not addressed to Modi & Sons. It was further stated that the direction of the Sub-Divisional Officer to supply cloth to Govt. servants was fully complied with, & cloth was supplied to all Govt. servants mentioned in a chart kept by the District Supply Inspector. As to ground (c) of para. 7, it was stated that the decision referred to therein was never communicated to Messrs Modi & Sons. As to ground (d) of para. 7, it was stated that Messrs Modi & Sons supplied cloth to such retailers as were duly approved of by the District Supply Officer. As to ground (e) of para. 7, it was stated that it related to cloth freely released (as distinguished from quota cloth) & was sold to licensed dealers of Daltonganj—which was permissible under the law.

[19a] The aforesaid statements made in the affidavit of Sita Ram Lohia were not controverted by the State of Bihar. The learned Advocate-General, who appeared for the State of Bihar in some of these cases, took up the following position. He contended that it was not open to this Ct. to go behind the grounds communicated by the State Govt. or to enquire into the correctness or otherwise of the facts stated therein : according to him, this Ct. must accept the grounds or facts as stated by the State Govt. & the only point to be considered by this Ct. is whether the grounds are relevant to the object of detention. He further submitted that the correctness or otherwise of the grounds would be a matter for the Advisory Board constituted under S. 8 of the Detention Act : therefore, no affidavit in reply need be filed by the State Govt. The learned Advocate General made it clear to us that, in his view, a question of principle was involved, & he invited a decision on that question. He said that he took whatever risk there was in not filing an affidavit in reply.

[20] It is important to remember here why the grounds have to be communicated to the detenu. Under Art. 22 (5) of the Constitution, the authority making the detention order shall, as soon as may be, communicate the grounds on which the order has been made & shall afford the detenu the earliest opportunity of making a representation against the order. I think that it is quite clear that the grounds have to be communicated so as to afford the detenu an opportunity of making a representation against the order. Clause (6) of Art. 22 of the Constitution says that nothing in cl. (5) shall require the authority making the detention order to disclose facts which such authority considers to be against the public interest to disclose. It is clear that a distinction is drawn between 'grounds' & 'facts.' There is, in the reported decisions, a discussion of the meaning of the aforesaid two expressions. In Safatulla Khan v. Chief Secretary of West Bengal, 55 C. W. N. 27 : (A.I.R. (38) 1951 Cal. 194 : 51 Cr. L. J. 1569), it has been stated that the grounds are the bases of the allegations, & the facts are the evidence on which the bases of the allegations are to be established. Without going into an exact definition of the aforesaid two expressions 'grounds' & 'facts,' one can say, without fear of much contradiction, that the 'grounds,' are based on & arise out of 'facts.' In this case, we are concerned only with such facts as have been disclosed & on which the grounds are based. It is, I think, now well-settled law that the satisfaction, which S. 3 (1) of the Detention Act speaks of, is the satisfaction of the State Govt., & it is not open to this Ct. to substitute its own judgment for that of the State Govt. In other words, the sufficiency or adequacy of the facts on which the grounds of an order of detention are based is not a question which can be agitated in this Ct., though if the grounds are vague & indefinite & afford no real opportunity to make a representation, the Ct. may hold that there has been a contravention of the mandatory provisions of Art. 22 (5) of the Constitution. The matter was put very succinctly in Point of Ayr Collieries, Ltd. v. Lloyd George, (1943) 2 All. E. R. 546 :

"It is for the competent authority to judge of the adequacy of the evidence before it. It is for the competent authority to judge of the credibility of that evidence. It is for the competent authority to judge whether or not it is desirable or necessary to make further investigations before taking action. It is for the competent authority to decide whether the situation requires an immediate step, or whether some delay may be allowed for further investigation & perhaps negotiation . . . . . one thing is certain, & that is that those matters are not within the competence of this Ct. It is the competent authority that is selected by Parliament to come to the decision, &, if that decision is come to in good faith, this Ct. has no power to interfere, provided, of course, that the action is one which is within the four corners of the authority delegated to the Minister."

The same point of view was expressed in Machindar Shivaji v. The King, A. I. R. (37) 1950 F. C. 129 : (51 Cr. L. J. 1480), which dealt with the C. P. and Berar Public Safety Act. Referring to section 2 (1) (a) of that Act, his Lordship Patanjali Sastri J. observed :

"In the present case, S. 2 (1) (a), like most other similar enactments, authorises the detention of any person if the Provincial Govt. is 'satisfied' that he is acting or is likely to act in a manner prejudicial to public safety, order or tranquillity. The language clearly shows that the responsibility for making a detention order rests on the provincial executive, as they alone are entrusted with the duty of maintaining public peace, & it would be a serious derogation from that responsibility if the Ct. were to substitute its judgment for the satisfaction of the executive authority &, to that end, undertake an investigation of the sufficiency of the materials on which such satisfaction was grounded."

His Lordship went on, however, to point out :

"The Ct. can, however, examine the grounds disclosed by the Govt. to see if they are relevant to the object which the legislation has in view, namely, the prevention of acts prejudicial to public safety & tranquillity, for 'satisfaction' in this connection must be grounded on material which is of rationally probative value."

His Lordship then considered the affidavit of the Chief Secretary filed on behalf of the Provincial Govt. & found that the test laid down by him was fulfilled. Therefore, it is not quite correct to say that this Ct. cannot examine the grounds at all. It is true that this Ct. cannot examine the grounds for the purpose of substituting its own judgment for that of the State Govt., but surely this Ct. can examine the grounds in order to see if the order of detention is bona fide or whether the grounds on which the order of detention is founded are based on materials of rationally probative value. If the facts (disclosed in the grounds) to which the grounds relate, or on which the grounds are based, do not at all exist, how then can one say that non-existent facts or non-existent materials have a rationally probative value ? If the alleged grounds or the facts on which they are stated to be based, do not exist at all, then the order of detention cannot be said to be a bona fide order. It must be remembered that when it is stated that the order is mala fide, no dishonest motive is necessarily imputed: it merely means that the order is bad for want of necessary care & caution, or is for some purpose other than what is stated in the order of detention. If an order of detention is stated to be based on certain grounds but on uncontroverted facts it appears that those grounds do not really exist, then it follows that the order of detention is made for reasons other than those disclosed in the grounds : in that sense the order will be a mala fide order, & will also contravene Art. 22 (5) of the Constitution. I must make it clear, however, that the onus of showing that the order is mala fide rests on the detenu; & the onus is a heavy onus which may be very difficult to discharge. One of the ways by which a detenu can show that the order is not bona fide is by stating facts by means of an affidavit, & if these facts are uncontroverted, they may be taken into consideration by this Ct. for the purpose of seeing if the order is bona fide, or if the order is based on materials of a rationally probative value, or if the order contravenes the fundamental right guaranteed by Art. 22 (5) of the Constitution. I remember many cases in which an affidavit in reply was made by the State Govt., particularly in cases where the facts alleged by the detenu, if uncontroverted, were likely to lead to the inference that the order was not bona fide. A mere denial by the detenu would not be enough to discharge the onus which rests on him; but the detenu may be in a position to state definite facts which would show that the order of detention was bad either for want of good faith, or on the ground that it was based on materials which did not at all exist in fact. I respectfully agree with the observations of Meredith J. (as he then was) in connection with a similar question of principle raised by the Advocate-General in Basanta Chandra v. Emperor, 23 Pat. 968 at p. 991 : (A. I. R. (32) 1945 Pat. 44 F. B.). The observations were :

"I will not go so far as to hold that in no case could an affidavit be necessary. There might be cases where the affidavits of the petnrs. disclosed specific circumstances casting a real doubt on the bona fides of the orders."

I am, therefore, of the opinion that the extreme position taken up by the learned Advocate-General with regard to the filing of an affidavit in reply by the State Govt. has no support in law or reason.

[21] The grounds communicated to the detenu of this case show that the main ground on which the order of detention was based was the failure to enter the stock book between the dates, 3-8-1950 & 4-10-1950. On the uncontroverted affidavit of Sita Ram Lohia, it appears that the stock book was taken away by the District Supply Officer of Ranchi: therefore, the failure to enter the stock book had no rationally probative value, nor any relevance to the object of detention. In my opinion, the same infirmity affects grounds 6 & 7, in view of the circumstances disclosed by the affidavit of Sita Ram Lohia.

[22] One other point must be made clear here. Affidavits have been filed on behalf of the detenus in almost all the cases. Some affidavits contain mere denials; some attempt to give an explanation of the facts found against the detenus, which explanation may or may not be true. Such affidavits do not, in our opinion, discharge or shift the onus. If the alleged facts exist but two inferences are possible, it is for the State Govt. to make up its mind as to the inference to be drawn. This Ct. cannot say that a particular inference should have been drawn from the facts. But if the affidavit on behalf of the detenu discloses such specific circumstances as to show that the alleged facts or grounds are non est, then the order has no legs to stand upon.

[23] For these reasons, I would hold that the order of detention in this case is bad. It is unnecessary to consider the other contention that the petnr. is not the proprietor, nor the managing director of Messrs. Modi & Sons. I would accordingly allow the petn. & direct that the petnr. be released forthwith.

[24] (His Lordship then considered the petns. in Cr. Misc. 613 of 1950 (detenu Mohan Lal), Cr. Misc. 610 of 1950 (detenu Shree Nivas Murerka), Cr. Misc. 536 of 1950 (detenu Mahabir Prasad), Cr. Misc. 535 of 1950 (detenu Kedar Nath Poddar) & Cr. Misc. 537 of 1950 (detenu Govind Ram) & concluded :) The result, therefore, is that we would allow only one of the petns., namely that of Dayanand Modi (Cr. Misc. 590 of 1950), & reject the applns. on behalf of the other detenus. We direct that Dayanand Modi be released forthwith.

[25] Narayan J. — I agree.

L. P. A. Nos. 2, 3 & 4 of 1949, D/- 9-1-1951, from decision of Shearer J., D/- 4-5-1949.

(a) Tenancy Laws—Bihar Tenancy Act (VIII [8] of 1885), S. 112—Reduction of rent—No notice to parties concerned—Validity of reduction.

An examination of the different provisions of Part II of Chap. X, Bihar Tenancy Act, shows that in settling fair & equitable rent or in reducing the rent of any holding it is obligatory on the revenue officers to give special notice to the parties concerned in the manner provided for in the rules made by the Govt. in this behalf. Hence, an order of the revenue officer reducing the rent under S. 112, in the absence of the parties concerned & without any notice to them, must be held to be ultra vires & without jurisdiction. [Paras 9, 10]

(b) Tenancy Laws—Bihar Tenancy Act (VIII [8] of 1885), S. 112—Revenue Officer—Jurisdiction of, how to be exercised.

The revenue officers are invested with powers under a special statute & exercise delegated authority. They must, therefore, act within the ambit assigned to them under the statute & exercise jurisdiction only in the manner provided for in Part II of Chap. X of the Act & the rules made by the Provincial Govt. under S. 189 of the Act. They have accordingly no jurisdiction over persons who are not in the category of parties before them nor over persons who being entitled to special notice as "parties interested" in the proceedings have not been served with such notice. [Para 10]

(c) Tenancy Laws—Bihar Tenancy Act (VIII [8] of 1885), S. 112 & R. 73—Rule for special notice is mandatory.

Rule 73 framed by State Govt. under the Bihar Tenancy Act, prescribing in its proviso a rule for special notice, is mandatory. The underlying object of the rule is that before the rent of the holding is proposed to be altered to the prejudice of any party it should not be done until that party had notice of the rent settlement proceedings. [Para 10]

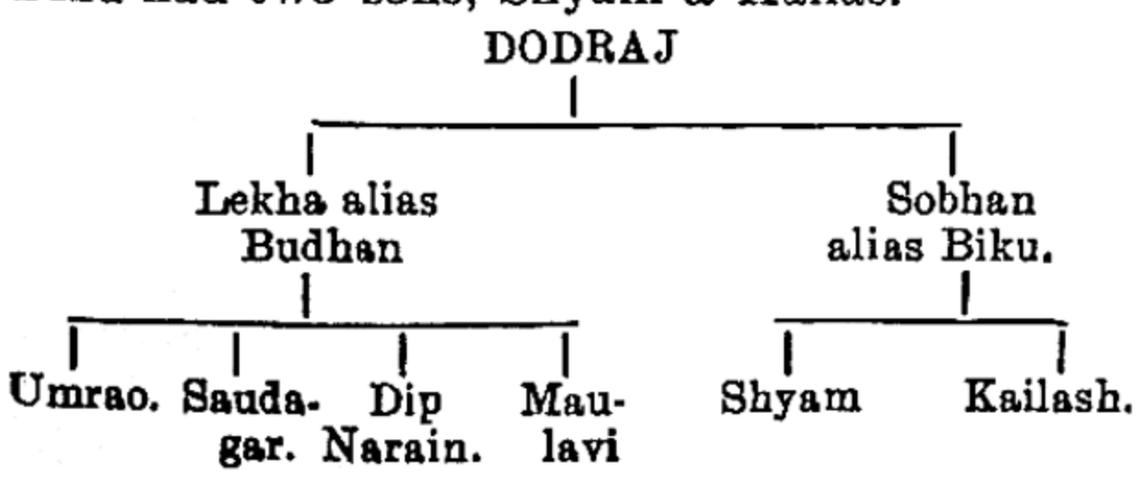
(d) Tenancy Laws—Bihar Tenancy Act (8 [VIII] of 1885), S. 112 & R. 73—Special notice — Burden of proof.

Where in a suit brought by the pltfs. for a declaration that the order of the revenue officer reducing the rent of holdings in dispute is void & without jurisdiction, the tenants-defts. admit that the pltfs are cosharer landlords having separate collection & separate realisation, thus admitting that the pltfs. are persons immediately under whom they hold, & plead the bar of service of special notice under R. 73, then the onus lies on the defts. to prove service of special notice. [Para 10]

Lal Narain Sinha & Indrabhanu Singh — for Applts.; Raj Kishore Prasad & K. D. De for S. C. Chakraverty — for Resps.

Lakshmikanta Jha C. J. — These three appeals by the pltfs. are under Cl. 10, Letters Patent, from a decision of a Single Judge of this Ct. modifying a decision of the Subordinate Judge who upheld the findings of the trial Ct. & affirmed the decree made in favour of the pltfs.

[2] The following pedigree shows that one Dodraj had two sons, Lekha alias Budhan, & Sobhan alias Biku; Lekha had four sons, Umrao, Saudagar, Dip Narain & Maulavi, & Biku had two sons, Shyam & Kailas:



Pltfs. 1 to 3 are sons of Saudagar & Dip Narain & Maulavi are pltfs. 4 & 5 respectively. Other members of the family are pro forma defts. in these suits.

[3] It appears from the record of rights that the land in respect of which these three suits have been instituted constituted eleven batai holdings of the tenants defts. under the pltfs. & the pro forma defts. In December 1922, an arrangement was come to between the landlords & the different tenants whereby the batai holdings were converted into naqdi holdings, & later on the three groups of defts. executed three kabuliats under which the eleven holdings were amalgamated into three new holdings for which they agreed to pay money rent. On the basis of these three kabuliats three rent suits were instituted against the three groups of tenants. In these suits the defts.' plea was that the original—eleven holdings still existed & that there had been no amalgamation. The litigation came up to the H. C. in second appeals & a compromise was entered into under which, on the defts. making certain payments to the landlords by 29-9-1928, the landlords were in their turn to treat the original batai holdings which existed before December, 1922, as still existing. There is no evidence to show that any payment was made by the tenants under the terms of the compromise. In 1938, however, the defts. made eleven applns. under S. 112, Bihar Tenancy Act, for the reduction of their rents on the basis that there were eleven (& not three) naqdi holdings. In these applns. only Biku & Umrao were made parties & the pltfs. were not impleaded. A reduction of four annas in the rupee was allowed by the revenue officer. Subsequently, he revised his own order under S. 104E (2) and allowed a reduction of six annas in the rupee, that is, 37½ per cent. reduction in the rents of all the holdings, without giving any notice to the pltfs.

[4] The pltfs. have instituted these suits for a declaration that the order of the revenue officer reducing the rent of the holdings in dispute is void & without jurisdiction. They have also claimed arrears of rent for the year 1347 to 1350 Fasli in respect of each of the three holdings at the original jama. Their case, in short, is that there are only three holdings (and not eleven), that they are cosharer landlords having separate collections & that they realise rents separately according to their shares. The defts. admitted by their written statements the pltfs.' case of separate collection & separate realisation of rents from them; but their case was that the suits were in respect of more than one holding & therefore, bad for multifariousness. They further alleged that the jama of each of the holdings had been reduced under S. 112, Bihar Tenancy Act, & the same was binding upon the pltfs.

[5] The learned Munsif held that payment was not made in accordance with the compromise & there were only three naqdi holdings, & this finding was not challenged in appeal. He also held that the order of the revenue officer is without jurisdiction & not binding on the pltfs. & has summed up his finding thus:

"In any case, the order of reduction has to be held without jurisdiction for two reasons. In the first instance, the holdings were misdescribed in the applications for reduction. Secondly, none of the pltfs. were impleaded as parties in the reduction proceedings. As such, no notice could have been issued upon them. The defts. have not shown that in spite of the pltfs. not being parties notices have been served upon them."

On appeal by the defts. the finding of the learned Munsif that the pltfs. were not parties to the proceedings under S. 112 was not challenged but it was contended, for the first time, that the present pltfs. were effectively represented by Biku & Umrao. This contention of the defts. was not accepted by the learned Subordinate Judge. In repelling the defts.' contention he held that "there is no evidence on the record to justify this assertion & I have no doubt whatever that in the absence of the three sons of Budhan the Rent Reduction Officer had no jurisdiction to entertain the applns. & reduce the rent."

He also found that the applns. for reduction of rent were not with respect to the holdings of the defts. In this view of the matter also he held that the revenue officer had no jurisdiction & his order reducing rent of "non-existent holdings" must be held to be ultra vires.

[6] When the matter came up in second appeal here, Shearer J. modified the decrees & held that "the defts. are, however, in possession of the land set out in their applns. & the mere circumstance that an incorrect description was given of the holdings in which it was comprised could not affect the jurisdiction of the Settlement Officer to reduce the rent."

The other ground on which he modified the decision of the Cts. below was that, special notices having been served upon Umrao & Biku, the pltfs. as cosharer landlords must also be bound. He has held that

"the onus was on the pltfs. not merely to show by producing the record of the Settlement Officer that a notice was not issued on them, but also to show that they were entitled to notice, & that this onus was discharged."

In the result, he allowed the appeals & gave the pltfs. decrees for rent & interest at the reduced rate of rent.

[7] The points for our consideration are: (1) whether the order of the Settlement Officer reducing the rent under S. 112, Bihar Tenancy Act, without special notice to the pltfs. is a nullity & (2) whether the Settlement Officer had jurisdiction to reduce the rent in view of the fact that there were eleven applns., in respect of three occupancy holdings. On the view that I take with respect to the first point, it is not necessary to decide the second question.

[8] On an anxious consideration of the points raised, I do not agree with the view taken by the learned Judge of this Ct. that, although the pltfs. were not parties to the applns. made by the defts. under S. 112, Bihar Tenancy Act, the order of the Settlement Officer is binding on them.

[9] By Notfn. No. 2814-IIT-34-R, dated 19-6-1937, as amended by Notfn. No. 3536-S-53-R, dated 14-8-1937, the Govt. of Bihar being satisfied that in the interest of the local welfare it was necessary to exercise the powers conferred on it by S. 112, Bihar Tenancy Act, invested certain revenue officers in the district of Patna with power (a) to settle rents, & (b) when settling rents, to reduce rents if, in their opinion, the maintenance of the existing rents would on any ground be unfair or inequitable in the following class of cases, namely, cases of money rents of occupancy raiyats then payable or being paid which became payable or commenced to be paid on or after 1-1-1915, & on or before 31-12-1933. Thus the revenue officers were invested with powers to settle or to reduce rents in cases of money rents of occupancy raiyats only. In settling the rents the revenue officers had to follow under S. 112 (2a) the procedure provided by Ss. 104 to 104J (both inclusive). Section 104D provides that in framing a table of rates under S. 104B, & in settling rents under S. 104C, the revenue officers shall be guided by such rules as the Provincial Govt. may make in this behalf. Section 104E lays down the procedure for preliminary publication & amendment of settlement rent-roll. The revenue officer at this stage may of his own motion or on the appln. of any party aggrieved, at any time before a settlement rent-roll is submitted to the confirming authority under S. 104F, revise any rent entered therein; but the proviso lays down that no such entry shall be revised until reasonable notice has been given to the "parties concerned" to appear & be heard in the matter. Section 104F (2) gives power to the confirming authority to sanction the settlement rent-roll with or without amendment; but the proviso thereto lays down that no entry shall be amended, or omission supplied, until reasonable notice has been given to the "parties concerned" to appear & be heard in the matter. Thus an examination of the different provisions of Part II of Chap. X, Bihar Tenancy Act, shows that in settling fair & equitable rent or in reducing the rent of any holding it is obligatory on the revenue officers to give special notice to the parties concerned in the manner provided for in the rules made by the Govt. in this behalf. The Provincial Govt. under S. 189, Bihar Tenancy Act, has power, by notification in the Bihar Gazette, to make rules for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Act. In exercise of such powers certain rules have been framed by the Provincial Govt. for service of notice, & it may be observed, that they have the force of law: see Secy. of State v. Nitya Singh, 21 Cal. 38 at pp. 49-50 (F. B.). Rule 65 provides for general notification in the case of settlement of fair rents under Part II of Chap. X, Bihar Tenancy Act. This will notify the date on which & the place at which the fair rents will be settled. Rule 73 prescribes the procedure to be followed by the Revenue Officer on the fixed date & by a proviso lays down that:

"when a revenue officer proposes to alter an existing rent, & the parties have not attended in compliance with the general notice prescribed in R. 65 above, the revenue officer shall serve each person interested with a special notice, & the fair rent shall not be settled in the absence of such person until after due service of such special notice has been proved."

Under S. 78, Rr. 65 to 77 (both inclusive) are made applicable to a settlement of rents under S. 112, Bihar Tenancy Act.

[10] The pltfs. as already stated, set up a case of separate collection & separate realisation of rent from the defts. The defts. did not controvert this case of the pltfs., on the other hand, in each suit they admitted by their written statements that "the realisation & collection in respect of 2 annas kham share in the possession of pltfs. 1 to 3 & in respect of 2 annas kham share in the possession of pltfs. 4 & in respect of 2 annas kham share in the possession of pltf. 5 are separate (from each group)."

Thus, in view of the clear admission by the defts. the pltfs were not required to prove separate collection & separate realisation of rents from the defts. On the findings of the Cts. below the pltfs. were neither parties to the rent reduction proceedings, nor were they represented by Biku or Umrao, who alone were in the category of parties as landlords in the petitions filed by the defts. under S. 112 of the Act. The revenue officers are invested with powers under a special statute & exercise delegated authority. They must, therefore, act within the ambit assigned to them under the statute & exercise jurisdiction only in the manner provided for in Part II of Chap. X of the Act & the rules made by the Provincial Govt. under S. 189 of the Act. They have accordingly no jurisdiction over persons who are not in the category of parties before them, nor over persons who being entitled to special notice as "parties interested" in the proceedings have not been served with such notice. Therefore, any rent settled by the revenue officer without notice to the pltfs. who are "parties concerned" & interested in objecting, cannot bind them, & the order made by the revenue officer may be ignored by them & treated as a nullity. It was observed by Willes, J., in Cooper v. Wandsworth Board of Works, (1863) 143 E. R. 414 at p. 418 : (14 C. B. N. S. 180.) that

"a tribunal which is by law invested with power to affect the property of one of Her Majesty's subjects, is bound to give such subject an opportunity of being heard before it proceeds; & that rule is of universal application and founded upon the plainest principles of justice."

The rule for special notice is mandatory & this rule, it must be observed, is founded on the principles of justice. In this respect there is, in my opinion, no difference between S. 112 & 112A of the Act. The underlying object of the rules in each case is, as observed by Mukharji J., in a case arising under S. 112A of the Act Basdeonarain v. Karumahton, 26 Pat. 592 at p. 597 : (A. I. R. (35) 1948 Pat. 153), that

"before the rent of a holding is proposed to be altered to the prejudice of any party it should not be done until that party had notice of the rent settlement proceedings."

Mookerjee, J., in Gora Chand v. Rakhal Chandra, 37 C. L. J. 473 : (A. I. R. (10) 1923 Cal. 364 held that an order made under S. 40 commuting rent without service of notice is ultra vires even though there is no express rule for notice on persons interested. The order of the revenue officer reducing the rent under S. 112, in the absence of the pltfs. & without any notice to them, must, therefore, be held to be ultra vires & without jurisdiction, & the civil Ct. can ignore it. The onus, in my opinion, was on the defts. to prove service of special notice on the pltfs. The defts. as already stated, have admitted that the pltfs. are cosharer landlords having separate collection & separate realisation. They have, therefore, admitted that the pltfs. are persons immediately under whom they hold. The pltfs. were, in my opinion, as such landlords, entitled to special notice, even if it be assumed that they do not stand recorded in register D as proprietors. The defts. have pleaded the bar of service of special notice & asserted the affirmative. The pltfs. can, therefore, be defeated only if the defts., prove that special notice was served on them even though they were not party to the proceedings. In the absence of proof of the bar the pltfs. must succeed.

[11] In the result, I would allow the appeals & restore the decrees of the Cts. below. The pltfs. will get their costs throughout.

[12] Reuben J. — I agree. In Jagdishwar Dayal v. Dwarka Singh, 12 Pat. 626 : (A. I. R. (20) 1933 P. C. 122), Lord Thankerton observed relative to the power of the Revenue Cts. under the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act to sell tenures in execution of decrees for arrears of the rent thereof :

"Under Chap. XVI of the Act a statutory jurisdiction is conferred on the Revenue Cts. but that jurisdiction must be exercised within the statutory powers conferred. If then, as already stated, it is not competent to order a sale of the tenure under S. 208 unless the whole interests in the tenure are represented before the Ct. it is clear that the order for sale of the tenure in the present case was ultra vires of the Revenve Ct. & it follows that the sale was not 'made under this chapter' & was outside the jurisdiction of that Ct."

The principle is that a statutory power affecting rights of property must be exercised strictly in accordance with the provisions of the statute. Here, the requirements of the Bihar

Tenancy Act & the statutory rules thereunder relating to special notices have not been observed. This is evident from a perusal of the order-sheet of the proceedings under S. 112, Bihar Tenancy Act. The general notice under R. 65 was issued on 26-10-1937. On that date the rents were settled under R. 73. It is not suggested that the pltfs. attended on that day in answer to the general notice & as rents were settled on that very day it is not likely that the special notice required by the proviso was issued to them. Then 4-6-1938 was fixed for re-examination under S. 104E (2) of the equity of the rents entered in the rent roll. On that date there was no attendance on behalf of the landlords; nevertheless, orders were passed forthwith making a further reduction of the rents. As the pltfs were not impleaded the notices for 4-6-1938 could not have been directed to them, & the order-sheet shows that no other notices were issued before the rents were further reduced.

[13] The question of representation is a question partly of fact & partly of law. It was not raised in the Ct. of first instance. Hence the defts. cannot be allowed to raise it in appeal. Even if it is permitted to be raised, the plea must fail for the reasons given by my Lord the Chief Justice.

Cri. Appeals Nos. 115, 156 and 584 of 1949, D/- 21-12-1950.

(a) Penal Code (1860), S. 121 — "Waging war" — Meaning—Words and phrases.

"The expression "waging war" in S. 121 can only mean "waging war in the manner usual in war." In other words, in order to support a conviction on such a charge, it is not enough to show that the persons charged have contrived to obtain possession of an armoury & have, when called upon to surrender, it used the rifles & ammunition so obtained against the King's troops. It must also be shown that the seizure of the armoury was part & parcel of a planned operation & that their intention in resisting the troops of the King was to overwhelm & defeat these troops & then to go on & crush any further opposition with which they might meet until either the leaders of the movement succeeded in obtaining possession of the machinery of Government or until those in possession of it yielded to the demands of their leaders. [Para 11]

Anno. Penal Code, S. 121, N 1.

(b) Penal Code (1860), S. 121A —Scope—"Conspires to overawe"—Meaning—Words & Phrases.

The words "conspires to overawe by means of criminal force or the show of criminal force the Central Govt. or any Provincial Govt." clearly embrace not merely a conspiracy to raise a general insurrection, but also a conspiracy to overawe the Central Govt. or any Provincial Govt. by the organisation of a serious riot or a large & tumultuous unlawful assembly. [Para 14]

As the section stands, in certain circumstances persons who organise a strike among police men or certain other public or Municipal employees might render themselves liable to prosecution under it. Clearly, however, persons do not commit this crime unless it was part & parcel of their plans to overawe the Central or the Provincial Govt. by criminal force or show of criminal force. [Para 15]

The word "overawe" clearly imports more than the creation of apprehension or alarm or even perhaps fear. It appears to connote the creation of a situation in which the members of the Central or the Provincial Govt. feel themselves compelled to choose between yielding to force or exposing themselves or members of the public to a very serious danger. It is not necessary that the danger should be a danger of assassination or of bodily injury to themselves. The danger might well be a danger to public property or to the safety of members of the general public. [Para 16]

Where a large number of police havildars & constables conspired to withhold their services with the object of compelling the Prov. Govt. to yield to their demands & the conspirators seized the armouries & took possession of the arms & ammunition but remained peacefully in the police lines & did nothing to intimidate the general body of citizens, but took steps to ensure that the working of the treasury should not be interrupted. Held that it could not fairly be said that there was any such show of criminal force as was contemplated by S. 121A. [Para 22]

Anno. Pen. Code, S. 121A, N. 1.

(c) Penal Code (1860), S. 121A — Conspiracy — Proof.

It is not usual for a prosecution for conspiracy to be instituted unless the public prosecutor is in a position to put into the witness box one or more persons who have, at one time or another, been parties to the conspiracy & also to produce documentary evidence in the shape of letters or communications which have passed between some of the conspirators showing what exactly they intended to do & how they intended to do it. [Para 19]

Anno. Pen. Code, S. 121A, N. 2.

(d) Penal Code (1860), S. 120B — Accused in pursuance of conspiracy, inciting police constables to desert their posts & withhold their services & rise in mutiny—Charge of conspiracy to commit offence under S. 3, Police (Incitement to Disaffection) Act, 1922 — Accused held guilty & could be sentenced to 6 months R. I. [Para 25]

Awadheshnandan Sahai & Lal Kishore — for Applts; The standing Counsel and Pandey Narsingh Sahai —for the State.

Shearer J. — The applts. in two of these three appeals are, or were, constables, belonging to the armed police in the districts of Patna, Gaya & Monghyr. Ramanand Tewari, the applt, in the third appeal, was at one time a constable, but was dismissed in 1942. The applts. were prosecuted in consequence of the part taken by them in what has been described as a rebellion, but what may, I think, more accurately be described as a mutiny among certain sections of the police force stationed in five districts of the province, which occurred in the spring of 1947. Although Ramanand Tewari had ceased to be a member of the police force five years previously, he was the President of an assocn. formed by constables & havildars. This assocn. or police union, as it was called, had not then been recognised by the Provincial Govt. the reason, apparently, being that the Provincial Govt. was of opinion that no one should be permitted to be an office-bearer of such an assocn. unless he were a serving member of the police force. On 20-3-1947, a havildar, Kamta Singh, was called to give evidence in the Ct. of Mr. Bishwambhar Chaudhuri, the Sub-divisional Mag. of Gaya. In consequence of some incident which occurred, Mr. Chaudhuri prosecuted this havildar for contempt of Ct. & sentenced him to pay a fine of Rs. 100. Kamta Singh was unable to pay this fine immediately, & instead of giving him time to pay it, Mr. Chaudhuri committed him to jail. The constable or constables on duty in his Ct. declined to remove the havildar, & thereupon Mr. Chaudhuri came down from the dais & himself removed the havildar to the hajat. Not unnaturally, perhaps, this incident aroused a great deal of indignation among the havildars & constables at Gaya. At one of the meetings, which took place in consequence of it, they decided to go on strike from 23-3-1947, & a telegram communicating this decision was sent by or on behalf of the police Union to the Superintendent of Police.

[2] This telegram was despatched at about midday on 21-3-1947. On the day following, Ramanand Tewari arrived in Gaya & held consultations with the leaders of the havildars & constables & also with certain prominent congress men in the town. At a meeting, which was held at 8 p. m. on 23-3-1947, the decision to go on strike was affirmed & at the roll call, which took place at 9 p. m. that night, none of the constables in the police lines attended. At this time the communal situation in the town of Gaya & elsewhere in the province was tense, & largely in consequence of this, a number of constables belonging to the armed police were stationed at various points in the town. These constables abandoned their posts & returned to the lines, taking their arms & ammunition with them. The armed guards over the armoury & over the treasury remained, however, at their posts, & on the day following & indeed throughout the period of the strike the treasury was permitted to function. The armed police of two of the three outlying sub-divisions, namely, Jehanabad & Nawada, also went on strike. At Nawada they prevented the sub-treasury from functioning, but at Jehanabad, as at Gaya, the working of the sub-treasury was not interfered with.

[3] At about midday on 24-3-1947, a sergeant J. G. Lacey, was sent by the sergeant-major to the armoury to obtain ropes & handcuffs with which to bring under-trial prisoners from the jail to the Ct. of Session. Sargeant Lacey was permitted to open the armoury & take out the handcuffs & ropes, but, when he was about to take them away, he was stopped & was also compelled to hand over the key. On the evening of 25-3-1947, a public meeting was held in the Whitty Park at Gaya, which was addressed by Ramanand Tewari & by certain constables, among them one of these applts. While this meeting was in progress, certain events to which I will refer presently, were taking place in Patna & in consequence of them, the action which the Provincial Govt. decided to take against Mr. Chaudhuri had no effect, & it had eventually to call in troops in order to recover possession of the armoury.

[4] At 5 P. M. on 27-3-1947, an armed force consisting of officers & men of the Bihar Regiment surrounded the police lines & also the treasury. An armoured car was sent into the police lines & drew up at a distance of 35 yards or so in front of the armoury. The sergeant major of police, who was in the armoured car, climbed on to the top of it & called on the havildars & constables to surrender. One of them fired a shot at him which, fortunately, went wide. The officer in charge of the armoured car then ordered his crew to fire a number of shots at the wall of the armoury, which they did. Certain constables, who were in possession of rifles & ammunition, had taken up positions in the armoury & also at some other points in the police lines. Some of these men fired on the troops, & the fire was returned, two constables being killed & one, who died later, being wounded. Eventually, after a desultory exchange of shots over a period of about an hour, the havildars & constables decided to surrender. According to Captain Chet Singh Parwal, who was the officer in charge of the troops which surrounded the treasury, a number of constables had taken up their positions on the roof of the treasury & had trained their rifles on him & his men. These constables, hower, did not open fire, nor in consequence, did Captain Chet Singh Parwal. At about 9 P.M., when these constables realised that the constables in the police lines had surrendered, they too agreed to come out & surrender.

[5] It seems clear that the resistance which was put up to the troops by the havildars & constables in the police lines was largely due to incidents which had taken place in Patna on the previous two days. In the afternoon of 25-3-1947, the constables at Patna organised a meeting in the police lines at which, presumably, they intended to express their sympathy with the constables at Gaya & also, possibly, to decide to go on strike themselves. Mr. S. P. Varma, the City Superintendent of Police & several other police officers went to the police lines & attempted to prevent the meeting being held. Mr. Varma was assaulted & those of the other police officers who went to his assistance were assaulted also. The District Mag., Patna, decided to call in the assistance of the military, & troops belonging to a British regiment, which was stationed at Dinapur, came to the police lines & trained machine guns on the constables assembled there. These constables thereupon surrendered. Prior to this, however, one Barhamdeo Singh, a constable employed as the driver of a motor vehicle, succeeded in getting away from the police lines with his truck & also with some rifles & ammunition. Barhamdeo Singh & the other constables, who were with him in this truck, drove to Gaya, stopping on the way at the police stations at Fatwa, Bakhtiarpur & Bihar, in order to tell the constables there what had happened & to call on them to go on strike also. Their purpose in going to Gaya was to get into communication with Ramanand Tewari.

[6] Ramanand Tewari decided to go at once to Patna, & presumably, because he suspected that his truck had been followed, Barhamdeo Singh took another route via Bikram, Bihta & Maner. At each of the police stations the truck was stopped & Ramanand Tewari got out of it & urged the constables there to join in the strike. On reaching Patna, Ramanand Tewari drove, in the first instance, to the new police lines & thence to the police station at Pirbahore where, apparently, he incited the constables to join in the strike. From the Pirbahore police station he set out for the Kadamkuan police station, but in the meantime police officers in Patna had got to know of his arrival & had set out in pursuit of him. The truck driven by Barhamdeo Singh was overtaken in a narrow road which was, partially blocked by a stationary motor car in which two civilians were sitting. The men in the truck got out of it & one or more of them opened fire on their pursuers. This fire was returned, & most unfortunately, the two civilians in the motor car were killed, as also was one of the occupants of the truck. Ramanand Tewari himself got away & went either that night or early next morning to Chapra.

[7] Another ex-constable, Indradeo Singh, who has been described as a lieutenant of Ramanand Tewari, left Patna immediately after this incident for Monghyr. Indradeo Singh appears to have assumed that, as British troops had been called in on the previous night, it must have been British troops who were responsible for opening fire on the occupants of the truck driven by Barhamdeo Singh in Kadamkuan. His resentment at the employment of British troops & at what, he supposed, quite wrongly it would seem, had been their behaviour, had, I am inclined to think a good deal to do with what took place at Monghyr & also possibly at Gaya. Indradeo Singh reached Jamalpur at about 5 P.M. & went to the police lines & called on the havildars & constables there to go on strike, Sergeant Ashtan, on being told of what was going on in the lines, at once went to the armoury & ordered Indradeo Singh out of it. Indradeo Singh called on him to hand over the key of the armoury, & when sergeant Ashtan declined to do so, he was assaulted, one constable striking him a blow on the head with an iron bar. Indradeo Singh then took possession of the key & opened the armoury & issued rifles & ammunition to the havildars & constables Prior to this, Indradeo Singh had been in communication by telephone with the police lines at Monghyr. At about 7 P. M. the alarm was sounded there & the havildars & constables decided to go on strike. At about 11-30 P.M. the armoury was broken open & rifles & ammunition were issued to those constables who were not already in possession of them.

[8] In the meantime the District Mag. & the Superintendent of Police, Mr. A. B. Banerji, who had displayed much tact & had done his utmost to prevent a strike, received orders from Patna that the Military should be called in to suppress it. Shortly after midnight, a detachment of troops took up positions at or near the gate of the Fort close to the police lines. An order to surrender was given, &, when this was not obeyed, the officer commanding ordered six of his men to fire one round each into the police lines. This fire was returned. Between 3 a. m. & 4 a. m. the constables at Jamalpur decided to abandon the armoury there & to move in to Monghyr. They stopped & boarded a cooly train which arrived in Monghyr at about 4 a. m. & proceeded to the police lines to join the constables there. The latter mistook them for troops & opened fire on them, & several of the Jamalpur constables were wounded before the mistake was discovered. Orders to stop firing were then given & the Jamalpur constables were admitted into the police lines. At about 7 a. m. next morning, Mr. Banerji made another effort to put an end to the strike, & on this occasion succeeded in getting the constables to surrender. Indradeo Singh succeeded in getting away & appears to have crossed the river with the intention of creating trouble at Begusarai. So far, however, as appears from the record, he either did not go there or did not succeed in his mission.

[9] Ramanand Tewari arrived in Chapra on 27-3-1947, & between 4 p. m. & 6 p. m. on that day addressed a meeting of the constables in the police lines. A number of men at this meeting decided to go on strike. Any attempt to obtain possession of the armoury was, however, foiled by the energy & courage of Sergeant Major Chandradeo Singh who was in charge of the special armed police force. This man & his jamadar, Manzoor Khan, succeeded in preventing their own men from taking any part in the meeting, &, when it appeared that an attempt might be made to take possession of the armoury marched their men there & ordered them to resist. The strike of Chapra was, in consequence, very much less serious although, apparently, troops had to be brought from Muzaffarpur before it was finally quelled. The only other district in which any constables went on strike was Shahabad. At Arrah the ring-leaders were apprehended with the assistance of troops from Dinapur &, in consequence, nothing untoward happened. At Sasaram the armed police deserted their posts & took up their positions at the sub-treasury, although, as at Jehanabad, they allowed the staff of the sub-treasury to carry on their work as usual. This strike was brought under control by the Superintendent of Police, apparently without any assistance from the Military, on 29-3-1947.

[10] The evidence relating to these various events is extremely voluminous. It is, however, quite unnecessary to refer to it as Mr. Awadhesh Nandan Sahay, for the applts., has conceded that it is substantially correct. The decision of each of the appeals depends mainly, if not wholly, on certain points of law, &, as such evidence as a material bearing on these points of law was adduced at each of the three trials, the three appeals can conveniently be disposed of in one & the same judgment.

[11] The applts. in Criminal Appl. No. 115 of 1949 have been convicted under S. 121 of the Penal Code for having waged war against the King. So far as some of these applts. are concerned, there was no evidence on which such a charge could possibly have been framed. So far as the remaining applts. are concerned the charge is sought to be sustained on the ground that they were among those who took possession of the armoury on 23-3-1947, &, so far as a small minority of them are concerned, also on the ground that they took part in the resistance which was put up to the troops on 27-3-1947. The expression "waging war" means & can, I think, only mean "waging war in the manner usual in war." In other words, in order to support a conviction on such a charge, it is not enough to show that the persons charged have contrived to obtain possession of an armoury & have, when called upon to surrender it, used the rifles & ammunition so obtained against the King's troops. It must also be shown that the seizure of the armoury was part & parcel of a planned operation & that their intention in resisting the troops of the King was to overwhelm & defeat these troops & then to go on & crush any further opposition with which they might meet until either the leaders of the movement succeeded in obtaining possession of the machinery of Govt. or until those in possession of it yielded to the demands of their leaders.

[12] That this is so is I think, made quite clear by an examination of the Bill which led to the insertion of S. 121A, in the Penal Code. The section, as it appears in the Bill &, more particularly, the latter portion of it, is not precisely the same as the section, which was ultimately enacted. For our present purpose the relevant words in the Bill were :

"Whoever . . . . . conspires to wage or abet civil war shall be punished with transportation for life, or any shorter term, or with imprisonment of either description which may extend to ten years."

Explanation 2 ran thus :

"Civil war means permanent & organized hostile operations carried on by any one section of the community against any other section of it."

Appended to this were two illustrations, one of which was : "An attack upon an arsenal might be civil war if it was intended as the first step towards permanent hostilities." (Gazette of India, dated 27-8-1870). The then Legislative member of the Govt. of India was Sir James Fitzjames Stephen who later became one of the Judges of the H. C. in England & was perhaps the greatest authority of his generation on criminal law. In his Digest of the Criminal Law. Edn. 8, p. 57, one of the meanings given to the expression "to levy war" is "attacking in the manner usual in war the King himself or his military forces, acting as such by his orders, in the execution of their duty." It is, I think, quite impossible to say that any of these applts. waged war in the sense in which that expression, as it occurs in S. 121, Penal Code, was used. The applts. or some of them were in possession of the armoury at Gaya for several days, & it is perfectly clear that they never intended to use it as a base for further operations. As to the engagement, if it can be called an engagement, between them & the troops, who were sent against them, it has to be remembered that very fantastic rumours had apparently been spread as to the treatment which had been meted out to the constables at Patna. It may be that those of the applts. who were inside the police lines & the other havildars & constables who were there with them expected the troops to shoot them down & determined to put up as much of a desperate resistance as they could before they were shot down. That, I think, is suggested by what was said by Sergeant Lacey who was inside the police lines & who described the constables as having run about "like mad fools" when the armoured car proceeded towards the armoury. The utmost that can, I think, possibly be said is that their leaders were determined to make the troops sent against them have recourse to force in order to arouse public sympathy in their cause & to put or try to put the Provincial Govt. in the wrong. Even, however, if that was so, the convictions under S. 121, Penal Code cannot be supported. The applts. were no more guilty of that offence than any other persons, who, when called upon to submit to arrest, offer resistance.

[13] When any body of men, whether factory operatives or clerks or policemen go on strike, their object clearly is to coerce their employers into yielding to their demands. Until the early part of the 19th century combinations of this kind in England were criminal. Subsequently, it ceased to be a crime for the great majority of workers to resort to a strike although certain acts done by strikers were & are still punishable as crimes. Policemen, however, & certain other classes of employees are forbidden by law to go on strike. Each one of the applts. who went on strike committed an offence & when each of them agreed with the others to do so, they jointly committed another & more serious offence, namely, the offence of conspiracy. A conspiracy is in substance an agreement to do an unlawful act. The only case which I have been able to discover in which a number of public servants simultaneously declined to perform their duties in order to extort concessions in the matter of pay from the State is a very old one decided in 1769. Vertue v Lord Clive, (1769) 4 Burr. 2472 : (98 E. R. 296). Certain military officers in the army of the East India Company simultaneously tendered their resignations of their commissions on the ground that they had not received as much in the way of allowances as they believed they were entitled to. Lord Clive, in order to meet the very dangerous situation which was thus created, had the officers placed under arrest, & when they returned to England, some of them instituted actions to recover damages for assualt & false imprisonment. These actions were dismissed, & in dismissing them, one of the Judges observed that "this combination was a criminal act." This decision, however, while it shows that the applts. were guilty of conspiracy, is of no assistance to us in deciding the real point of difficulty arising in the appeal, which is whether the conspiracy was a conspiracy of such a kind as to attract the operation of S. 121A, Penal Code.

[14] The marginal note to S. 121A is "conspiracy to commit offences punishable by S. 121." This was strictly accurate description of the section which it was proposed to enact in the bill originally introduced in the Legislative Council. It is quite clear that the conspiracies aimed at in the bill were conspiracies either to wage war against the King in the manner in which it is usual to wage war or conspiracies to raise an insurrection with the object of subverting the constitution. The section, however, as finally enacted, brought within its scope other conspiracies also, & the marginal note is not a strictly accurate description of what is contained in it. The words "conspires to overawe by means of criminal force or the show of criminal force the Central Govt. or any Provincial Govt." clearly embrace not merely a conspiracy to raise a general insurrection, but also a conspiracy to overawe the Central Govt. or any Provincial Govt. by the organisation of a serious riot or a large & tumultuous unlawful assembly.

[15] Possibly, in modifying the section as it stood in the bill, the Legislative Council had in mind the case of Lord George Gordon (21 State Trials 486). Lord George Gordon put himself at the head of a large mob which proceeded to the Houses of Parliament in order to protest against the enactment of certain legislation. After having made its protest, the mob dispersed, but certain members of it proceeded to perpetrate outrages in different parts of the city of London. Lord George Gordon was tried on a charge of a high treason, & was acquitted, the reason apparently being that, while he had intended to make a demonstration outside the Houses of Parliament, he had not been a party to the disorders which resulted from it. Section 121A, occurs in a chapter of the Penal Code which is headed "offences against the State" whereas the offence of conspiracy is contained in the preceding chapter, Chap. VA. which is headed "criminal conspiracy." The Legislature in enacting S. 121A clearly had in mind the English Treason Felony Act of 1848 & I am very much inclined to think that, in enacting it, it did not aim at conspiracies other than conspiracies which had a political object, that is, conspiracies to overthrow the existing constitution or conspiracies to prevent the enactment of legislation which was considered to be obnoxious or to compel the resignation of a member or members of the Govt. who had become unpopular. As the section stands, however, I am not prepared to say that in certain circumstances persons who organise a strike among police men or certain other public or Municipal employees might not render themselves liable to prosecution under it. Clearly, however, persons do not commit this crime unless it was part & parcel of their plans to overawe the Central or the Provincial Govt. by criminal force or show of criminal force. The word "overawe" does not appear anywhere else in the Penal Code except in this section & in another section in the same chapter (S. 124).

[16] In the Treason Felony Act, 1848, which the authors of S. 121-A appear to have had in mind, the words used are "intimidate or overawe both Houses or either House of Parliament", & the words there must be read in conjunction with the words immediately preceding them, which are "in order by force or constraint to compel His Majesty to change his measures or counsel". The word "overawe" clearly imports more than the creation of apprehension or alarm or even perhaps fear. It appears to me to connote the creation of a situation in which the members of the Central or the Provincial Govt. feel themselves compelled to choose between yielding to force or exposing themselves or members of the public to a very serious danger. It is not necessary that the danger should be a danger of assassination or of bodily injury to themselves. The danger might well be a danger to public property or to the safety of members of the general public. In Reg. v. Thomas Gallagher, (1885) 15 Cox. C. C. 291 & in Reg. v. Deasy, (1883) 15 Cox. C. C. 334 certain persons were convicted of treason-felony on the ground that they had entered into a conspiracy to cause explosions with dynamite in different parts of the United Kingdom, their object being to compel the British Govt. to make alterations in the Govt. of Ireland. I refer to these decisions because, as will appear presently, the object of the promoters of this conspiracy, assuming that they intended to use criminal force or to make a show of criminal force, was not to bring that force directly to bear on the members of the Cabinet at the seat of the Provincial Govt., but to bring it to bear on them indirectly at a number of points in the province.

[17] In order to show that the promoters of this conspiracy intended to achieve their objects by means of criminal force, the prosecution relied mainly on what was said by Ramanand Tewary at the meeting which he addressed at Gaya on 25-3-1947, & what was said by him at two of the three police stations which he visited on his way to Patna next morning & on what was said by his lieutenant Indradeo Singh to the Dist. Mag. & the Superintendent of Police of Monghyr later on that day. In the sanahas which the sub-inspectors of the Bikram & the Bihta police stations recorded in their station diaries immediately after Ramanand Tewari & his companions left, Ramanand Tewari is stated to have said in the one case that he & his associates intended to arrest the Chief Minister as Mr. Bishwambhar Chaudhuri was a relation of his, & in the other that they intended to arrest the members of the Cabinet & also the Inspector-General & the Deputy Inspector-General of Police. The record of what was said by Ramanand Tewari at the other police station, which he visited, contains nothing of this kind, & in the trial Ct. & also in this Ct. it has been suggested that interpolations were made later in the station diaries at Bikram & Bihta. The intrinsic evidence afforded by the entries in the station diaries themselves shows that there is no substance in this.

[18] The explanation for the apparent discrepancy between the entry in the station diary at Maner & the entry in the station diaries at Bikram & Bihta is, I think, that, while the sub-inspector at Maner thought, & perhaps rightly, that it was of importance to record what the conspirators intended & were in a position to do immediately the sub-inspectors at Bikram & Bihta were more impressed by the violence of the language used by Ramanand Tewari & thought it important to record what he boastfully said he proposed or hoped to do ultimately in the event of the conspiracy proving completely successful. The conduct of Ramanand Tewari & his companions when they reached Patna shows that there was not then, & could not possibly have been, any plot to kidnap the Chief Minister or any member of the Cabinet. It is, I think, a pity that several police officers were not deputed to attend the public meeting addressed by Ramanand Tewari at Gaya on 25-3-1947, & to make as full & accurate a record as possible of what he said. Only one assistant sub-inspector attended this meeting or was called to give evidence, & this assistant sub-inspector did not produce the record which he made at the meeting. Pandey Narsingh Sahay produced in this Ct. a copy of a report which he submitted after the meeting. This contains the very briefest of summaries of what was said. All that can be gathered from it is, I think, that Ramanand Tewari made it clear that he intended to call out the whole of the constabulary in the province, numbering some 30,000 men & that, while he had no intention of resorting to force immediately, he was prepared to resort to it if & when necessary.

[19] The Dist. Mag. & the Superintendent of Police of Monghyr deposed that in the conversation which they had with Indradeo Singh, Indradeo Singh gave them to understand that he was awaiting instructions from Ramanand Tewari & that, among other instructions which he expected to receive, was an instruction to march some of the constables at Jamalpur or Monghyr to Bhagalpur. This statement, it is clear, was not made in pursuance of the conspiracy & was not really admissible in evidence. It seems to me very doubtful if any such action was really contemplated by Ramanand Tewari & the other leaders of the movement. Even, however, if it was, it does not carry the case for the prosecution appreciably farther. It is not usual for prosecution for conspiracy to be instituted unless the public prosecutor is in a position to put into the witness box one or more persons who have, at one time or another, been parties to the conspiracy & also to produce documentary evidence in the shape of letters or communications which have passed between some of the conspirators, showing what exactly they intended to do & how they intended to do it. There is no evidence of this kind on the record except the telegrams which were despatched by Ramanand Tewari from Gaya on 24-3-1947. These, however, are of no importance as they merely show that, at the time when they were despatched, Ramanand Tewari & his associates had not yet finally made up their minds to convert a local into a provincial strike.

[20] In this situation, in order to decide what the object of the conspirators was & how exactly they hoped or intended to effect it, we are compelled to rely on what they or their dupes actually did. It appears that in 1946 the police union had made certain demands & that while the Provincial Govt. had conceded some of these it had declined to concede the others. Although, before this strike was precipitated, no communication was sent by or on behalf of the police union to the Provincial Govt., it appears clearly enough from what was said by Ramanand Tewari in the public meeting & at the police stations which he visited in Patna that it was intended to extort from the Provincial Govt. the concessions or some of the concessions which they had declined to grant. As to the methods which were to be employed to coerce the Provincial Govt. it is clear that the intention of the conspirators was that at each headquarters or in any subdivision in the province in which armed police were stationed & there was an armoury, the armed police were to be induced not merely to mutiny & to refuse to obey orders & perform their ordinary duties, but were also to take possession of the armoury & of the rifles & ammunition contained in them & were further not to yield them up unless compelled to by main force. It was further intended that, where small parties of armed police were stationed at outlying police stations, they should desert their posts & return with their arms & ammunition to the police lines to reinforce the havildars & constables there. Finally it was intended that constables attached to police stations in the muffasal should similarly refuse to obey the orders of their sub-inspectors & should remain idle at the police stations. The administration of this country in the mufassil depends very largely on the police & if police constables at every police station in the mufassil had withheld their services as in this conspiracy, then the machinery of administration would have been seriously dislocated; also sooner or later, & sooner rather than later, crime against property would have greatly increased. The withdrawal of traffic constables & police pickets in towns would have had equally disastrous consequences. It is to the credit of the Provincial Govt. that they acted with resolution & promptitude & brought the mutiny to an end in the only way that was possible.

[21] A great deal was made at the trials over the assaults committed on Mr. Varma & the other police officers at Patna, over the skirmish between the Gurkha Military police & some of the occupants of the motor truck in which Ramanand Tewari came to Patna & over the assaults, on Sergeant Lacey at Gaya & on Sergeant Ashton at Jamalpur. The assault on the police officers at Patna & the firing on the Gurkha Military police were not acts done in the pursuance of the conspiracy & the large body of evidence which was adduced as to these incidents was wholly irrelevant. The assaults on Sergeant Lacey & Sargeant Ashton were, no doubt, acts done in pursuance of the conspiracy but the criminal force there used was clearly not intended directly to overawe the Provincial Govt. It was used in order to obtain the keys of the armouries. As to the firing at Gaya & Monghyr, this cannot bring the conspiracy under the latter part of S. 121A. If, in consequence of these incidents, the conspirators are liable under S. 121A, they can only be liable under the earlier & not under the latter part of the section.

[22] For the reasons already given, however, the conspirators were not guilty of waging war against the King. The decision, in my opinion, turns on a very narrow point, namely whether the conduct of the conspirators in seizing the armouries & taking possession of the arms & ammunition, constituted a show of criminal force. If having possessed themselves of the rifles & ammunition, any considerable number of constables had swaggered about the streets of Gaya, Jamalpur & Monghyr, causing alarm to the citizens in general, it might, I think myself, have been argued that by a legitimate extension of the principle underlying the decisions in Reg. v. Thomas Gallagher, (1885) Cox. C. C. 291 & in Reg. v. Deasy, (1885) 15 Cox. C. C. 334, there had been a show of Criminal force capable of overawing the Provincial Govt. Nothing. however, of this kind happened. The havildars & constables at Gaya remained peacefully in the police lines for several days & did nothing to intimidate the general body of citizens, but took steps to ensure that the working of the treasury should not be interrupted. The conspirators, I think myself, intended to place the Provincial Govt. in what they considered would be a dilemma for men who were wedded to the principle of non-violence, that is they intended to compel them to choose between yielding to their demands or calling in the troops to compel them to surrender, & if necessary, to open fire on them. However that may be, it cannot, I think, fairly be said on the evidence that there was any such show of criminal force as is contemplated by S. 121A, Penal Code.

[23] In that view of the matter, while there was a conspiracy it was a conspiracy on the part of a large number of havildars & constables to withhold their services. Under the Penal Code, when there has been a conspiracy to commit an offence & the offence has been committed in pursuance of the conspiracy, the punishment provided is the same as the punishment provided for the offence. I think myself that this is unfortunate. It may not be a very serious matter when a constable or a small number of constables withhold their services, but when a large number of constables all over the province band themselves together to withhold their services & when trcops have to be called in to quell the mutiny, this amounts to a very serious public mischief. Under the Common law of England a conspiracy to commit an offence could be punished more severely than could the commission of the offence itself, and in any case, in England a person who incites constables to mutiny is liable to a sentence of two years' imprisonment. When it is remembered that in England the police are not armed and that there is not one police force but a great many police forces, while in India the police force in every Province is a single police force and a not inconsiderable proportion of it is armed the Legislature might well be asked, I think, to consider whether the maximum sentence which can be imposed in this country and which is six months' rigorous imprisonment is not wholly inadequate, at least in cases of this kind.

[24] The charge of conspiracy, which was framed at each of the three trials, was not a charge of conspiracy to commit an offence under the Police Act but a charge of conspiracy to commit an offence under S. 3, Police (Incitement to Disaffection) Act, 1922. It is, therefore, necessary to distinguish between those of the applts. who incited other constables to mutiny and those of them who merely yielded to such incitement and withdrew their services. Ramanand Tewari, in Criminal Appeal No. 584 of 1949, was found guilty of this charge, he will be sentenced on it to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months; his conviction on the other charges must, however, be set aside. Subject to this modification, Criminal Appeal No. 584 of 1949 is dismissed. In Criminal Appeal No. 115 of 1949 the applts. who are clearly guilty on this charge are Mir Hassan Khan, Ram Balak Singh, Ganga Singh, Mohammad Sabir and Leyakat Hussain, who constituted themselves a committee of action and attended on & assisted Ramanand Tewari, and Brahmadeo Singh, Brijnandan Singh and Suraj Saran Upadhyaya, who were on the truck in which Ramanand Tewari went from one police-station to another in Patna, inciting constables to desert their posts. The convictions of these eight appellants on this charge will be affirmed and, as the trial Court did not impose any separate sentence, they will be sentenced on it to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months each. The other convictions of these applts. will be set aside. Subject to this modification, their appeal is dismissed. The appeal of the other applts. is allowed, the convictions and sentences imposed on them are set aside and they will be released and set at liberty forthwith.

[25] In Criminal Appeal No. 156 of 1949, there is evidence that a small number of the applts., particularly, Dinanath Singh, Mohammad Khalil and Ramnaresh Misra, took a more prominent part in the occurrence than did the others. Unfortunately, however, there is no evidence to show that they or any of the other applts. except Indradeo Singh incited other constables to mutiny. The result is that the appeals of all the applts. except Indradeo Singh must be allowed, the convictions and sentences imposed on them must be set aside and they must be released and set at liberty forthwith. Indradeo Singh was convicted under S. 395, Penal Code. There is no doubt that he was not merely responsible for the constables at Jamalpur and Monghyr taking part in the mutiny but that he was also responsible for depriving Sergeant Ashton of the key of the armoury. Although it was not he who struck Sergeant Ashton on the head with an iron bar but another constable, this applt. and that constable were acting in concert with one another. The offence committed was not, however, the offence of dacoity but the offence of robbery, and the conviction of this applt. under S. 395, Penal Code will be altered to one under S. 392, Penal Code. His conviction under S. 3, Police (Incitement to Disaffection) Act, 1922, will be maintained. On the former charge he will be sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for seven years and on the latter to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months, the two sentences to run concurrently.

[26] I cannot leave this case without commenting on the manner in which the proceedings were conducted. The paper books weigh more than 14 lbs. and contain between two thousand and three thousand closely printed pages. In one case the trial lasted for 80 days and in another for 59 days. In the former, the presiding Addl. Sess. Judge, Mr. Brindaban Bihari Lal, found it necessary to spend 23 days in listening to arguments while in the latter, Mr. Uma Kanta Prasad Singh, allowed the arguments to continue for 17 days. In my opinion, neither of them can have exercised any effective control or, indeed, any real control at all over the proceedings. The Provincial Govt. may have been justified in sanctioning the prosecution of at least some of these applts. under S. 121A, Penal Code, but it is, I think, unfortunate that their legal advisers did not exercise more control over the Public Prosecutor. It may perhaps have been necessary to try Ramanand Tewari separately, but the other applts. in each of the other two appeals could and ought to have been tried together. They had all been concerned in the same conspiracy and there was no justification for trying some of them in one trial and others in another trial. Apart, moreover, from the same evidence having had to be adduced at each of these trials, a great deal of evidence, which was either wholly irrelevant or was of very doubtful relevance, was adduced. In the time which was wasted over these trials the causes of scores of ordinary litigants could have been heard and determined.

Subodh Kumar Singh & another—Petnrs. v. The State and others—Opposite Party.

Criminal Misc. Nos. 626 & 627 of 1950, D/- 21-12-1950.

(a) Public Safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 13 — Revocation of detention order — Fresh order of detention.

Where an order of detention passed by the Dist. Mag. was revoked, it is open to the State Govt. to issue a fresh order of detention against the same person. [Para 4]

(b) Public Safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), Ss. 3, 13 — Detention order — Validity — Mala fides — Burden of proof.

The burden of proving bad faith is on the detenus, & the burden is a fairly heavy burden. [Para 5]

When the law gives the State Govt. the power to issue a fresh order of detention after the revocation of the order of the Dist. Mag., the exercise of that power cannot be held to be mala fide merely because the State Govt passed the orders of detention at a time when a habeas corpus appln. was pending in the H. C. [Para 5]

(c) Public Safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 7—Detention grounds — Inaccuracy in —Effect—Constitution of India, Art. 22 (5).

Any slight inaccuracy in details of the grounds stated cannot be held to invalidate an order of detention. The inaccuracy has to be considered in the light of, & against the background of, all the grounds which have been communicated to the detenu. It would be pushing technicality to an unreasonable extent, if it were to be held that a slight inaccuracy in the name of the village or regarding a date amounts to a contravention of cl. (5) of Art. 22 of the Constitution, or shows that the order is mala fide or that the detaining authority did not apply its mind before passing the orders of detention. The inaccuracies complained of are not in accuracies which affect either the form or substance of the orders of detention. [Paras 7, 8]

(d) Public Safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 7 — Detention grounds — Inference from past activity.

It is open to the detaining authority to apply its mind afresh to the past activities of the detenus to draw the inference from the past activity that if the detenus be allowed to remain at large, they will indulge in activities to the prejudice of public safety & the maintenance of public order. [Para 9]

(e) Public Safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3 (2) — Detention of person accused of offence—Legality—Mala fide order—Test.

It cannot be stated as a rule of law that when a person is accused of an offence, the only alternative is to prosecute him, & there is no legal authority to to detain him. It is a fallacy to say that the right to prosecute a person under the ordinary criminal law.

& the right to detain him are mutually exclusive. A. I. R. (32) 1945 Bom. 533, Rel. on. [Para 11]

There is no rule of law that unless a choice of one of two alternatives, prosecution or detention, is made at the earliest moment, the order of detention must be held to be invalid. The proper approach is to consider the facts of each case & then consider whether the order of detention is mala fide or not. [Para 11]

No doubt there may be cases in which there will be a clash between the different rights, if & when both detention & prosecution are made & pursued at the same time. In such cases, if the State Govt. wish to pursue the prosecution it must be prepared to comply with the safeguards of Criminal P. C., & must give to the undertrial prisoner such rights as he may have under the law. It would not be open to the State Govt. to fall back on cl. (3) of Art. 22 & hold an investigation or trial in disregard of the provisions of Criminal P. C. Apart, however, from this difficulty which may arise in some cases, the test whether a detention order is or is not mala fide depends on whether the order is for the purpose mentioned in the order itself, namely, the maintenance of public order, or whether it is for any ulterior or collateral purpose. [Para 13]

Basanta Chandra Ghose, D. K. Sinha & U. C. Pd. Sinha — for Petnrs.; The Govt. Advocate—for Opposite Party.

Das J. — These two applns. on behalf of two detenus have been heard together, as they raise common questions of fact & law.

[2] The petnr. in Cri. Misc. No. 626 of 1950 is Subodh Kumar Singh, & the petnr. in the other case, Cri. Misc. No. 627 of 1950, is Kishori Prasanna Sinha. I may briefly state the relevant facts. The two petnrs. along with several other persons. were taken in custody on 22-7-1949. It was alleged then that they had committed offences under several sections of the Penal Code & under S. 19 (f), Arms Act, the first information in the case having been lodged on 27-5-1949, & charge sheet having been submitted on 17-7-1949. While in custody the petnrs. moved for bail which was refused by the Mag. & the Ses. J. The petnrs. then moved this Ct. & on 13-10-1950, an order was passed directing the release of the petnrs. on bail to the satisfaction of the Dist. Mag. There was also an order that the hearing of the case against the petnrs. should be expedited. It is stated by the petnrs. that on 19-10-1950, the petnrs. were released on bail, but as they came out of the jail gate, they were arrested on the strength of an order of detention passed by the Dist. Mag. of Muzaffarpur in exercise of the power vested in him under sub-s. (2) of S. 3 of the Preventive Detention Act, 1950 (hereinafter to be referred to as the Detention Act). On 13-11-1950, the petnrs. made their applns. to this Ct. for a writ of habeas corpus under Art. 226 of the Constitution of India, & also under S. 491, Criminal P. C. The applns. were admitted on 14-11-1950, & a rule was issued returnable within ten days. On 17-11-1950, the Dist. Mag., it is stated, served the grounds of detention on the petnrs. The two applns. were listed to be heard on 22-11-1950. On that date, the order of detention passed by the Dist. Mag. was revoked & another order of detention was made by the State Govt. being Govt. order Nos. 365 & 366 C. D. dated 22-11-1950. The grounds of detention were also served on that very day.

[3] It is necessary now to state what these grounds are. The first para. of the grounds states that the two petnrs. are important or active members of the Communist Party of India. Then, the plan of action of the Communist Party of India is indicated, the plan being to overthrow the Govt. of India as constituted by law, through violence. Then, follow certain details of the programme of the Communist Party as stated by the General Secretary of the Party at a Congress held in Calcutta on 28-2-1948; the details include such items as gathering stocks of fire arms & ammunition, smuggling of explosives on a large scale, collection of implements for breaking jails, capturing different service associations to bring about a collapse of the administration, inciting Kishans to take forcible possession of the lands of the zamindars, inciting workers to resort to violence in the industrial area, carrying out sabotage of important industrial & other installations, etc. It is stated that secret instructions were issued to party members to offer resistance to the police at the time of arrest. After a statement of the above details of the programme of the Communist Party of India, the grounds refer to the two petnrs. individually & state the following (I am quoting from the grounds given for the detention of Kishori Prasanna Sinha, as the grounds in the case of other detenu are, more or less similar; some of the grounds being the same.)

"Kishore Prasanna Sinha continues to be an active member of the Communist Party of India.

He is a firm believer in violent methods & is an ex. terrorist. He joined the Communist Party of India in 1940 & has been a very prominent leader of the same ever since. He is one of the seven members of the Bihar Provincial Committee which was re-constituted recently after purging the reformist elements, i. e. those elements which are suspected, by the more extreme elements who are in control of the party, to be more inclined to reformist or constitutional approach rather than a violent revolutionary one.

He attended a meeting of the Bihar Provincial Communist Party which was held at Goraul (Muzaffarpur) on 26-12-1947, & 27-12-1947. In this meeting it was decided to organise 'Red Volunteers' on military lines to work on the agrarian & labour fronts. Later, on 16-3-1947 he discussed the formation of 'Lal Sena' at a meeting which was held at Saidpur, Gopalpur P. S. (Bhagalpur) in June 1947; he incited the kisans of Sondho, Mahua P. S. (Muzaffarpur) against the zamindars & exhorted them to forcibly harvest crops standing on bakast lands.

In September, 1947, he was reported to have been planning extensive kisan trouble in Sakra P. S. jurisdiction of Muzaffarpur which led to rioting cases in the zamindari of Rai Bahadur Shyamnandan Sahay. Trouble subsided only when the communist workers were put under arrest. In November 1947, at a secret meeting at Bisesar Pethia, Kanti, Muzaffarpur, he advised forcible harvesting of crops on bakast lands. In November 1947, he held a kisan meeting at Rahua, sadar P. S. (Muzaffarpur) in which he incited the kisans against the zamindars & as a result the kisans later indulged in acts of lawlessness for which an armed police contingent had to be deputed for some time to control the situation.

In January, 1949, he moved in the jurisdiction of Lalganj P. S. particularly in the vicinity of Patehri & Karenji villages to organise the loyal youths against the Govt. He also held secret meetings & instigated the tenants to forcibly harvest standing crops on bakast lands. On 11-5-1949, he along with other communists led a violent mob which attempted to rescue communist Chitranjan Singh who had been arrested by a police party at Belsar, Lalganj P. S. (Muzaffarpur). Two constables of the escort party were severely assaulted & the situation became so alarming that the police party had to open fire killing one & injuring four.

On 11-5 49, Deonandan Sinha of Arara P. S. Hajipur (Muzaffarpur) complained before the S. D. O, that the communists of Jagodih P. S. Lalganj used to vex him by catching fish from his pond forcibly & also looted his standing crops. The S. D. O. had enquiries made by the local S. I. & issued notices against 31 communists of Jagodih to show cause against action under S. 107, Cr. P. C. Kishori Prasanna Sinha visited Jagodih on 10-7-1949 & 11-7-1949 & asked his followers not to obey the Ct's. orders. On 16-7-1949, he again visited Jagodih & threatened Deonarain Sinha the complainant.

Kishori Prasanna Sinha with Subodh & other held a secret meeting on 11-6-1949 in Chookaha P. S. Paru at 12 in the night. At this meeting Kishori Prasanna Sinha gave out that he had gone to Patna to attend a meeting of the Provincial Committee where he stressed the necessity of starting a terrorist movement against the zamindars & cultivators of Patehri.

Kishori Prasanna & Subodh Kumar Sinha held a cell meeting in village Chakviki P. S. Lalganj on the 18th June, 1949 at 11.30 in the night. At the meeting Kishori Prasanna reviewed the international situation & said that the kisans and labourers of India will very soon follow the examples of those of Burma, China, Italy & France. At the second session of this meeting in the early hours of the following morning Subodh, the Dist. Secretary of the Party, read out his report on party activities in the Dist. & said that arrangements for terrorist activities should be made immediately.

Kishori Prasanna Sinha stated that Kalika Singh of Patehri should be made the first target of such activities & Ramagar Singh took upon himself the responsibility for this.

He is one of the principal communist leaders who directed the entire communist activities including the numerous unlawful activities throughout north Bihar, & is one of the trusted workers who is likely to throw himself heart & soul, as soon as he has an opportunity, in setting up through violence what the C. P. I. describe as liberated areas on the Telangana model.

He is an accused in the case under Ss. 148/353/225, I. P. C. & 19 (f), Arms Act which was instituted. On July 1949, (sic) he instigated the agricultural labourers of village Jagodih not to work for a local zamindar on whose report some communists of the locality were being prosecuted under S. 107, Cr. P. C.

At the time of his arrest on 22-7-1949, important party documents were recovered from the house of Mahabir Pasi where he was concealing. One of the documents was proof copy of an unauthorised news sheet entitled 'Muzaffarpur Zila men Congressi Sarkar ka zulum aur atank ka raj', a slip in his handwriting showing the expenditure incurred in getting the leaflet printed was also recovered.

Removing Shri Ranadive from the post of the General Secretary, the Communist Party of India has formed a new Central Committee also called the Action Committee or steering Committee under Shri Rajeshwar Rao of Andhra & some of the main features of the future strategy & tactics of the Communist Party of India, expressed in a resolution are as follows:

'(a) The Chinese experience tells that a decisive condition for the victorious outcome of the national liberation struggle is the formation, when the necessary internal conditions allow for it, for peoples' liberation armies under the leadership of the Communist Party.

(b) Many activities of the Chinese Working class went to the country side & set in motion the broad present peasant (?) masses against the landlords, built up numerous small armed forces & set up guerilla bases which grew into powerful people's liberation army in course of long period of guerilla warfare. Once we realise that the key tasks of the working class is to lead armed struggle of the peasantry in the rural areas, the whole question becomes clear. All activities must be guided by this prime consideration how to develop Telanganas in as many areas as possible. Telangana must be our principal way.' As the facts stated above show Shree Kishori Prasanna Sinha has been active in implementing this resolution.

In the circumstances, the State Govt. are satisfied that if he is allowed to remain at large, he will indulge in activities to the prejudice of public safety & the maintenance of public order. For prevention of such activities the State Govt. consider his detention necessary."

[4] Mr. Basanta Chandra Ghose, appearing for the two petnrs. has urged the following points in support of his contention that the detention of the two petnrs. is illegal. First, he has contended that it was not open to the State Govt. to pass an order of detention in respect of the two petnrs. when there was already an order of detention by the Dist. Mag. I think that the answer to this contention is provided by S. 13, Detention Act. That section, so far as it is relevant for our purpose, states that the State Govt. has the power to revoke an order passed by a subordinate officer mentioned in sub-s. (2) of S. 3. The section also makes it clear that the Dist. Mag. himself can revoke an order passed by him. Then, there is sub-s. (2) of S. 13 which, I think, is important. It states: "The revocation of a detention order shall not bar the making of a fresh detention order under S. 3 against the same person." If, therefore, the order of detention passed by the Dist. Mag. of Muzaffarpur was revoked & we are satisfied that it was revoked, then it was open to the State Govt. to issue a fresh order of detention against the two petnrs. There was no illegality in the issue of a fresh order of detention.

[5] Mr. Ghose has contended, however, that the order of the State Govt. was mala fide, & he gave various reasons in support of his contention. I propose to consider these reasons seriatim. It is stated by Mr. Ghose that there was great delay in serving the grounds of detention on the petnrs. in respect of the orders of detention passed by the Dist. Mag. of Muzaffarpur. The Dist. Mag. passed the orders of detention on 19-10 1950, & the grounds were communicated to the petnrs. on 17-11-1950. There was thus, a delay of 28 or 29 days. Mr. Ghose's contention is that when this Ct. admitted the applns. & issued a Rule, the State Govt. realised that the Dist. Mag's. orders might be held to be bad on the ground of delay in communicating the grounds of detention: therefore, the State Govt. stepped in & passed the orders of detention & communicated the grounds of detention in a great hurry on the same day on which the applns. were listed to be heard. The dates given by Mr. Ghose of the different orders etc. are, I think, correct; but the question is if the orders of detention passed by the State Govt. can be said to be mala fide because of the facts stated above. It is well-settled that the burden of proving bad faith is on the petnrs. & the burden is a fairly heavy burden. In my view, it does not necessarily follow from the facts stated above that the orders of detention passed by the State Govt. were mala fide. It is to be remembered that under sub-s. (3) of S. 3, Detention Act, the Dist. Mag. has to send a report to the State Govt. to which he is subordinate, together with the grounds on which the order has been made & such other particulars as in his opinion have a bearing on the necessity for the order. On receipt of the report of the Dist. Mag., the State Govt. may well have come to the conclusion that the orders of detention should be passed in these cases by them instead of by a subordinate officer. Some of the grounds of detention given by the Dist. Mag. were read to us. Though the grounds are similar, they are not identical. The grounds given by the State Govt. cover a much wider field than the grounds given by the Dist. Mag. When the law gives the State Govt. the power to issue a fresh order of detention after the revocation of the Order of the Dist. Mag., the exercise of that power cannot be held to be mala fide merely because the State Govt. passed the orders of detention at a time when a habeas corpus appln. was pending in this Ct. It is also worthy of note that under the law the grounds of detention have to be communicated "as soon as may be." No hard & fast rule can be, or has been, laid down as to the time limit within which the grounds should be communicated: that will depend on the circumstance of each case. It cannot, therefore, be said that the delay made by the Dist. Mag. in communicating the grounds of detention was such as to make it certain to the State Govt. that the orders of detention passed by him were invalid. To say that the State Govt. passed fresh orders of detention in order to get over the invalidity of the orders of detention passed by the Dist. Mag. seems to me to be going too far.

[6] Mr. Ghose has then contention that the grounds of detention were incorrect, at least, in two particulars, & showed that the detaining authority had not applied its mind before passing the orders of detention: & therefore, the orders were not bona fide orders. The two particulars in respect of which an inaccuracy is alleged relate to the name of the police station mentioned in ground NO. 12 against Kishori Prasanna Sinha. The name of the village mentioned there is village Chakbhiki in police station Lalganj, where it is stated that a "cell" meeting was held on 18-6-1949. It is stated in a supplementary affidavit (para. 7) made by one Arjun Singh on behalf of the petnrs. that the "petnrs, do not know of any village of the name of Chakbhiki in Lalganj police station, & to the knowledge of the petnrs. there is no such village in Lalganj police station."

We consulted the thana map of Lalganj, & it appears that there are several villages beginning with the name "Chak", though we could not trace a village with exactly the same name. On the days when we heard arguments in this case, the learned Govt. Advocate was not in a position to explain the inaccuracy. Subsequently, on receipt of further instructions from the State Govt., the Govt. Advocate stated, in the presence of & after notice to the learned Advocate for the detenus, that the name of the village is correct, but it is in police station Kurhani which borders Lalganj police station. It appears, therefore, that there is a mistake in the name of the police station. In my view, this inaccuracy does not, by itself, show that the order was not made in good faith. The other inaccuracy relates to the date '11-5-1949' mentioned in ground NO. 9, where it is stated that on that day the petnrs. along with others led a violent mob which attempted to rescue one Chitranjan Singh. It is not denied that such an incident took place, but in para. 8 of the supplementary affidavit made by Arjun Singh it is stated that no attempt to rescue was made on that particular date. This contention of inaccuracy is based on certain statements made in the appln.

for bail in Crim. Misc. No. 521 of 1950. It appears that the first information was lodged on 27th May, & charge-sheet was submitted on 17th July. It appears that the correct date is 27th May, & there is an inaccuracy about the date; I am of the view, however, that the inaccuracy does not, in substance, affect the ground mentioned. Our attention has been drawn to the decision in Re Shoilen Dey, A. I. R. (36) 1949 Bom. 75 : (50 Cr. L. J. 173), where the ground supplied to the detenu under S. 3, Bombay Public Security Measures Act, was that he was inciting a section of labourers of Tata Air India, Bombay, & it was found that there was no company as 'Tata Air India,' but Air India Ltd., which did not belong to the Tatas & that the Tatas had interest in more than one Air Co.; but there was no indication as to which company was meant. In these circumstances, it was held that the detaining authority had been casual in its approach & had not applied its mind with that diligence which was necessary. The detaining authority in that case was the Comr. of Police. Having regard to the facts of the Bombay case, I am of the opinion that the decision does not lay down any rule of law that any inaccuracy in the statement of grounds must necessarily render the detention illegal: all that the decision amounts to is that in that particular case the error was not considered trivial, & showed want of due care & caution on the part of the detaining authority. If that decision were intended to lay down a rule of law that any departure from absolute accuracy in every detail of the grounds stated must necessarily invalidate a detention order, I must respectfully dissent from the decision.

[7] Another decision to which the learned Advocate has made a reference is M. R. S. Mani v. Dist. Mag., Mathurai, A. I. R. (37) 1950 Mad. 162 : (51 Cr. L. J. 525). It is laid down in that decision that it is open to the detenu, if he can, to establish that the detaining authority has not applied its mind to the materials placed before it & has not satisfied itself about the necessity for the detention &, therefore, the order of detention, though purporting to be passed under S. 2 (1) (a), Madras Maintenance of Public Order Act, must be deemed not to be an order under that section. Whether the rule laid down therein applies or not must depend on the facts of each case. Any slight inaccuracy cannot, in my view, be held to invalidate an order of detention. In the two cases before us, a large number of grounds, sufficiently precise & clear, have been communicated to the two detenus. It is, I think, impossible to raise any contention that the detenus have not been afforded the earliest opportunity of making a representation against the orders of detention.

[8] While on this point, I must make a reference to cls. (5) & (6) Art. 22 of the Constitution of India. Clause (5) lays down, in substance, that the authority making the order shall, as soon as may be, communicate to the detenu the grounds on which the order has been made & shall afford him the earliest opportunity of making a representation against the order. Clause (6) says that nothing in the above clause shall require the authority to disclose facts which such authority considers to be against the public interest to disclose. In the cases before us, the grounds contain clear details & also a number of facts. & if there has been an inaccuracy with regard to the name of a village or a date, the inaccuracy has to be considered in the light of, & against the background of, all the grounds which have been communicated to the petnrs. It would, I think, be pushing technicality to an unreasonable extent, if we are to hold that a slight inaccuracy in the name of the village or regarding a date amounts to a contravention of cl. (5) of Art. 22 of the Constitution, or shows that the order is mala fide or that the detaining authority did not apply its mind before passing the orders of detention. I say this, though I am fully aware of the observations made in several cases that an order of detention, which deprives a person of his liberty without a trial, must be entirely regular in form & the detaining authority must take care to see that every step in the process of detention without trial is carried out with extreme regularity : see the observations in Dale's case, (1881) 6 Q. B. D. 376. In the cases before us, the orders of detention are completely regular in form; the grounds of detention have been communicated as soon as possible & in sufficient detail. The two inaccuracies complained of are not inaccuracies which affect either the form or substance of the orders of detention. Therefore, I am unable to hold that there has been any failure to comply with the provisions of cl. (5) of Art. 22 of the Constitution of India or S. 7, Detention Act.

[9] Another argument of Mr. Ghose has been that the two petnrs. are in jail for about fifteen months, & the acts which they are alleged to have committed relate to the past & have no immediate connection with the orders of detention. Mr. Ghose has relied on certain observations made by his Lordship Chagla C. J. in Re S. V. Ghate, 52 Bom. L. R. 711 : (A.I.R. (38) 1951 Bom. 161 : 52 Cr. L. J. 62). The observations are these :

"The past activities must be related to the situation existing at the moment when the detaining authority makes the order, because it is necessary to emphasise again, the satisfaction which the law requires is the satisfaction of the detaining authority making the order at the time when the order is made. It is not open to the detaining authority in 1950 to fall back upon the satisfaction of the detaining authority in 1948. Therefore, if in this case we are satisfied that there was not the satisfaction which the law requires, then undoubtedly the petnr, is entitled to succeed even on this ground."

These observations & similar observations made in other cases were considered by a Bench of this Ct. in Cri. Misc. No. 525 of 1950 disposed of on 4-12-1950. Their Lordships expressed the view, a view with which I respectfully agree, that those observations did not lay down any rule of law. The earlier decision of the Bombay H. C. in Hirji Shivram v. Commissioner of Police, A. I. R. (35) 1948 Bom. 417 : (49 Cr. L. J. 579) on which also Mr. Ghose, relied, can be clearly distinguished on the ground that S. 2, Bombay Public Security Measures Act, 1947, used the words "any person is acting in a manner prejudicial to the public safety." In the later decision of S. V. Ghate, 52 Bom. L. R. 711 : (A.I.R. (38) 1951 Bom. 161 : 52 Cr. L. J. 62), the question no doubt, arose under the Preventive Detention Act of 1950; but Chagla C. J. himself observed that "it would be very difficult to lay down at what point of time a particular activity of a particular person ceases to furnish any connection with the subsequent order directing him to be detained,"

and his Lordship said,

"we refuse to express any opinion that necessarily a period of two years would lead the Ct. to come to the conclusion that there could be no connection whatever between the activities of a detained person two years prior to the making of the order & the apprehension felt by the detaining authority."

It is clear that the detaining authority in the two cases before us applied its mind afresh to the past activities of the two detenus, & then stated in the clearest terms possible that if the detenus be allowed to remain at large, they will indulge in activities to the prejudice of public safety & the maintenance of public order. It was open, I think to the detaining authority to draw that inference from the past activities of the two petnrs. It is worthy of note that in the grounds communicated to Subodh Kumar Singh it was stated by the State Govt. that he was detained under the Bihar Maintenance of Public Order Act, but was later released on 23-10-1948. On 13-12-1948, the State Govt. passed orders restraining his movements within his own home village. This order could not, however, be served on him as he went underground immediately after his release, & while underground he made strenuous efforts to organise & incite kishans against zamindars. This shows clearly enough that the State Govt. considered the past activities of the detenus with reference to the situation existing at the moment when the detaining authority made the orders of detention.

[10] Lastly, Mr. Ghose has very strenuously contended that the orders of detention were mala fide, inasmuch as a criminal case against the two detenus, for various offences, was pending at the time when the petnrs. were detained, & it is pointed out that the grounds of detention communicated to the detenus referred to the facts of that very case. It must be made clear at this stage that the grounds of detention communicated to the two detenus cover a much wider field than the facts of the criminal case pending against them: as a matter of fact, the grounds of detention are not identical with the grounds for which the detenus were being prosecuted. I must also state that though we have not the entire record of the criminal case before us & are not, therefore, in full possession of the details of the criminal prosecution, it was stated at the bar that the case against the two detenus was separated from the case of twenty-eight others who were sent up in the same case, & the case against the two detenus appears to be still pending. Mr. Ghose has contended that (a) when a person is accused of an offence, there is no power in the detaining authority to pass an order of detention without waiting for the result of the prosecution, & (b) even if the detaining authority has a choice of two alternatives prosecution or detention, the detaining authority must elect or make its choice at the earliest point of time & cannot pursue both "remedies" at the same time. A large number of cases have been cited before us in support of these contentions: Kamla Kant v. Emperor, 23 Pat. 252 : A. I. R. (31) 1944 Pat. 354), Hirji Shivram v. Commr. of Police, A. I. R. (55) 1948 Bom 417 : (49 Cr. L. J. 579), Maledath Bharathan v. Commissioner of Police, A.I.R. (37) 1950 Bom. 202 : (51 Cr. L. J. 1126 F. B.), Vimlabai v. Emperor, A. I. R. (32) 1945 Nag. 8 : (I. L. R. (1945) Nag. 6) & M. R. S. Mani v. District Magistrate Mathurai, A. I. R. (37) 1950 Mad. 162 : (51 Cr. L. J. 525) Since the observations in Kamla Kant Azad's case, 23 Pat. 252: (A. I. R. (31) 1944 Pat. 354), this question has been considered by this Ct. on more than one occasion. In the F. B. decision of L K. Burman v. The State, 29 Pat. 502 F. B., this very question was raised, & Meredith C. J. (as he then was) said as follows :

"Lastly, Mr. Ghosh has argued on the question of mala fides. His contention is that a detention order cannot be bona fide in the case of a man on trial for a substantive offence because he can always be dealt with, if he is dangerous, by expediting his trial & refusing him bail. But I am not prepared to go so far as that. The offence might be a petty one, a bailable offence in regard to which a Ct. would not be justified on the facts & the evidence before it in refusing bail. Yet the man might conceivably be a dangerous man whom it was necessary to detain in the interests of public security. In such circumstances, it seems to me that a detention order might be perfectly bona fide & legitimate. If the Govt. had waited until the man was released on bail before making a detention order it might be too late, & it might then be said with some force that the order had been made only to frustrate the order of the Ct. granting bail. In the present case Govt. might very well have thought it would not be wise to wait the doubtful issue of the bail appln. Nor would it be possible for the Govt. to oppose bail on grounds not strictly relevant to the offence charged. The consideration which determines a bail appln. are generally the possibility of absconding & the possibility of suborning witnesses. It is easy to think of a case where neither of these grounds could be successfully urged, & yet, on grounds quite extraneous to the case, it might be dangerous in the opinion of the State for the man to be at large. Therefore, I do not think that the course adopted by Govt. in the prsent case necessarily implies mala fides, & there is nothing in the particulars of the case as disclosed in the grounds to suggest any mala fides on the part of the Govt."

I also expressed a similar view in the following words:

"Lastly, it has been contended that the order of detention was not bona fide, because it was in respect of a person who was already in detention as an undertrial person on a charge under the Explosive Substances Act. Our attention has been drawn to certain observations made by a Bench of this Ct. in Kamla Kant v. Emperor, 23 Pat. 252 : (A. I. R. (31) 1944 Pat. 354), in connection with certain persons detained under R. 26, Defence of India Rules when they were already under detention for a substantive offence. If it were possible to hold that the order of detention passed against the petnr. in this case was for the purpose of frustrating his trial for the substantive offence, the position might have been different; but on the materials before us, it cannot be held that the order of detention was passed for the purpose of frustrating the trial of the petnr. for a substantive offence."

These observations were quoted with approval in later D. B. decisions in what is known as Yusuf Churihara's case, Cri. Misc. No. 340 of 1950, D/- 31-8-1950 & the second Lalit Burman's case, Cri. Misc. No. 398 of 1950, D/- 1-9-1950. Mr. Ghose has contended that the observations in the F. B. decision were obiter, because the petnrs. had been convicted before we heard the appln. He has further submitted that the decision in second Lalit Burman's case, Cri. Misc. No. 398 of 1950, D/- 1-9-1950 is under appeal in the S. C.

[11] I have examined with care the decisions which Mr. Ghose has placed before us. I do not think that any useful purpose will be served by examining each decision in detail, because I do not think that the question raised rests on a rule of law. From an examination of the decisions it seems to me that the first contention of Mr. Ghose, stated as (a) above, is not correct. It cannot be stated as a rule of law that when a person is accused of an offence, the only alternative is to prosecute him, & there is no legal authority to detain him. As was observed in Gajanan Krishna v. Emperor, A. I. R. (32) 1945 Bom. 533 : (47 Cr. L. J. 297), it is a fallacy to say that the right to prosecute a person under the ordinary criminal law & the right to detain him are mutually exclusive. In this matter, I respectfully agree with the view expressed in that decision. I think that in each of the decisions which Mr. Ghose has placed before us, the question has been considered not as a proposition or rule of law, but on the footing whether, in the circumstance of the case, the order of detention can be held to be mala fide (in the sense of "malice in law" as explained in Vimlabai v. Emperor, A. I. R. (32) 1945 Nag. 8 : (I. L. R. (1945) Nag. 6). Therefore, the facts of each case have to be considered, & the test as explained in the case of Maledath Bharathan v. Commr. of Police, A. I. R. (37) 1950 Bom. 202 : (51 Cr. L. J. 1126 F. B.) is whether the order of detention has been made for "an ulterior motive or a collateral purpose," such as holding a secret investigation in disregard of the safeguards provided by Criminal P. C., stifling defence, etc. There is no rule of law that unless a choice of one of two alternatives, prosecution or detention, is made at the earliest moment, the order of detention must be held to be invalid. In my view, the proper approach is to consider the facts of each case & then consider whether the order of detention is mala fide or not in the sense in which the expression 'mala fide' has been explained in the decisions referred to above.

[12] Let me now come back to the facts of these two cases. There was no order of detention at the time when the investigation of the criminal case against the detenus was proceeding. I have already given the dates when the first information was lodged & the charge sheet was submitted. There can be no complaint that the provisions of Criminal P. C., were not then complied with; therefore, there was no attempt at a secret investigation in disregard of the safeguards of the Code of Criminal P. C., as in the case of Maledath Bharathan Malyali, A. I. R. (37) 1950 Bom. 202 : (51 Cr. L. J. 1126 F. B.). The petnrs. were not released on bail for a long time; & when they obtained an order in their favour from this Ct. they were released but arrested at the jail gate under the orders of detention passed by the Dist. Mag. Those orders were revoked, & the State Govt. then passed orders of detention. The question is—do these facts show that the order of detention is mala fide? I would answer this question in the negative. As I have already observed, the grounds of detention cover a much wider field than the incidents which led to the prosecution of the petnrs. On the materials placed before us, I am unable to come to the conclusion that there was any attempt to stifle the defence by passing the orders of detention. I do not wish to say anything more on this point, because if there has been any disregard of the provisions of the Criminal P. C. with regard to the trial of the petnrs., it would certainly be open to them to raise that point at the appropriate time. We are not at the present moment directly concerned with the validity or invalidity of the trial. On the days on which we heard arguments, the learned Govt. Advocate was not in a position to state whether the prosecution against the two petnrs. will or will not be withdrawn, as no final order had been passed by the State Govt. by that time. Subsequently, the learned Govt. Advocate stated that the State Govt. did not propose to move for the withdrawal of the prosecution against the two petnrs., as, in their opinion, their detention under the Detention Act is on altogether different grounds.

[13] Mr. Ghose has drawn our attention to some decisions in which the possibility of a loss or deprivation of the rights of an undertrial prisoner under Criminal P. C. or under cls. (1) & (2) of Art. 22, Constitution of India, as a result of an order of detention, has been adverted to: in some of these cases, it has been held that if such a loss or deprivation is the primary object of detention, then the order of detention will be mala fide. A reference may be made in this connection to cl. (3) of Art. 22 of the Constitution, the relevant part of which states that nothing in cls. (1) & (2) of Art. 22 shall apply to any person who is arrested or detained under any law providing for preventive detention. I realise that there may be cases in which there will be a clash between the different rights, if & when both detention & prosecution are made & pursued at the same time. If the State Govt. wish to pursue the prosecution, I think that it must be prepared to comply with the safeguards of Criminal P. C., & must give to the under-trial prisoner such rights as he may have under the law. I do not think that it would be open to the State Govt. to fall back on cl. (3) of Art. 22 & hold an investigation or trial in disregard of the provisions of the Criminal P. C. Apart, however, from this difficulty which may arise in some cases, the test whether a detention order is or is not mala fide depends on whether the order is for the purpose mentioned in the order itself, namely, the maintenance of public order, or whether it is for any ulterior or collateral purpose. Therefore, it is that test which has to be applied to the facts of each case. On the materials so far placed before us, we cannot hold that the purpose of the detention of the petnrs. is other than what is stated in the orders of detention, namely, the maintenance of public order in the State of Bihar.

[14] The detaining authority had clearly stated that it would be taking an undue risk to the maintenance of public order if the petnrs. were allowed to remain at large. In the matter of the bail appln. which the petnrs. filed in this Ct., the relevant considerations were different. The question of public security or the maintenance of public order did not then arise, & this Ct. dealt with the appln. for bail on the principles embodied in Ss. 497 & 498, Criminal P. C. In these circumstances, I think that it would be wrong to assume that the detaining authority had some ulterior or collateral purpose & not the purpose of maintenance of public order, for the detention of these two persons.

[15] My conclusion, therefore, is that the petnrs. have been legally detained, & there are no grounds for interference by us. I would accordingly dismiss the two applns. & discharge the Rule.

[16] Narayan J. — I entirely agree.

Chanderdeo Sharma—Petnr. v. The State of Bihar.

Misc. Judicial Case No. 212 of 1949, D/- 15-2-1951.

(a) Press (Emergency Powers) Act (1931), S. 4 (1) (d) — "To bring into hatred or contempt the Govt. established by law."

The words "to bring into hatred or contempt the Govt. established by law" connote something more than mere criticism of the various branches of administration with a view to improve them and not with a view to overthrow the Govt. itself. The hatred or contempt preached must be of such a nature as to excite a feeling tending towards overthrow of the existing system of Govt. Where in a booklet no hatred or contempt has been preached against the Govt. itself and the booklet read as a whole leaves only one impression, namely, the lapses of the followers of Mahatma Gandhi since they actually came into power and it depicts how they have neglected the great ideal or selfless service and how they have indulged in self seeking and self-profiteering the book does not bring it within the mischief of S. 4 (1) (d): A. I. R. (26) 1939 Cal. 529 (S.B.), Rel. on; A. I. R. (37) 1950 Sau. 1 (SB) and A. I. R. (35) 1948 Lah. 6 (S. B.), Ref. [Para 24]

Anno. Press (Emergency Powers) Act, S. 4, N. 5.

(b) Press (Emergency Powers) Act (1931), S. 4 (1) (d)—"To bring into hatred or contempt the administration of justice."

The phrase "to bring into hatred or contempt the administration of justice" connotes something as one preached during the time of the non-co-operation movement when the followers of the movement openly used to preach disregard of the Court of law. This and similar actions might be called acts which bring into hatred or contempt the administration of justice. But the suggestion that the appointment of Judges should be taken out of the hands of the executive authority and be placed in the hands of judicial authority is not such a statement as to bring it within the purview of S. 4 (1) (d). So also where a booklet deals more with the interference by members of the Congress party in judicial matters rather than the failing of the Judges and refers to some Judge, having been influenced, that does not amount to bringing into hatred or contempt the administration of justice in the Dominion of India : A. I. R. (5) 1918 Cal. 988 (S. B.) and A. I. R. (19) 1932 Cal. 547 ; A. I. R. (5) 1918 Mad. 1210 (S. B.) and A. I. R. (29) 1942 Lah. 105 (F. B.), Distd. [Para 25]

(c) Constitution of India, Arts. 13, 19 (1) (2)—Retrospective operation — Press (Emergency Powers) Act (1931), S. 19.

Where the Order under S. 19, Press (Emergency Powers) Act was notified in the Bihar Gazette before the Constitution of India came into force the validity of the order cannot be called into question with reference to a higher right granted to a citizen of the Indian Union by the Constitution : A. I. R. (38) 1951 S. C. 128, Folld. [Paras 29, 30]

(d) Press (Emergency Powers) Act (1931), S. 4 (1) (d)—Criticism of individuals.

(Per Sarjoo Prasad J.) — The fact that a booklet purports to be a bitter satire and at places it even degenerates into scurrilous and personal attacks on individuals by itself does not amount to bringing into hatred or contempt Government established by law in the State or the administration of justice therein. A mere criticism of man and measures or of the persons running the administration, however bitter that criticism may be and even if the criticism is misguided, does not necessarily amount to bringing into contempt the Govt. of the State or the administration of justice. Anno. Press (Emergency Powers) Act, S. 4, N. 5.

Ramchandra Sinha, Lakshman Saran Sinha and Lakshmi Narain Sinha — for Petnr.; Govt. Pleader— for the State of Bihar.

Rai J. — The petnr. has moved this Court under S. 23, Press (Emergency Powers) Act (XXIII [23] of 1931), 1931, for setting aside the order referred to in the notification dated 14-7-1949, whereby all copies of the booklet entitled 'Bapu ke Saputon ka Raj' have been declared to be forfeited to His Majesty.

[2] The notification dated 14-7-1949, runs thus :

"Government of Bihar, Political Department,
Special Section.

Notification,
Dated 14-7-1949.

No. 18975C. — In exercise of the powers conferred by S. 19, Press (Emergency Powers) Act, 1931, (XXIII [23] of 1931) the Governor of Bihar hereby declares to be forfeited to His Majesty all copies wherever found, of the booklet in Hindi entitled "Bapu ke Saputon ka Raj" by Pandit Chanderdeva Sharma and printed at the Chand Press, Jehanabad, Gaya, all other documents containing copies, reprints or translation of, or extracts from the said booklet on the ground that it contains words of the nature described in cl. (2) of sub-s. (1) of S. 4 of the said Act.

By order of the Governor of Bihar,
Sd. B. K. Dutta,
Under Secretary to Government."

Mr. Ramchander Sinha, learned counsel for the petnr., urged before us that the booklet in question did not contain any words, signs or visible representations of the nature described in S. 4, sub-s. (1), cl. (d) of Act XXIII [23] of 1931.

[3] The relevant provisions of Act XXIII [23] of 1931 run as follows :

Section 4 (1). —"Whenever it appears to the Provincial Govt. that any printing press in respect of which any security has been ordered to be deposited under S. 3 is used for the purpose of printing or publishing any newspaper, book or other document containing any words, signs or visible representations which tend, directly or indirectly :

(d) to bring into hatred or contempt His Majesty or the Govt. established by law in British India or the administration of justice in British India or any class or section of His Majesty's subjects in British India, or to excite disaffection towards His Majesty or the said Govt.: the Provincial Govt. may, by notice in writing to the keeper of such printing-press, stating or describing the words, signs or visible representations which in its opinion are of the nature described above :

(i) where security has been deposited, declare such security or any portion thereof, to be forfeited to His Majesty, or

(ii) where security has not been deposited, declare the press to be forfeited to His Majesty, and may also declare all copies of such newspapers, book or other document wherever found in British India to be forfeited to His Majesty.

Explanation 2.—Comments expressing disapprobation of the measures of the Govt. with a view to obtain their alteration by lawful means without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection shall not be deemed to be of the nature described in cl. (d) of this sub-section.

Explanation 3.—Comments expressing disapprobation of the administration or other action of the Govt. without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection shall not be deemed to be of the nature described in cl. (d) of this sub-section.

Section 23 (1).—"The keeper of a printing-press who has been ordered to deposit security under sub-s. (3) of S. 3, or the publisher of a newspaper who has been ordered to deposit security under sub s. (3) of S. 7, or any person having an interest in any property in respect of which an order of forfeiture has been made under S. 4, S. 6, S. 8, S. 10 or S. 19, may, within two months from the date of such order, apply to the High Court for the local area in which such order was made to set aside such order, and the High Court shall decide if the newspaper, book or other document in respect of which the order was made did or did not contain any words, signs or visible representations of the nature described in S. 4, sub-s. (1)."

[4] The effect of S. 4, cl. (2), of the Indian (Adaptation of Existing Indian Laws) Order, 1947, was to substitute "all the Provinces of India" in place of the words "the British India" in S. 4 (1) (d) of the said Act XXIII [23] of 1931.

[5] The booklet in question is a kind of satire written by way of a comic drama. Read as a whole, it advocates the path of truth and selfless service chalked out by the great leader Mahatma Gandhi. It also depicts at places in a rather vulgar language the subsequent deviation from that august path by some of his distinguished followers. It is unnecessary for me to consider in detail the entire booklet, but I will content myself by referring only to those portions of it which were read to us by the learned counsel representing the State of Bihar who submitted before us that it is not possible for him to point out a particular passage from the booklet in question to justify the order impugned against, but, if it is considered as a whole, the order of forfeiture would appear to have been justly passed.

[6] At p. 7 of the booklet starts the second scene in heaven where the departed souls of Lokmanya Tilak, Gokhale, Bipin Chandra Pal, Lala Lajpat Rai, Dr. Hume, Deshbandhu Andrews, Pandit Madan Mohan Malviya, C. R. Das, Prof. Bari, Mohammad Ali & others had assembled. They were all enquiring of Mahadeo Desai about the Health of revered Bapuji. On enquiry Mahadeo Desai told them that every arrangement had been made for the speedy recovery of Gandhiji. According to him, his recent illness was due to the serious shock received by him on account of the misdeeds of his followers in the Congress & mismanagement of the Congress Ministry, which had compelled many of his trusted followers to leave the Congressfold when they found that it was not possible for them to render real service to the masses by remaining in the Congress. It gives an extract from a letter of resignation submitted by one of such Congressmen. Nothing objectionable was pointed out to us from this portion of the booklet.

[7] The third scene of the Act describes a meeting of Naradji with Gandhiji, when the former tells the latter that he proposed to go on a visit of Bharat. Narad asked Gandhiji if he had any message to be given there, whereupon the latter requested the former to report to him about the conditions prevailing there.

[8] It may be mentioned here that Narad is a mythological figure who roams about everywhere chanting the name of God. He is said to carry a stringed Ektara in one of his hands. Sometimes, he is characterised as creating misunderstanding between persons.

[8-A] The fourth scene runs from pp. 12 to 14 of the booklet. It represents a talk between the girl students in the garden of a college for women where they are discussing about the propriety of the selection of a woman candidate for the Legislative Assembly. They are depicted to have expressed their dissatisfaction over the non-selection of a lady condidate from Saran district. They criticise the selection of an almost illiterate lady, simply because she happened to be the sister of one of the topmost leaders in the Congress party. So far as this portion of the booklet is concerned I do not find anything there to bring it within the purview of s. 4 (1) (d), Press (Emergency Powers) Act.

[9] The next portion read to us was the fifth scene beginning at p. 15 & ending at p. 18 of the booklet. This scene represents one of the Parliamentary Secretaries in a drunken revelry. He dances & sings in presence of a girl. In that intoxicated condition he has been presented singing a song the purport of which was that the Ministers & Parliamentary Secretaries were all powerful, & that they had arranged for all amenities for themselves. When asked about the members of the Legislative Assembly he said that they were also getting Rs. 200 p. m. besides Rs. 10 for every day of the sitting of the Assembly. They also command great influence in the sub-division from which they come. Then, towards the end of that scene the girl asked him, "Are you not taken to task for your misdeeds by the great Congress leader?" The answer given by the drunken Parliamentary Secretary is "How can he find fault with others when he himself is not spotless." Then he by way of a question asks :

"Why don't you see as to who is the head of the Bettiah Estate these days ? Who is the chief Labour Comr. of India & whose relations have the good fortune of occupying high posts in the Central Govt. ?"

[10] Act II scene 1 starts at p. 19 of the booklet & ends at p. 21. This depicts a scene wherein it has been represented that most of the time of the Governor of a Province is taken in laying down foundation stones & presiding over other functions without any real effective & useful service to the province.

[11] Scene 2 depicts a talk amongst several Rly. passengers wherein it has been represented that relations of influential persons in the Congress are appointed to high posts without requisite qualifications & without advertisement. At one place an Honorary Mag. by the name of Pikdan Ali says that he succeeded in being appointed as an Honorary Mag. because of the influence of the son-in-law of a Minister. The scene ends with a statement of Pikdan Ali that he does not purchase a rly. ticket though he travels in first class.

[12] The fourth scene of Act II depicts a toddy-shop where several persons are taking toddy & singing in an intoxicated condition. During that conversation they criticise the idea of complete prohibition at least so far as toddy is concerned. They refer to the harmful habit of smoking cigarettes rather excessively by one who advocates complete prohibition. They say that so far as toddy is concerned, it does some good to health but smoking for which there is no talk of prohibition, is always injurious.

[13] The fifth scene starts by a conversation between the Sub-divisional Officer & his wife at their bungalow when the former says that unless he keeps the influential Congressmen of his sub-division pleased, his own position might be endangered.

[14] Scene 1 of Act III depicts the chamber of a Sub-divisional Officer where he is busy collecting subscription for the Gandhi Memorial Fund from several persons. The Sub-divisional Officer notes the amounts of subscription against their names without their free consent.

[15] Scene 2 depicts a scene from the Bettiah Palace. There is a talk between the Maharani of Bettiah & Narad. The Maharani complains to him that the management of Bettiah Raj under the present regime is no better than what it was during the British Rule: she also complains to him that Managers of this Raj are appointed not on account of their qualifications but simply because their appointment to that post will please a particular section of the Congress party.

[16] Scene 5 of Act III depicts a talk between a highly placed Congress leader, his son & his two relations. The booklet having been written in a comic form one finds that during that conversation there is a lot of fling in loose language by one relation on the other. At one place the conversation refers to the fact that by his appointment to a high post in the Central Govt. one Mr. J. has gained an unexpected elevation much above the place he occupied as a member of the bar. It also refers to the settlement of several pieces of land of the Bettiah Estate by its manager to some of his relations & his acquaintances. A list is given of the various settlement holders. It also contains a statement by the manager of Bettiah Raj himself that he had got monetary help from some of the business concerns.

[17] Act IV, scene I represents a talk between two litigants wherein they speak of the malpractices prevalent amongst the process servers & the peshkars who are apt to harass the litigant public unless they are paid some reward.

[18] Scene 2 represents a talk between Narad & some of the villagers of village Churiharwa, a village in the Bettiah Estate, wherein it is said that a Congress leader of eminence had not discharged his duties properly for which he was given certain land by the Ramnagar Estate from the produce of which his son gets about 32 to 40 thousand rupees a year. The lands given belonged to different rayats who were dispossessed with the help of lathials supplied by the Harinagar Sugar Mill.

[20] Act V, scene 1 depicts the good qualities of a police constable Ramanand Tewari.

[21] The last scene of this booklet represents a talk between Gandhiji & Narad when the latter goes to him to report about what he has seen his followers doing in Bharat. Naradji recites to Gandhiji the degradations in which the Congress leaders had fallen. At one place there has been a suggestion put in the mouth of Naradji that the Judges should not be appointed by the Governor-General. He is purported to have suggested that (a) the F. C. Judges should be appointed by the international Ct. of Justice, (b) H. C. Judges should be appointed by the Chief Justice of the F. C. (c) Dist. Judges & Munsifs should be appointed by the Chief Justice of the H. C. & (d) all cases, civil & criminal should be tried by Munsifs & Judges so that the executive authorities may not exercise any undue influence over any of the officers presiding over a Ct. of Justice. On these suggestions Mahadeo Desai is represented to have put this question to Naradji: "Why are you suggesting such a procedure? Has there been perpetrated any serious injustice?" To this Naradji replies:

"A great injustice has been perpetrated. A criminal has been acquitted by a Judge under the influence of Munshiji. That Judge has thereafter been promoted."

At the end Naradji says that the act of administration by Congress Ministers is not laudable at all. In the Supply & Control Department there is a lot of corruption. The Ministers are, in hot haste in appointing their dear & near ones, however unqualified, to various posts. Even if candidates are selected by the Public Service Commission, they are liable to be not taken in on account of various other considerations at the hands of the Ministers. At another place Naradji has been made to say that the Police Dept. is also rotten from top to bottom.

[22] This, in short, is the purport of the comic drama. Now the question is whether it comes within the mischief of S. 4 (1) (d) of Act XXIII [23] of 1931. Mr. Ramchandra Sinha, learned counsel for the petnr. submitted that this Act had been brought on the statute book in 1931 to meet the emergency created by the non-co-operation movement, whose avowed object was to preach hatred & contempt against the Govt. established by law & also against the administration of justice then in vogue. By this preaching the followers of that movement wanted to create a mentality whereby people should be prepared to overthrow the Govt. It is well known that the Civil Disobedience Movement exorted people to shun law Cts. to treat their orders with contempt, to disobey laws promulgated by the then Govt. of the country to leave the army & the police force & so on & so forth. The Civil Disobedience Movement advocated disregard of Govt. in every sphere. According to the learned Counsel, it is this emergency which called for an amendment of the original S. 4 of Act XXIII [23] of 1931 by adding the following provisions which may be quoted in extenso to illustrate the significance of the above argument :

Amendment of S. 4, Act XXIII [23] of 1931.—"In sub-s. (1) of S. 4, Press (Emergency Powers) Act, 1931,

(a) after cl. (b) the following words & clauses shall be inserted, namely :

"or which tend, directly or indirectly,

(c) to seduce any officer, soldier, sailor or airmen in the military, naval or air forces of His Majesty or any police officer from his allegiance or his duty, or

(e) to put any person in fear or to cause annoyance to him & thereby induce him to deliver to any person any property or valuable security or to do any act which he is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do any act which is legally entitled to do, or

(f) to encourage or incite any person to interfere with the administration of the law or with the maintenance of law & order, or to commit any offence, or to refuse or defer payment of any land-revenue, tax, rate, cess or other due or amount payable to Govt. or to any local authority, or any rent of agricultural land or anything recoverable as arrears of or along with such rent, or

(g) to induce a public servant or a servant of a local authority to do any act or to forbear or delay to do any act connected with the exercise of his public functions or to resign his office, or

(h) to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of His Majesty's subjects, or

(i) to prejudice the recruiting of persons to serve in any of His Majesty's forces or in any police force, or to prejudice the training, discipline or administration of any such force;"

(b) the Expln. shall be numbered as Expln. 1 & after the Expln. as so numbered the following Explns. shall be inserted, namely ;

"Expln. 2. — Comments expressing disapprobation of the measures of the Govt. with a view to obtain their alteration by lawful means without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection should not be deemed to be of the nature described in cl. (d) of this sub-section.

Expln. 3. — Comments expressing disapprobation of the administrative or other action of the Govt. without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection, shall not be deemed to be of the nature described in cl. (d) of this sub-section.

Expln. 4. — Words pointing out, without malicious intention & with an honest view to their removal, matters which are producing or have a tendency to produce feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of His Majesty's subjects shall not be deemed to be words of the nature described in cl. (h) of this sub section."

[23] The learned counsel for the petnr. therefore, contended that the relevant words of the section, namely, "to bring into hatred or contempt the Govt. established by law or the administration of justice" should be construed in that light. He further contended that the words "hatred or contempt of the Govt. established by law" do never mean a criticism of the administration of the various branches of the Govt. According to him there is not the least attempt by the author of this booklet to incite any feeling to overthrow the Govt. established by law & substitute it by another form of Govt. He further contended that Explns. 2 & 3 attached to S. 4 are wide enough to include the comments made in this booklet. In support of his contention he relied upon the decision in the case of Bhanushanker L. Joshi v. The State, A.I.R. (37) 1950 Saurastra 1 : (1950-3 Sau. L. R. 103 (S. B.)), wherein it was held that criticism against the Food Dept. of the Govt. or the criticism against the Police Dept. of the Govt. did not come within the mischief of S. 4, sub-s. (1), cl. (d), Press (Emergency Powers) Act. 1931. It also held that a suggestion that influential persons in Saurashtra took advantage of their influence to secure employment in Govt. service is not such a statement that it could be brought within the said section of the Press (Emergency Powers) Act, 1931. He also relied upon the case of In re Jangi-i-Azadi Lahore, A. I. R. (35) 1948 Lah. 6 : (48 Cr. L. J. 931 S. B.), wherein it was held that critism of certain officer or officers of Govt. cannot be deemed to be a criticism of the Govt. established by law. In that case one of the learned Judges, merely, Teja Singh, J. considering the question of the criticism of the action of ministers said as follows :

"Under the present constitution the Ministers belong to one or more political parties & a criticism of their doings or policy, even if it be strongly worded, cannot be said to bring into hatred or contempt His Majesty's Govt, established by law in British India.".

[24] In the case of Emperor v. Hemendra Prasad, I. L. R. (1939) 2 Cal. 411 : (A.I.R. (26) 1939 Cal. 529 : 40 Cr. L. J. 782 S. B.) a Special Bench of the Calcutta H. C. held :

"In our view, Ministers chosen from the elected representatives of the people of the province for the purpose of carrying into effect, if possible & within prescribed limits, their wishes, & acting as advisers to the Governor, cannot be described as "officers subordinate" to the Governor, within the meaning of S. 49, Govt. of India Act, 1935. It follows, therefore, that, although in popular language, the Ministers may be referred to as "the Govt." they are not "the Govt." within the meaning of Ss. 17 & 124A, Penal Code. Whatever may happen in practice the Ministers are, in law, the Governor's advisers."

The relevant provisions of S. 124A, Penal Code, quoted below are similar to those of S. 4 (1) (d) of Act XXIII [23] of 1931 :

Section 124A. — "Whoever by words, either spoken or written, or by signs, or by visible representation, or otherwise, brings or attempts to bring into hatred or contempt, or excites or attempts to excite disaffection towards, Her Majesty or the Crown Representative or the Govt. established by law in British India or British Burma shall be punished with transportation for life or any shorter term, to which fine may be added, or with imprisonment which may extend to three years, to which fine may be added, or with fine.

Expln. 1. — The expression "disaffection" includes disloyalty & all feelings of enmity.

Expln. 2.—Comments expressing disapprobation of the measures of the Govt. with a view to obtain, their alteration by lawful means, without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection, do not constitute an offence under this section.

Expln. 3.—Comments expressing disapprobation of the administrative or other action of the Govt. without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection, do not constitute an offence under this section.

I respectfully agree with the view taken in the case of Emperor v. Hemchandra Prasad, (I.L.R. (1939) 2 Cal. 411 : A.I.R. (26) 1939 Cal. 529 : 40 Cr. L. J. 782 S. B.) (supra), & I am also of opinion that the words "to bring into hatred or contempt the Govt. established by law" connote something more than mere criticism of the various branches of administration with a view to improve them & not with a view to overthrow the Govt. itself. The hatred or contempt preached must be of such a nature as to excite a feeling tending towards overthrow of the existing system of Govt. In the present booklet no hatred or contempt has been preached against the Govt. itself. The booklet read as a whole leaves only one & one impression, namely, the lapses of the followers of Mahatma Gandhi since they actually came in power. It depicts how they have neglected the great ideal or selfless service & how they have indulged in self-seeking & self-profiteering. I do not consider that the book read as a whole or any portion of it brings it within the mischief of S. 4 (1) (d), Press (Emergency Powers) Act (Act XXIII [23] 1931), 1931.

[25] Mr. Lal Narain Sinha, learned counsel for the State of Bihar, contended that the booklet has been written in a very bad taste & it has tried to bring into prominence the defects only of the various branches of the administration. The motive of the author in so doing, therefore must be to bring into contempt the present Govt. He further contended that the booklet has not only criticised the executive side of the present Govt., but it has criticised the judicial side of it as well. The booklet suggests that the executive officers functioning as Judges, such as Sub-divisional Officers, etc., & even Judges are amenable to outside influence. He contended that this amounts to contempt of the administration or justice in the Dominion of India. I have gone through the relevant portion of the booklet dealing with this topic & to me it appears that it deals more with the interference by members of the Congress party in judicial matters rather than the failing of the Judges. At one place no doubt the booklet refers to some Judge, having been influenced, but that, in my opinion, does not amount to bringing into hatred or contempt the administration of justice in the Dominion of India. The phrase "to bring into hatred or contempt the administration of justice" connotes something different, as one preached during the time of the non-co-operation movement when the followers of the movement openly used to preach disregard of the Cts. of law. They used to say :

"Don't take part in proceedings of the Ct. Do not defend any charge framed against you. Do not pay fine. Break all laws."

This & similar actions might be called acts which bring into hatred or contempt the administration of justice. But the suggestion that the appointment of Judges should be taken out of the hands of the executive authority & be placed in the hands of Judicial authority is not such a statement as to bring it within the purview of S. 4 (1) (d) of Act XXIII [23] of 1931. Mr. Lalnarain Sinha, learned counsel appearing for the opposite party, in this connection referred to the cases of The King v. Davies, (1906) 1 K. B. 32 : (75 L. J. K. B. 104), In the matter of K. L. Gauba, I. L. R. (1942) Lah. 411: (A.I.R. (29) 1942 Lah. 105: 43 Cr. L. J. 599 F. B.) and In re Motilal Ghose, 45 Cal. 169:(A.I.R. (5) 1918 Cal. 988 : 19 Cr. L. J. 530 S. B.), but they were all cases in connection with proceedings taken for contempt of Ct., they were not cases under the Press (Emergency Powers) Act (Act XXIII [23] of 1931) & any observation made in those decisions is not very relevant in the present case.

[26] Mr. Lal Narain Sinha further relied upon the decision in the case of Kshiteesh Chandra v. Emperor, 59 Cal. 1197 : (A. I. R. (19) 1932 Cal. 547: 33 Cr. L. J. 690) to say that

"the Govt., established by law in British India includes the executive power in action & does not mean merely the constitutional frame-work & it also includes the local Govt. as well as the Central Govt."

In that particular case, their Lordships of the Calcutta H. C. were considering the legality or otherwise of a conviction under S. 124A, Penal Code. They have quoted in extenso various portions from a newspaper called 'Desherbani' from which they inferred that the conviction of the applt. was justified under the provisions of S. 124A, Penal Code; but the present booklet has not been written in such a way as to bring into hatred or contempt the Govt. established by law or the administration of Justice in the Provinces within the Indian Union.

[27] The learned counsel for the opposite party further relied upon the case of Mrs. Annie Besant v. Govt. of Madras, 39 Mad. 1085 : (A.I.R. (5) 1918 Mad. 1210 : 18 Cr. L. J. 157 S. B.). In that case the petnr., who was the keeper of a printing press & publisher of a newspaper, had been asked to deposit security for two thousand rupees under S. 3 (1), Press Act (I [1] of 1910). He had moved the H. C. under S. 17 of the Act for setting aside the order demanding the security. In that connection, their Lordships of the Madras H. C. had to consider, apart from other provisions of the Act, the provisions contained in S. 4 (1) (c) of the Act which runs thus :

"4 (1) Whenever it appears to the Local Govt. that any printing press in respect of which any security has been deposited as required by S. 3 is used for the purpose of printing or publishing any newspaper, book or other document containing any words, signs or visible representations which are likely or may have a tendency, directly, or indirectly, whether by inference, suggestion, allusion, metaphor, implication or otherwise—

* * * *

(c) to bring into hatred or contempt His Majesty or the Govt. established by law in British India or the administration of justice in British India or any Native Prince or Chief under the suzerainty of His Majesty, or any class or section of His Majesty's subjects in British India, or to excite disaffection towards His majesty or the said Govt. or any such Prince or Chief, or the local Govt. may, by notice in writing to the keeper of such printing press, stating or describing the words, signs or visible representations which in its opinion are of the nature described above, declare the security deposited in respect of such press & all copies of such newspaper, book or other documents wherever fouud to be forfeited to His Majesty.

Explanation I.— In cl. (c) the expression 'disaffection' includes disloyalty & all feelings of enmity.

Explanation II.— Comments expressing disapproval of the measures of the Govt. or of any such Native Prince or Chief as aforesaid with a view to obtain their alteration by lawful means, or of the administrative or other action of the Govt. or of any such Native Prince or Chief or of the administration of justice in British India without exciting or attempting to excite hatred contempt or disaffection do not come within the scope of cl. (c)."

The judgment of the H. C. quotes in detail the various passages published from time to time in the newspaper, but it is not necessary for me to quote them here. Suffice it to say that at one place Abdur Rahim C. J. says about the Act :

"The Act as is well known was passed in order to counteract the manifold ingenious devices adopted by the anarchists of Bengal for carrying out their propaganda. How far it has been instrumental in accomplishing that object is not a question with which we are concerned; nor are we concerned with the question whether the Legislature was justified in applying such a drastic press law to the whole of India, while the evil sought to be met was mainly connected with the activities of a band of young revolutionaries in one part of the country."

While considering the meaning of the words "the Govt. established by law in British India" the learned Judge held :

"It is contended by the appct. that what is meant by that phrase is the supremacy of the British Crown & the British connection as opposed to independence. This cannot be a definition of 'Govt.' as used in the section, it would only indicate the essential elements in the political relation between India & Great Britain. Government denotes as established authority entitled & able to administer the public affairs of the country. On the other hand Govt. is not identical with any particular individuals who may be administering the Govt."

He quoted with approval from the judgment of Batty J. in the case of Emperor v. Bhaskar, 8 Bom. L. R. 421 at p. 438:30 Bom. 421:(4 Cr.L.J. 1) :

"What is contemplated under the section is the collective body of men—the Govt., defined under the Penal Code. It means the person or persons collectively, in succession, who are authorised to administer the Govt. for the time being. One particular set of persons may be open to objection, & to assail them & to attack them & excite hatred against them is not necessarily exciting hatred against the Govt because they are only individuals, & not representatives of that abstract conception which is called Govt. . . .The individual is transitory & may be separately criticised, but that which is essentially & inseparably connected with the idea of Govt. established by law cannot be attacked without coming within this section."

This case also, in my opinion, does not help the opposite party. The booklet in question does not contain any passage to merit the order of forfeiture in question.

[28] Mr. Ramchandra Sinha further contended that the provisions of S. 4 (1) (d), Press (Emergency Powers) Act of 1931 are ultra vires of Art. 19, sub-cls. (1) & (2) read with Art. 13, Constitution of India.

[29] The Constitution of India came into force on 26-1-1950. The order in question was, however, notified by a notfn. dated 14-7-1949, in the Bihar Gazette dated 27-7-1949. The order of forfeiture had taken effect on a date before the Constitution of India came into force & it is difficult to say how the validity or otherwise of that order can be called in question with reference to a further right granted to every citizen of the Indian Union by the Constitution.

[30] A similar matter came recently to be considered by the S. C. in the case of Keshavan Madhava v. The State of Bombay, Case No. IX of 1950, disposed of on 22 1-1951: (A.I.R. (38) 1951 S. C. 128). In that case the applt. who was the Secretary of the People's Publishing House, Ltd. was prosecuted under S. 18 (1), Press (Emergency Powers) Act, 1931. During the pendency of the prosecution the Constitution of India came into force on 26-1-1950. The accused thereafter filed a written statement contending that the provisions of the Act for the breach of which he was prosecuted was ultra vires & void in view of Art. 19 (1) (a) read with Art. 13 of the Constitution. He filed a petn. before the H. C. of Bombay under Art. 228 of the Constitution praying for a declaration that Ss. 15 & 18 read with Ss. 2 (6) & 10 of the Act were ultra vires of Art. 19 (1) (a) of the Constitution & are, therefore, void & inoperative & that he should be ordered to be acquitted. The H. C. came to the conclusion that the proceedings under the Press (Emergency Powers) Act, 1931, which were pending at the date of the commencement of the Constitution were not affected even if the relevant provisions of the Act were inconsistent with the fundamental rights conferred by Art. 19 (1) (a) of the Constitution. The accused went in appeal before the S. C. against the order of the H. C. The majority judgment of their Lordships of the S. C. held that :

"It is, therefore, clear that the idea of the preservation of past inchoate rights or liabilities & pending proceedings to enforce the same is not foreign or abhorrent to the Constitution of India. We are, therefore, unable to accept the contention about the spirit of the Constitution as invoked by the learned counsel in aid of his plea that pending proceedings under a law which has become void, cannot be proceeded with further, if it is against the spirit of the Constitution to continue the pending prosecution under such a void law, surely it should be equally repugnant to that spirit that men who have already been convicted under such repressive law before the Constitution of India came into force should continue to rot in jail. It is, therefore, quite clear that the Ct. should construe the language of Art. 13 (1) according to the established rules of interpretation & arrive at its true meaning uninfluenced by any assumed spirit of the Constitution.

Article 13 (1) with which we are concerned for the purposes of this appln. is in these terms : 'All laws in force in the territory of India immediately before the commencement of this Constitution, in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this Part, shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, be void'.

It will be noticed that all that this clause declares is that all existing laws, in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of Part III shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, be void. Every statute is prima facie prospective unless it is expressly or by necessary implications made to have retrospective operation. There is no reason why this rule of interpretation should not be applied for the purpose of interpreting our Constitution. We find nothing in the language of Art. 13 (1) which may be read as indicating an intention to give it retrospective operation. On the contrary the language clearly points the other way. The provisions of Part III guarantee what are called Fundamental rights. Indeed the heading of Part III is 'Fundamental Rights'. These rights are given, for the first time, by & under our Constitution. Before the Constitution came into force there was no such thing as fundamental right. What Art. 13 (1) provides is that 11 existing laws which clash with the exercise of the fundamental rights (which are for the first time created by the Constitution) shall to that extent be void. As the fundamental rights became operative only on & from the date of the Constitution the question of the inconsistency of the existing laws with those rights must necessarily arise on & from the date those rights came into being. It must follow, therefore, that Art. 13 (1) can have no retrospective effect but is wholly prospective in its operation."

Therefore, the order in question which was passed in July, 1949, if valid in accordance with the provisions of law then in existence, cannot be questioned because of some higher right having been granted by the Constitution which came into force on 26-1-1950.

[31] In my opinion, the booklet in question does not contain any words, signs or visible representations of the nature described in S. 4 (1), Press (Emergency Powers) Act, 1931; hence the order of forfeiture referred to in the notfn. dated 14-7-1949, as quoted above must be set aside.

[32] The result is that the appln. is allowed, but without cost.

[33] Sinha J.—I agree to the order proposed.

[34] Sarjoo Pd. J. — I agree that this appln. should be allowed. On a careful perusal of the offending booklet, I am unable to find that its contents bring it within the mischief of S. 4 sub-S. (i) cl. (d) of Act XXIII [23] of 1931. The booklet purports to be a bitter satire & at places it even degenerates into scurrilous & personal attacks on individuals. That, however, by itself does not amount to bringing into hatred or contempt Govt. established by law in the State or the administration of justice therein. A mere criticism of man & measures or of the persons running the administration, howsoever bitter that criticism may be & even if the criticism is misguided, does not necessarily amount to bringing into contempt the Govt. of the province or the administration of justice. I, therefore, substantially agree with my learned brother Rai J. in holding that the booklet does not offend against the relevant section of the Indian Penal Act, & the order of forfeiture has, therefore, to be set aside.

Cri Misc. No. 697 of 1950, D/- 27-2-1951.

Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 220 & 497 — Ses. J. releasing accused on bail during committal proceedings—Mag. committing them for trial u/s. 302, I.P.C. & taking them in custody—Validity of the order.

Certain accused were released on bail by the Ses. J. during the committal proceedings. Subsequently the Mag. committed them to Ses. Ct. for trial u/s. 302, I. P. C. & took them in custody. The order was objected to on the ground that the Mag. had no jurisdiction u/s. 497 (5) to cancel the bail granted by the Ses. J., which was therefore still in force :

Held (1) that where a Mag. is of the opinion that there are reasonable grounds for believing that an accused has been guilty of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life, he is bound, when committing him, under the provisions of S. 220 of the Code, to commit him to custody; [Para 8]

(2) that the words 'subject to the . . . . taking of bail' in S. 220 clearly refd. to sub-s. (1) of S. 497 which is the only provision for taking of the bail & did not refer to sub-s. (5) of that section : A. I. R. (35) 1948 All. 366 F. B., Dissent. [Para 8]

Anno. Cr. P. C., S. 497 N. 7 Pt. 18a..

K. C. Sanyal & Baidyanath Pd. No. 1 — for Petnrs.; Standing Counsel — for the State.

Jamuar J. — The question for decision raised in this appln. is whether there is jurisdiction in a Mag. when committing an accused for trial to a Ct. of Session, to order him to be taken into custody, when previously there had been an order passed by the Ses. J. for the release of the accused on bail.

[2] The three petnrs. along with three others have been committed to the Ct. of Session to take their trial on a charge of murder & abetment of murder. During the commitment stage, an appln. had been moved to the Ses. J. for the release of the petnrs. on bail & an order was passed accordingly. Subsequently, when committing the accused to the Ct. of Session, the committing Mag. refused to allow them to remain on bail. Against this last order the six accused moved the Ses. J. who ordered for the release of three of them on bail but rejected the appln. of the three petnrs. before us. Before us, accordingly, it is now contended that the order of the committing Mag. refusing the prayer of the petnrs. for bail was without jurisdiction since the order of the Ses. J. releasing them on bail still remained in force, & that, therefore, the petnrs. should be ordered to be released from custody forthwith.

[3] Mr. Sanyal, who has appeared on behalf of the petnrs. has placed reliance upon some cases in support of his contention. He has cited Ahmad v. The Crown, A. I. R. (37) 1950 Lah. 195 : (Pak. L. R. (1950) Lah. 720), The Crown Prosecutor v.

N. S. Krishnan, A. I. R. (32) 1945 Mad. 250 : (47 Cr. L. J. 106) & Seoti v. Rex, A. I. R. (35) 1948 ALL. 366 : (49 Cr. L. J 521 F. B.).

[4] The only case which supports the contention of Mr. Sanyal is Seoti v. Rex, A. I. R. (35) 1948 ALL. 366 : (49 Cr. L. J. 521 F. B.). The question now to be decided did not specifically arise in the other cases. In Ahmad v. The Crown, A. I. R. (37) 1950 Lah. 195 : (Pak. L. R. (1950) Lah. 720), the facts were that certain accused were being prosecuted on a charge of murder & the enquiry was pending before the committing Mag. On an appln. to the Ses. J. they were released on bail. At that time the evidence of the prosecution had not yet begun to be recorded. When some witnesses were examined implicating the accused, an appln. was made on behalf of the Crown to the Ses. J. that the bail should be cancelled on the ground that a large number of witnesses had deposed against them & that the accused were trying to suborn the witnesses. The Ses. J. accepted the petn. & cancelled the bail bonds & directed that the accused be taken into custody. Hence the question for decision in that case was whether the Ses. J. was empowered to cancel the bail granted by himself. This is not the issue in this case before us.

[5] In the Crown Prosecutor v. N. S. Krishnan, A. I. R. (32) 1945 Mad. 250 : (47 Cr. L. J. 106), which is a S. B. decision, also the question was not the same as in the present case. The facts were that the accused who were arrested by the police on certain charges were refused bail by the Presidency Mag. but were enlarged on bail by the H. C. u/s. 498, Cr. P. C., pending the investigation of the case. Subsequently, an appln. was made by the Crown to the H. C. for cancellation of the bail u/s. 497 (5) of the Code on certain grounds. The question for decision was whether the H. C. had the jurisdiction to cancel the bail & it was held that although S. 497 (5) of the Code could have no appln. to the case of an accused person who had been released on bail u/s. 498 of the Code, the Ct. had adequate jurisdiction u/s. 561A of the Code to continue or discontinue an order granting bail in the circumstances which enured for a limited period only.

[6] As I have already stated, it is the case of Seoti v. Rex, A. I. R. (35) 1948 ALL. 366 : (49 Cr. L. J. 521 F. B.) which is in support of the proposition contended for on behalf of the petnrs. in the case before us. In that case proceedings were continuing against the accused before the committing Mag. One of the accused had been released on bail by an order of the Ses. J. & two of them by an order of the H. C. When the Mag., however, passed an order committing the accused to the Ct. of Session, he cancelled the bail of all the accused & ordered them to be taken into custody. The question was whether the committing Mag. had that jurisdiction & it was held that he had no such jurisdiction to cancel bail granted to the accused without any limitation by the H. C. or by the Ses. J. before they were committed to the Ct. of Session. With the greatest respect, I do not find myself in agreement with their Lordships. In my opinion, the most relevant section applicable in such cases is S. 220, Cr. P. C. This section is as follows :

"Until and during the trial, the Mag. shall, subject to the provisions of this Code regarding the taking of bail, commit the accused, by warrant, to custody."

Their Lordships of the Allahabad H. C. did make a reference to the section & observed as follows :

"No doubt, S. 220 gives power to a Mag. to commit an accused person by warrant to custody 'until & during the trial' of a case exclusively triable by the Ct. of Session or the H. C. But this power, as would appear from a perusal of that section, is subject to the provisions of the Code regarding the taking of bail & obviously the power to cancel it is in every case governed by the provisions of S. 497. The committing Mag. had, therefore, no power to cancel the bail which had been granted in the case of two of the appts. by the H. C. & in the case of the third appt. by the Ct. of Session at Mathura."

[7] Their Lordships refd. to sub-s. (5) of S. 497, Cr. P. C., which provides as follows :

"A H. C. or Ct. of Session &, in the case of a person released by itself, any other Ct. may cause any person who has been released under this section to be arrested & may commit him to custody,"

& it was pointed out that from a perusal of this sub-section it would appear that no Ct. other than the H. C. or a Ct. of Session has any power to cause any person who has been released on bail to be arrested & committed to custody unless he has been released by an order passed by itself. This is the only provision which enables the cancellation of a bail granted earlier & a Mag. cannot cancel a bail which he himself has not granted. In my view, however, when a Mag. acts u/S. 220, Cr. P. C., he is not cancelling any bail granted earlier but he is following the direction given in that section.

[8] S. 220 imperatively directs a Mag. to commit the accused to custody but this direction is "subject to the provision of this Code regarding the taking of bail." No question of any cancellation of bail arises in its direction to commit the accused to custody subject to the condition just stated. The words "subject to the provisions of this Code regarding the taking of bail" refer to S. 497 of the Code. This is the only section which deals with "the taking of bail." We cannot read sub-s. (5) of S. 497, only within the restrictive portion of S. 220 since the words used in S. 220 are "the taking of bail." One ought to refer to that part of S. 497 which deals with "the taking of bail," that is, sub-s. (1) of that section. Under sub-s. (1) when any person accused of any non-bailable offence is arrested or detained without warrant by an officer in charge of a police station, or appears or is brought before a Ct., he may be released on bail, but he shall not be so released if there appear reasonable grounds for believing that he has been guilty of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life & a special provision is made regarding the release of a person under the age of sixteen years or any woman or any sick or infirm person. It is clear, therefore, that when a Mag. commits an accused for trial before a Ct. of Session, he cannot order for the release of the accused if there appear to be reasonable grounds for believing that the accused had been guilty of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life unless the special provisions regarding the age or sex or sickness apply. Where, therefore, a Mag. is of the opinion that there are reasonable grounds for believing that an accused has been guilty of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life, he is bound, when committing him under the provisions of S. 220 of the Code to commit him to custody & there can be no question of cancellation of any bail previously granted to such an accused. In the present case before us, the order passed by the Mag. is in the following terms:

"Heard bail petn. Since the provision of S. 497, Cr. P. C., cl. (1) is mandatory regarding S. 302, I. P. C., or where there is sentence for transportation of life, the committing Ct. can't exercise its discretion. The accused persons in this case stand charged u/S. 302, I. P. C. & Ss. 302/109, I. P. C. I, therefore, see no reason to grant even ad interim bail to these accused. Their bail petn. is, therefore, rejected."

In my view, this order is in compliance with S. 220, Cr. P. C. I do not think, therefore, that the case of Seoti v. Rex, A. I. R. (35) 1948 ALL. 366 : (49 Cr. L. J. 521 F.B.) was correctly decided & I would respectfully express my dissent from the view expressed therein.

[9] Mr. Sanyal also urged that since the Ses. J. had not imposed any condition when releasing the petnrs. on bail, that order would hold good even after the commitment. Apart from the view which I have already expressed, there is another reply to this argument. It must be presumed that the order of the Ses. J. was good up to the last stage of the commitment proceedings. The order, in effect, exhausts itself on the day that the enquiry ends. From a reference to the bail bonds in the present case it will appear that they were to enure only till the end of the commitment proceedings.

[10] For these reasons I am of the opinion that the committing Mag. was right in refusing the prayer for bail when committing the petnrs. for trial, & I would, therefore, dismiss the appln.

[11] Shearer J. — I agree.

(b) Evidence Act (1872), Ss. 114, 133—Accomplice —Corroboration.

The evidence of one accomplice cannot be used to corroborate the evidence of another accomplice. The danger of acting upon an accomplice's evidence is not merely that the accomplice is on his own admission a man of bad character who took part in the offence & afterwards to save himself betrayed his former associates; the real danger is that he is telling a story which in its general outline is true, & it is easy for him to work into the story matter which is untrue. The only real safeguard against the risk of condemning the innocent with the guilty lies in insisting upon independent evidence which in some measure implicates each accused. [Para 7]

Order. — These rules are directed against the judgment of Mr. Damodar Prasad, Addl. Ses. J. of Monghyr convicting the petnrs. of the charges u/Ss. 379 & 120B, I. P. C. & sentencing them to R. I. for two years each & also to pay amounts of fine.

[2] According to prosecution case Babu Lal Agarwal had booked 74 bales of cloth from Jamalpore under two consignments of 22 & 52 bales each. The consignments were placed in wagon No. 38946H which was rivetted & sealed The wagon was attached to a goods train & taken to Kiul on 9-1-1949. From Kiul the wagon was taken to Lakhisarai by a pilot engine. It is stated that on 10-1-1949, the petnrs. having entered into a conspiracy to commit theft had gone to the goods shed & having tampered with the seal of the goods shed broke open the wagon & removed five bales of cloth from the consignment. The cloth was taken to the dispensary of Dr. Raja Ram which was opened by his servant Raghua & the cloth was stored in the inner room of the dispensary. The next morning Dr. Raja Ram having been appraised of the incident by Raghua made a report to the station master who in his turn informed the police. During the course of the investigation the dispensary was searched & three bales in addition to other cloth were recovered therefrom. Babulal Agarwal later identified the cloth as having formed part of the consignment which he had sent from Jamalpore.

[3] On 31-1-1949 Karua (P. W. 3) made confession (Ex. 4). On 8-2-1949 Raghua (P. W. 2) made confession which was recorded by another Mag. (Ex. 3). The trial of Karua & Raghua was split up in the Ct. of the Mag. They had been examined as witnesses in the present case in which petnrs. alone have been charged.

[4] The learned Mag. convicted the petnrs. of the charges u/Ss. 379 & 120B, I. P. C. The decision of the Mag. has been affirmed in appeal by the Addl. Ses. J. of Monghyr.

[5] In support of these rules Mr. Baldeva Sahay points out that the lower Cts. have based the conviction of the petnrs. in the main upon the statement of P. W. 2 Raghua & P. W. 3 Karua, that there was no independent evidence to corroborate the statement of these witnesses who are accomplices in the crime & that as a rule of practice, though not as a rule of law, it was unsafe to convict the petnrs. on the testimony of accomplices of which there is no corroboration by independent evidence. In my opinion this argument is well-founded & must prevail. From the record of the case it is plain, the prosecution evidence against the petnrs. consisted of the statement of P. Ws. 2 & 3 who said that the petnrs. had taken part in the conspiracy & in the theft of the bales of cloth after breaking open the rly. wagon. The lower Cts. have referred to the evidence of P. W. 60, Ramprasad Mahto, who deposed that in the night of 10-1-1949, at about 10 P. M. he had seen the petnrs. near the goods shed. It is not possible to hold that the statement of P. W. 60 corroborates the evidence of P. Ws. 2 & 3, for, in my opinion, the circumstances indicate that P. W. 60 has not given truthful evidence. In the first place, P. W. 60 made statement before the Police for the first time about 10 days after the investigation started. There is also proof that Kunjbehari had a dispute with Kataghara Singh & there was a proceeding u/S. 107, Cr. P. C. in which P. W. 60 was witness on behalf of Kataghara Singh against Kunjbehari. There is another fact to be taken into account. P. W. 60 stated that Jitu Pd. Varma was present at the time he saw the petnrs. near the rly. goods shed. But the latter, when examined in Ct., denied that he saw the petnrs. at the rly. goods shed at the alleged time. The trying Mag. who had an opportunity to see P. W. 60 in the witness-box has characterized his evidence as "somewhat shaky". In my opinion, it is impossible to hold that P. W. 60 has given true or reliable evidence in this case or that he corroborated the evidence of the two accomplices, P. Ws. 2 & 3 as regards participation of the petnrs. in the alleged crime.

[6] In the important case The King v. Baskerville, (1916) 2 K. B. 658 : (86 L. J. K. B. 28), the principle has been stated that the corroboration of an accomplice must be by independent testimony which confirms in material particular not only the evidence of the crime which has been committed but also that the prisoners committed it. It was pointed out that the rule of practice as to corroborative evidence had arisen in consequence of the danger of convicting a prisoner upon the unconfirmed testimony of one who was admittedly a criminal. It is true that in India S. 133, Evidence Act, lays down that an accomplice shall be a competent witness against an accused person & that conviction was not illegal merely because it proceeded upon uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. But there is a rule of guidance which the Ct. should also regard & it is to be found in illustration (b) of S. 114 which enacts a rule of presumption that an accomplice is unworthy of credit unless he is corroborated in material particulars. The rules laid down in S. 133 & in S. 114 illustration (b) are part of one subject & neither section is to be ignored in the trial of a case. On the whole the effect of these sections is that the Legislature has laid it down as a maxim or rule of evidence resting on human experience that an accomplice is unworthy of credit against an accused person unless he is corroborated in material particulars in respect to that person & that it is the duty of the Ct. which in any particular case has to deal with an accomplice's testimony to consider whether this maxim applies to exclude that testimony or not. In the present case, it is impossible upon the facts proved to accept the uncorroborated testimony of P. Ws. 2 & 3 or to hold that P. W. 60 has given reliable or independent evidence in corroboration of the testimony of P. Ws. 2 & 3. As regards petnr. Ratan Dusadh prosecution has adduced some additional evidence to corroborate P. Ws. 2 & 3. P. W. 38, Station Master, deposed that on 16-1-1949, Ratan made statement admitting to have taken part in the crime. The statement on the whole is apparently exculpatory & the lower appellate Ct. has consd. that the evidence of the Station Master in this respect is suspicious. According to this witness Ratan made the alleged statement on 16-1-1949. The statement was recorded by the Station Master but the statement does not bear the signature or thumb impression of Ratan. It is of significance that the Station Master produced this statement for the first time in Ct. on 23-9-1949. There is no good expln. why he did not produce this statement to the Police during investigation or in the Ct. of the Mag. during trial at an earlier stage. The lower appellate Ct. has, therefore, held that the evidence of the Station Master was of no value. Consequently, it cannot be said that the Station Master corroborates the testimony of P. Ws. 2 & 3 to any conceivable extent.

[7] It is also established by authority that the evidence of one accomplice cannot be used to corroborate the evidence of another accomplice. The danger of acting upon an accomplice's evidence is not merely that the accomplice is on his own admission a man of the bad character who took part in the offence & afterwards to save himself betrayed his former associates; the real danger is that he is telling a story which in its general outline is true, & it is easy for him to work into the story matter which is untrue. The only real safeguard against the risk of condemning the innocent with the guilty lies in insisting upon independent evidence which in some measure implicates each accused. The principle has been clearly stated by the Judicial Committee in Bhuboni Sahu v. The King, A.I.R. (36) 1949 P. C. 257 : (50 Cr. L. J. 872). To the same effect is the decision of the Judicial Committee in Tumahole Berang v. The King, 1949 A. C. 253 in which Lord MacDermott refd. to the cautionary rule of English practice emphasising the danger of acting on an accomplice's evidence which is uncorroborated in some material respect implicating the accused. An accused admits nothing by exercising at his trial the right of electing not to deny the charge on oath, & silence of that kind affords no corroboration to satisfy the cautionary rule of English law as stated above. The Judicial Committee observed that the trial Judge in holding that the rule of practice was satisfied by the non-denial by the applts. of the evidence given by the accomplices incriminating the applts. had misdirected himself as to the nature of the corroboration required by the rule of practice & that for the purposes of the rule of practice the evidence of one accomplice is not corroborative of the evidence of another. Applying this principle to the present case it is manifest that the evidence of P. W. 2 cannot be corroborated by P. W. 3 who is admittedly an accomplice in the crime.

[8] Upon these grounds, I am of opinion that the charges have not been proved against the petnrs. beyond reasonable doubt. Accordingly I would make the rules absolute & set aside the conv ction & sentences imposed upon the petnrs. by the lower Cts. If the petnrs. are in jail they should be released forthwith.

Govt. Appeal No. 3 of 1950, D/- 7-12 1950.

(a) Penal Code (1860), S. 464—'Makes'—Meaning of—(False document—Making of).

Making of a document does not necessarily mean signing or otherwise executing it. It only means creating or bringing into existence. [Para 10]

Anno. Penal Code, S. 464 N. 1.

(b) Evidence Act (1872), S. 24—Retracted confession—(Confession).

Anno. Evi. Act, S. 24 N. 9.

S. C. Chakraverty—for Applt.; Nageshwar Prasad & Padmanand Jha—for Respt.

Ramaswami J.—This appeal is by the Govt. of Bihar against the judgment of Mr. Tribhuwan Nath Singh, Asst. Ses. J of Mozaffarpore, acquitting the resp. of various charges.

[2] The case for the prosecution is that Govt. had established grain godowns in Hajipore sub-division for distribution of grain through multi-purpose co-operative societies. Govt. had appointed certain firms to be in charge of the godowns which were under double locks, one set of keys remaining with the Market Inspector & the other set with the stockists. The Grain Control Officer, Hajipore, used to grant "Store Issue Order" in favour of the said societies after the price of the grain had been deposited in the treasury by chalan. According to the prosecution case the resp. forged Store Issue Order No. 366 dated 18-4 1947 with the intention of cheating Govt. It is said that on 25-4-1947 the resp. presented the Store Issue Order to the Govt. stockist M/s. Khublal Sah Gopal Sah by representing himself to be Rambilas Sharma of Bakatpore Society & thereby dishonestly obtained delivery of 145 maunds of rice worth Rs. 1696/8/0.

[3] The resp. denied all the allegations.

[4] Three out of the four assessors held that the charges were not fully proved. Agreeing with their opinion the learned Judge acquitted the resp.

[5] The prosecution case was based in the main upon a confession made by the resp. on 30-7-1947 before a Mag. Mr. R. D. Narain. The Asst. Ses. J. held that S. 164 (3) had not been complied with & the confession was not admissible in evidence. In support of this appeal, Mr. S. C. Chakravarti contended that the opinion :of the Asst. Ses. J. was erroneous. S. 164 (3) is to the following effect:

"A Mag. shall, before recording any such confession, explain to the person making it that he is not bound to make a confession & that if he does so it may be used as evidence against him, & no Mag. shall record any such confession unless upon questioning the person making it he has reason to believe that it was made voluntarily."

In the present case Mr. R. D. Narain, Mag. when examined in Ct. deposed that he was satisfied that the confession was voluntary. The record of the confession (Ex. 9) also indicates that the Mag. had questioned the resp. in order to satisfy himself that the confession was voluntarily made. The relevant portion of Ex. 9 is reproduced beneath:

Questions.	Answers.
I am a first class Mag. You are not in any way bound to make a statement before me. Any statement which you will make before me shall be used as evidence against you. Do you want to make a voluntary statement or is it caused by pressure or threat by police or any other person? Has any inducement been given to you? Do you want to make a voluntary statement? Do you want to make any statement?	I want to make a voluntary statement. No pressure has been brought to bear upon me & no inducement has been given to me. I belong to a good family. I have committed some mistakes in the company of bad persons which I want to state clearly in the presence of all persons. I shall speak the truth.

Mr. Narain deposed in Ct. that on 30-7-1947 he had warned the resp. & given him 25 minutes' time to reflect. On the previous date, that is, on 29-7-1947 also the Mag. had warned the resp. It is plain from the record of the confession coupled with the oral evidence of the Mag. that

S. 164 (3), Cr. P. C. has been complied with. The learned Asst. Ses. J. did not believe that Mr. Narain gave warning to the resp., on 29-7-1947. But I see no reason why the sworn testimony of Mr. Narain on this point ought not to be accepted as true. Even if no warning had been given by the Mag. to the resp. on 29-7-1947, it is manifest from the evidence that S. 164 (3) has been complied with. The Asst. Ses. J. has refd. to Punia Mallah v. Emperor, A. I. R. (33) 1946 Pat. 169: (48 Cr. L. J. 30) in support of his finding. But the facts of that case must be distinguished. In that case the Mag. who recorded the confession deposed that "he did not give warning to the accused that he was not bound to make a statement & if he did so it might be used as evidence against him."

The H. C. also found upon evidence that no questions were put by the Mag. to satisfy himself that the confession was voluntary. Upon these grounds the H. C. observed that S. 164 (3) was not complied with & the confessional statement was not admissible. In the present case the record of the confessional statement (Ex. 9) clearly shows that the Mag. had given warning to the accused that he was not bound to make statement. The Mag. had further posed several questions to the resp. with a view to ascertain whether the confession was voluntary. The Mag. had questioned as follows:

"Do you want to make a voluntary statement or is it caused by pressure or threat? Has any inducement been given to you or not? Do you want to make a statement?"

To these questions the resp. replied :

"I want to make a voluntary statement. Neither any pressure has been brought to bear upon me nor any inducement has been given to me. I want to make a true statement before you."

Learned counsel for resp. placed reliance upon Baldeo Musehar v. Emperor, A. I. R. (34) 1947 Pat. 281 : (48 Cr. L. J 86) in which the H. C. held that there was a violation of the mandatory provision of S. 164 (3) which made the confession inadmissible in evidence. In that case, however, the column intended for recording questions in the form prescribed contained no questions whatsoever but merely the warning which the Mag. gave to the deponent. The facts of the present case are, as I have indicated, manifestly different. In this context reference should be made to Emperor v. Dubai, A. I. R. (29) 1942 Pat. 113 : (43 Cr. L. J. 90) in which it was argued that the confession was not in accordance with law since S. 164 (3) had been violated. In that case the Mag put only this question to the accused : "If you want to make any statement of your own free will, you may do that". The answer of the accused was "I want to make my statement of my own accord". The learned Mag. put the question "what statement you want to make". The accused thereupon made the confessional statement. Upon these facts, the H. C. held that S. 164 (3) had been complied with & the confession was admissible in evidence. The H. C. refd. with approval to the decision of a F. B. in Ghinua Uraon v. Emperor, 3 Pat. L. J. 291 : (A. I. R. (5) 1918 Pat. 179 : 19 Cr. L J. 135 S. B.) in which Sir Dawson-Miller C. J. states :

"The last objection that the confession was on the face of it bad as it did not disclose all the questions & answers put & received must also fail. No form of questions is prescribed by S. 164 (3) from which the Mag. must satisfy himself that he believes the confession was made voluntarily. The questions recorded as having been put & the answers given as well as the demeanour of the applt. may well have convinced the Mag. that the confession was a voluntary one, & there is no reason to suppose that the recorded statement does not record all the questions put. Moreover, u/s 533 a defect in the compliance with the provisions of S. 164 or S. 364 can be cured by evidence taken by the Ct. before which the confession or statement of the accused person is tendered. In the present case the Mag. was examined by the Ct. & deposed that the statement was recorded as given & that he was satisfied that it was voluntarily made."

In Emperor v. Dubai, A. I. R. (29) 1942 Pat. 113 : (43 Cr. L. J. 90), the learned Judges held that the law had been authoritatively stated in the F. B. case & there was nothing in the subsequent P. C. case Nazir Ahmad v. King Emperor, 63 I. A. 372: (A. I. R. (23) 1936 P. C. 253 : 37 Cr. L. J. 897 P C.) to detract from the authority of the F B case. Reference should also be made to Emperor v. Ramsidh Rai, A. I. R. (25) 1938 Pat. 352 : (39 Cr. L. J. 725) in which the confession was admitted in evidence, Khaja Mohammad Noor J. observing:

"In recording the confession in this case the learned Mag. omitted to put any question to the accused whether he was confessing voluntarily. No doubt the learned Mag. gave him a warning .... but the Cts. before whom the confession is used have materials on which they can be satisfied that the confession was in fact voluntary. In the present case the record does not show that any question was asked by the Mag. in order to ascertain that the confession was made voluntarily. It appears, however, that in giving answer to the warning of the Mag., Jagdish himself stated that he was making the statement voluntarily; & the Magistrate has in his evidence stated that he was satisfied that the confession was voluntary."

In the present case for the reasons already recorded I am of opinion that S. 164 (3) has been complied with, that the confessional statement of the resp. has been voluntarily made & is admissible against the resp.

[6]. Mr. Nageshwar Prasad, however, stressed the argument that there was material to indicate that the resp. has not given a true account of the facts in the confessional statement. Learned counsel pointed out that in Ex. 9 the resp. admitted that after forging the Store Issue Order he had gone to Mehnar & negotiated with Bhagwan Lal & Gopalji for its sale; that Gopalji did not deliver any rice but handed a sum of about Rs 2,100 to the resp. who made over the amount to Rajindra Babu. According to the confession Bhagwan Lal was, therefore, an accomplice in the conspiracy to cheat the Govt. But Bhagwan Lal deposed that he did not know the resp. from before, that on 25-4-1947 the resp. had produced the Store Issue Order & thereupon Bhagwan Lal delivered 145 maunds of rice. Rit Lal (P. W. 1), Kodai Mahto (P. W. 2) & Ramdeo Mahto (P. W. 3) also deposed that they were cartmen whom the resp. had engaged for carrying the rice to Mehnar pethia. It is true that there is a conflict between the prosecution evidence & the confessional statement. But for the reasons which will be shortly stated I am of opinion that the prosecution case in this respect is not true, that in the confessional statement the resp. has given a true account of the manner in which he sold the Store Issue Order to Bhagwan & Gopal Sah.

[7] There are indeed important circumstances which corroborate the confessional statement. In the first place there is evidence that Babu Ramanand Sinha accompanied by the Market Inspector had raided the godown of Khublal Sah & Gopal Sah on 17-7-1947 & seized the Store Issue Order No. 366 dated 18-4-1947 from the premises. The recovery of this document from the godown of Khublal Sah & Gopal Sah is an important circumstance which confirms the confession of the resp. that he had forged the Store Issue Order & had gone to Mehnar & sold it to Bhagwan Lal & Gopalji. In the second place, there is the significant fact that on 29-7-1947 at about 2 P. M. Inspector Jagdish Pandey searched the person of the resp. after the latter's arrest & seized EX. I, a booklet containing blank Store Issue Orders. The Inspector prepared a seizure list (EX. 4) which has been signed by two witnesses, Udit Narain Choudhury & Saligram Singh. The booklet contains signature or initials of "R. Prasad" on the first 16 or 17 pages. The evidence of the Inspector Jagdish Pandey is supported by Markandey Jha (P. W. 7) who has deposed to the same effect. Mr. Nageshwar Prasad contended that it was improbable that the resp. should be moving about at the time alleged with store issue order booklet. The argument is plausible, but it is impossible to accept it. For I hold that the direct evidence adduced for the prosecution with respect to this incident is reliable & unshaken. The recovery of the booklet of Store Issue Order (EX. I) is a very material circumstance which corroborates the confession made by the resp.

[8] On behalf of the resp. Mr. Nageshwar Prasad contended that the confession having been retracted no weight should be attached to it even against the person making it. Authority for this contention is sought in Queen Empress v. Rangi, 10 Mad. 295, a case which on difference between two judges was decided in accordance with the opinion of a third judge. The authority of the case is doubtful for it does not appear to have been folld. in later cases of the same H C., e. g. Queen Empress v. Raman, 21 Mad. 83 or Kesava Pillai v. Emperor, A. I. R. (16) 1929 Mad. 837 : (31 Cr. L. J. 768). As far back as Queen v. Jhurree, 7 W. R. Cr. 41, it was held that a voluntary & genuine confession of the prisoner is legal & sufficient proof of guilt & this decision has never been overd. though it has sometimes been said that the rule of prudence is in favour of seeking corroboration of a confession which has been retracted. The view taken accords with the decision of this Ct. in Guja Majhi v. King, 2 Pat. L. J. 80 : (A. I. R. (4) 1917 Pat 247 : 18 Cr. L. J. 445). In that case the only evidence given during the trial to connect the accused with the act of murder with which they were charged, was their own confessions contained in statements voluntarily made by them u/s. 164, Cr. P. C., which confessions were retracted before the trial commenced. Upon these facts the learned Judges held that the confessions were admissible in evidence against the accused & that the latter were properly convicted & sentenced of the charge of murder. The point, however, does not arise in the present case for as I have already shown there is sufficient corroboration of the confessional statement of the resp. by independent evidence.

[9] As regards the charges u/ss. 468 & 471, I. P. C., the primary evidence consists of the confessional statement of the resp., the material portion of which is to the following effect :

"Subsequently, in the month of April Rajindar Babu again got a blank store order for 145 maunds of rice in the name of K G., Mehnar filled up by me & after that he forged the signature of G. C. O by his own pen & handed it over to me to be taken to Mehnar. I went to Mehnar after a day or two & visited the godown of Gopalji where Bhagwan Lal & Gopalji were sitting. I negotiated with them to sell it. Gopalji asked Bhagwan Lal to settle the matter with me. Thereafter, Bhagwan Lal asked me to sell it by hunda sale. After that, I told Bhagwan Lal that I would make over the store order to him only after making a note of full delivery on it & that I would not take the delivery. He said that in that case I should pay money to him to be paid to the person who would be produced before the Marketting Officer. For this purpose he deducted the sum of Rs. 500 (rupees five hundred) (from my account). Thereafter, Gopalji gave me the sum of about Rs. 2100. I left the place & handed over the entire amount to Rajindar Babu."

This part of the confessional statement is, as I have already shown, corroborated by the seizure of the document (EX. I) from the premises of the firm Khublal Sah Gopal Sah at Mehnar. There is in addition the significant circumstance that on 17-7-1947 EX. I was seized from the person of the resp. after he was arrested. It is important to notice that the booklet contained blank forms, of which p. 17 contained the apparent signature or initial of "R. Prasad," who was Grain Control Officer at that time. Upon the evidence I am of opinion that the charges u/ss. 468 & 471, I. P. C. have been established against the resp.

[10] Mr. Nageshwar Prasad stressed the argument that even if the resp. had filled up the columns of the Store Issue Order there was no evidence to the effect that the resp. had forged the signature of R. Prasad therein, that therefore as a matter of law the Ct. ought not to hold that the offence of forgery was committed by the resp. Learned counsel reld. upon In the matter of the petn. of Riasat Ali, 7 Cal. 352 : (8 C. L. R. 572) in which Garth C. J. stated :

"The 'making' of a document, or part of a document, does not mean 'writing' or 'printing' it, but signing or otherwise executing it; as in legal phrase we speak of 'making an indenture' or 'making a promissory note,' by which is not meant the writing out of the form of the instrument but the sealing or signing it as a deed or note. The fact that the word 'makes' is used in the section in conjunction with the words 'signs,' or 'seals' 'executes,' or makes any mark 'denoting the execution, &c.,' seems to me very clearly to denote that this is its true meaning. What constitutes a false document, or part of a document, is not the writing of any number of words which in themselves are innocent, but the affixing the seal or signature of some person to the document, or part of a document, knowing that the seal or signature is not his, & that he gave no authority to affix it. In other words, the falsity consists in the document, or part of a document, being signed or sealed with the name or seal of a person who did not in fact sign or seal it."

But the authority of this case is weak. It has been dissented from in Emperor v. Krishtappa Khandappa, 27 Bom. L. R. 599 : (A. I. R. (12) 1925 Bom. 327 : 26 Cr. L. J. 1014) in which a reference was made by the learned Chief Justice to the definition of a document in S. 29 of the Code which has not been considered in the Calcutta case. In my opinion, the word 'makes' in S. 464 does not mean anything other than 'makes,' that is to say, creates or brings into existence. This opinion is consistent with illustration (c) to S. 464 which is to the following effect :

"A picks up a cheque on a banker signed by B, payable to bearer, but without any sum having been inserted in the cheque. A fraudulently fills up the cheque by inserting the sum of ten thousand rupess. A commits forgery."

Reference may also be made to the English case Queen v. Batmar (1845) 1 Cox. C C. 186 in which a party received a blank cheque signed, with directions to fill in a certain amount, & to appropriate the instrument to a certain purposes, but the party fraudulently filled in a different amount, & devoted the cheque to other purposes. It was held that forgery was committed. Erle J. stated:

"If a cheque is given to a person with a certain authority, the agent is confined strictly within the limits of that authority & if he chooses to alter it, the crime of forgery is committed. If the blank cheque was delivered to him with a limited authority to complete it & he filled it up with an amount different from the one he was directed to insert & if, after the authority was at an end he filled it up with any amount whatever, that too would be clearly forgery."

In the present case I am of opinion that the resp. committed forgery by filling in the blank columns in the Store Issue Order which he knew was signed not by R. Prasad but by Rajindar who forged the signature of "R. Prasad" therein. According to the confession the resp. had sold the forged order to Bhagwan Lal & Gopalji for a sum of Rs. 2,100. In my opinion this part of the confession has been corroborated & must be accepted as true. It follows that the resp. is guilty of the charge u/s. 468 & of the charge u/s. 471, I. P. C.

[11] As regards the charges u/ss. 419 & 420 I. P. C. the matter is somewhat different. Bhagwan Lal deposed that on 25-4-1947 the resp. produced the Store Issue Order & obtained delivery of 145 maunds of rice on account of Bakatpore Multipurpose Co operative Society. Bhagwan Lal said that he did not know the accused in dock from before. According to the witness the Market Inspector Shambhunath Choubey was present when the rice was delivered. It is significant that the Marketting Inspector has not been examined on behalf of the prosecution. It is admitted by the Police Inspector (P. W. 12) that in case No. 12 of July 1947, Bhagwan Lal & Gopal Sah were accused along with Shambhunath Choubey, Marketing Inspector. This circumstance throws doubt on the evidence of Bhagwan Lal. I am inclined to think that Bhagwan Lal was in the conspiracy to cheat Govt., that the resp. had produced the forged Store Issue Order before Bhagwan but no actual delivery of rice was made to the resp. but the latter was given a sum of money as illegal profit. This conclusion is supported by the admissions of the three cartmen (P Ws. 1 to 3). These witnesses were examined for the prosecution to prove that on 25 4-1947 the respt. had conveyed the bags of rice on bullockcart to Mehnar pethia. P. W. 1 denied in Ct. that Bhagwan Lal had engaged the cart. But before the police he admitted that Bhagwan Lal engaged his cart. P. W. 2 similarly deposed that the resp. had engaged the cart, Bhagwan Lal was not even present in the Gola at the time the cart was engaged. Before the police, however, the witness had stated that Bhagwan Lal had engaged the carts. P W. 3 likewise denied in Ct. that Bhagwan Lal engaged the cart but before police he made a contradictory statement. All the cartmen admitted that it was not a pothia day & so the learned Judge rightly held that it was improbable that the bags of rice should have been taken to Mehnar pethia & stocked under a pipal tree on a day on which no bazar was held. For these reasons, the story of Bhagwan Lal that he had delivered the rice to the resp. after the Store Issue Order was presented cannot be accepted as true. But it is manifest that the evidence of Bhagwan Lal supports the confessional statement of the resp. that on the alleged date the latter had presented the forged Store Issue Order. If Bhagwan Lal had known the resp. from before, if he was cognizant of the fact that the Store Issue Order was forged, if he had conspired with the resp. & other persons to cheat the Govt. it is impossible to hold that the charges u/ss. 419 & 420, I. P. C. as framed by the lower Ct. have been established against the resp. In my opinion the lower Ct. has rightly acquitted the resp. of these two charges.

[12] But for reasons already recorded I would set aside the judgment of the lower Ct. & convict the resp. of the charges u/ss. 468 & 471, I. P. C. & sentence him to rigorous imprisonment for a period of three years on each of these charges. The sentences of imprisonment will be concurrent.

[13] I would accordingly allow this appeal.

Bhabananda Mukherji—for Petnr.; Sudhir Chandra Ghosh—for Opp Party.

Order.—This is an appln. by the petnr. who was the second party to a proceeding u/s. 144, Cr. P. C. before Mr. G. V. Lele, Mag. first class, Purulia. The proceeding was started in connection with the breach of the peace concerning the possession of plot Nos. 1101 & 1093 of village Brojopur. Proceedings were started on a police report dated 26-6-1950. On 30-6-1950, the learned Mag. issued notices to both the parties forbidding them not to go upon the land. After they had both filed their show-cause petns. he heard the parties & passed an orderon 22-7-1950, in the following words:

"I find the second party in possession, make the order dated 30-6-50 absolute against the first party & rescind it as against the 2nd party."

[2] The first party thereafter moved the Dy. Comr. of Manbhum under the provisions of S. 144, sub-cl. (4), Criminal P. C. The learned Dy. Comr., however, set aside the order of the Mag. & substituted the following order in its place:

"In the result the order of the learned lower Ct. is set aside & the appeal is allowed. The order u/s. 144, Cr. P. C. is modified. It will be in force against the opposite party."

[3] Mr. Mukherji on behalf of the petnr. urges that the order of the learned Dy. Comr. of Manbhum is without jurisdiction. According to him he had no jurisdiction to order rescinding the second party from going near the land, because the words of sub cl. (4) of S. 144 do not authorize him to pass that order. He contended that the words "rescind or alter any order made under this section' mean rescinding or altering the order passed against the party by the Mag. It does not authorise the Dy. Comr. to pass an order against the present petnr. as he has done in the present case. In support of his contention he relies upon the case of Ganpat Singh v. Emperor, 3 Pat. L. J. 287: (A. I. R. (5) 1918 Pat. 672: 19 Cr. L. J. 880), where a D. B. of this Ct. held that the Mag. cannot substitute an order of his own forbidding the successful party before the first Ct. from going near the land or exercising a right of possession. He also reld. upon the case of Sevugan v. Karuppan, A. I. R (24) 1937 Mad. 487: (38 Cr. L. J. 864) & also on an unreported case of Dewan Singh v. Deo Narain Singh, Cr. Revn. No. 737 of 1950, decided by Ramaswami J. on 28-8-1950: (A. I. R. (38) 1951 Pat. 253).

[4] On behalf of the opposite party, the judgment reported in Ganpat Singh's case, 3 Pat. L. J. 287: (A. I. R. (5) 1918 Pat. 672: 19 Cr. L. J. 880) is sought to be distd. on the ground that in that case initial notices had not been issued against both the parties; it had been issued against only one of the parties, the Mag. exercising his power u/s. 144 sub-cl. (4), Cr. P. C. wanted to make the rule absolute against that party which had not been even asked to show cause. In this case he submitted that the initial notices had been issued against both the parties & both of them had an opportunity to show cause. In this connection he also refd. to the case of Panchkesar Kuar v. Madho Singh, 1938 P. W. N. 709), laying down the same proposition of law as is laid down in the case of Ganpat Singh v. Emperor, 3 P. L. J. 287: (A. I. R. (5) 1918 Pat. 672: 19 Cr. L. J. 880). Mr. Ghosh appearing for the opposite party also refd. to the case of Manu Khan v. Sundar Singh, 15 P. T. L. 216: (A. I. R. (21) 1934 Pat. 313) where a D. B. of this Ct. had refused to interfere with an order passed by a Mag. u/s. 144, sub-cl. (4), Cr P. C., altering the order passed by the first Ct. & substituting another order of himself. Though the facts & circumstances of that case are not on all fours with the facts & circumstances of the present case, the principle of law enunciated in that case, according to him, supports his contention.

[5] In the present case, I find that the notices were issued on 30-6-1950 & the order has spent its force by this date. Though there are several decisions of this Ct. wherein it has been held that this Ct. has power to interfere even if the order has spent its force, yet in the facts & circumstances of the present case I am not inclined to do so. It may be noted that the order passed u/s. 144, Cr. P. C., is a sort of temporary measure to prevent the breach of the peace. It has been repeatedly held by this Ct. that the order has no evidentiary value on the question of possession. In the present case neither the order passed by the first Ct. nor that of the learned Dy. Comr. can be used as evidence of possession whenever the question of possession has to be decided in future.

[6] In the circumstances of the present case it is fit & proper that if any subsequent dispute crops up, the Mag. will be well advised to start proceedings u/s. 145, Cr. P. C. to effectively decide the question of possession of one party or the other on legal evidence led in the case.

[7] With these observations the petn. is rejected.

SHEARER, REUBEN AND DASS JJ.

Kameshwar Singh and others, Pltfs.-Petnrs. v. The State of Bihar and another, Opp. Party.

Title Suits Nos. 1 to 3 of 1951 with Misc. Judicial Cases Nos. 230 to 234, 237 to 244, 246 to 254, 257, 261 to 264, 266, 268, 270 to 277, 287 to 290 & 297 of 1950, D/- 12-3-1951.

✠(a) Bihar Land Reforms Act (30 of 1950), Pre. — Subject-matter of Act whether within legislative powers of State — Const. Ind., Art. 246 (3), Sch. VII, List II, Entry 36.

Per Special Bench: The subject-matter of the Bihar Land Reforms Act, 1950 is within the legislative jurisdiction of the Bihar Legislature. The Act is covered by Entries 36 of List II and 42 of List III in Sch. VII, Const. Ind. It is therefore, not 'ultra vires' of the Legislative powers of the State Legislature so far as the subject matter of Legislation is concerned. (Paras 16, 62, 82)

✠(b) Bihar Land Reforms Act (30 of 1950), Pre. — Validity of Act — Const. Ind., Arts. 14, 31 (1) and 31 (2).

Per Special Bench: The Bihar Land Reforms Act, 1950, is unconstitutional and void as it contravenes the provisions of Art. 14, Const. Ind. (Paras 16, 62, 106)

Per Shearer, J: Art. 31 (4) does not debar the Ct. from entering into the question of compensation in order to decide whether or not the Bihar Act offends against Art. 14. (Para 16)

Per Reuben and Das, JJ: The assent of the President under Cl. (4) of Art. 31 protects the Act from challenge on the ground that it contravenes the provision of Cl. (2) of that Article; it does not protect the Act from attack on a ground not arising under Cl. (2), Art. 31. (Paras 62, 108)

Per Reuben, J: There can be no challenge regarding the adequacy of the compensation or the correctness of the principles prescribed by the Act for determining the compensation or of the manner in which that Act directs that the compensation is to be given. The assent of the President under Art. 31 (4) does not protect the Act if there is no provision for compensation. (Para 62)

(c) Bihar Land Reforms Act (30 of 1950), Pre. — Nature of Act — Const. Ind., Sch. VII, List II, Entry 36.

Per Shearer, J: The Act is not in the nature of a tax law. It cannot be regarded as a law imposing a levy on capital. (Para 12)

Per Das, J: In its true nature, scope and effect, the Act is acquisition of property in the sense that it transfers to the State the entire or totality of interests of proprietors and tenure-holders in land and of the mtgees. and lessees of such interests, even though such transference be part of a general scheme of land reform or a stage in the evolution of a new system of land tenure: it is still acquisition of property, though different from acquisition 'simpliciter'. (Para 75)

(d) Const. Ind., Art. 14 — "Equal protection of the laws" — Class legislation is forbidden but not classification.

Per Reuben and Das, JJ: The guarantee of the equal protection of the laws means the protection of equal laws. It forbids class legislation, but does not forbid classification which rests upon reasonable grounds of distinction: it merely requires that all persons subjected to such legislation shall be treated alike under like circumstances and conditions both in the privileges conferred and in the liabilities imposed. Mathematical nicety and perfect equality are not required, and one who assails classification must carry the burden of showing that it does not rest upon any reasonable basis. A I R (38) 1951 S C 41, Rel on. (Paras 42, 98)

Per Reuben, J: Classification is permissible, but it must be on a principle which bears some relation to the object sought to be attained. The object of the Bihar Land Reforms Act, 1950, is the giving of compensation, that is, something which will represent the value in money of the property that is being acquired. It is not a reasonable classification which assesses that value at twenty times the net income in the case of the poor man and three times in the case of the rich man. The principle of progressive taxation does not apply to compensation for land acquired. (Para 53)

Per Reuben, J: If the Ct. is satisfied that there is no public purpose in the acquisition of property forming the subject-matter of an Act, the assent of the President cannot save the legislation. (Para 33)

(f) Const. Ind., Art. 31 (2) — "Public purpose" — Meaning of.

Per Reuben and Das, JJ.: Taking into consideration Entries 33 of the Union List, 36 of the State List and 42 of the concurrent List, the intention of the Constitution appears to be to give the term "public purpose" a wide and comprehensive meaning. Therefore, acquisition for a purpose of the Union or for a purpose of a State is acquisition for a public purpose. So also is the nationalization of land. (Paras 37, 40, 89)

(g) Const. Ind., Art. 31 (2) and Govt. of India Act, 1935, S. 299 (2) compared — "For compensation" and "for the payment of compensation".

Per Shearer, J.: Cl. (2), Art. 31, Const. Ind. substantially reproduces sub-s. (2), S. 299, Govt. of Ind. Act, 1935. However, the substitution of the words "for compensation" in Cl. (2) for the words "for the payment of compensation in sub-s. (2) indicates that compensation may now be given not in money, but in bonds, or possibly, in land, the reason being that when large numbers of individuals are to be expropriated under a scheme of land reform it may be impossible to compensate them in money, and that when large numbers of cultivators are to be expropriated in order that land may be taken for such a public purpose as the construction of a dam it may be in their own interest to receive land elsewhere rather than money. (Para 4)

(h) Const. Ind., Art. 31 (2) — Compensation — What it should be.

Per Shearer, J.: Although, under the Constitution compensation need not necessarily be in money, nevertheless, whatever compensation is made, it should be something which could fairly be said to be equivalent in value to the property taken over by the State. (Para 9)

Per Reuben, J.: Compensation represents the money value of the property acquired. It is usual to give the owner something more than the value of the property by way of a solatium for the compulsory nature of the acquisition. The use of the word "compensation", is to be taken in the accepted sense as representing the money value of the property. The giving of compensation for property compulsorily acquired was consd. to be of sufficient importance to be guaranteed by a provision in the Part of the Constitution dealing with Fundamental Rights. It does not appear likely that the Constituent Assembly would by that very provision empower the Legislature to give as compensation such amount as it thinks proper without any reference to the real value of the property acquired. (Para 50)

(i) Const. Ind., Art. 31 (2) and (4), Sch. VII, List II, Entry 36 and List III, Entry 42 — Power of Legislature to legislate for acquisition without legislating for compensation — Cl. (2) whether "provision" within meaning of Cl. (4), Art. 31.

Per Reuben, J.: The legislative heads contained in Entry 36 of the State List and Entry 42 of the Concurrent List empower the Legislature to pass laws relating to the subject-matter contained therein without placing any restrictions on the powers of the Legislature within the limits of those heads. As these entries stand, it would be open to the Legislature to legislate for acquisition without at the same time legislating about compensation. The limitation which makes provision about compensation essential is imposed by Cl. (2) of Art. 31 read with Cl. (2), Art. 13. This requirement is, therefore, a "provision" of Cl. (2), Art. 31 coming within the meaning of that word used in Art. 31 (4) and (6). (Para 29)

(j) Const. Ind., Art. 31 (2) — Provision in enactment laying down principles of compensation whether justiciable by Ct.

Per Reuben, J.: The power given to the Legislature to legislate with regard to the principles on which compensation for the property acquired is to be determined does not make the matter of compensation non-justifiable. The fact that this matter has been included in Part III of the Constitution and that it has been thought necessary to provide protection to such legislation under Cls. (4) and (6) of Art. 31 shows that the matter was intended to be justiciable. What Cl. (2) requires is provision for compensation and the Cts. are entitled to enquire, subject to Cl. (4), whether the payment for which the impugned legislation provides is "compensation" within the meaning of this clause. (Para 51)

But an investigation of the question whether the sums determined by the principles laid down in the Bihar Land Reforms Act are compensation or not is an investigation which the Ct. is precluded from making by reason of the assent under Cl. (4), Art. 31 of the Constitution. (Para 60)

(k) Const. Ind., Art. 31 (4) — "Reserved for the consideration of the President" — Object of reservation of bill.

Per Shearer, J.: The reservation of bills for the assent of a higher authority is not a mere matter of procedure. It is an essential and important part of the law-making machinery set up by the Constitution. When bill is reserved for the consideration of the President it is the duty of the law Officers to examine it with a view to ascertaining whether, in the first place, it is unconstitutional in whole or in part, and, secondly, whether, if assent is given to the bill the differences between the law obtaining in the State to which the bill applies and the law obtaining in other provinces will be merely differences in point of detail rather than in principle. (Para 14)

(l) Const. Ind., Art. 31 (4) — Assent of President to reserved bill — Propriety of, if can be questioned.

Per Shearer, J.: The broad principles on which assent is intended to be given to, or withheld from, a reserved bill are not specifically laid down in the Constitution. The result of this is that it is not open to the Cts. to question the propriety of the President's action. (Para 15)

(m) Const. Ind., Art. 31 (4) — Construction of.

Per Das, J.: Cl. (4), Art. 31 seeks to cut down a fundamental right and must be construed strictly. The words "notwithstanding anything in this Constitution" occurring in that clause cannot have the effect of enlarging the operative portion of the clause which, in clear terms, mentions one and one ground only, namely, the ground arising out of the contravention of the provisions of Cl. (2), Art. 31. (Para 107)

(n) Const. Ind., Art. 31 (4) — "Bill pending at the commencement" — Identity between bill and Act.

Per Reuben, J.: Cl. (4), Art. 31 does not require that the Act as passed as State Legislature must be identical in every detail with the bill that was pending at the commencement of the Constitution. There may be alterations during the passage of the bill; but these alterations should not be such as to make the Act distinguishable from the bill which was pending. (Para 22)

(o) Const. Ind., Art. 31 (4) — "Law" meaning of.

Per Reuben, J.: The word "Law" in Art. 31 (4) seems to have been used as a compendious way of describing legislation which has passed through the Legislature of a State and has not yet received assent. The protection given by Art. 34 (4) assumes that the "law" is open to attack and therefore is not law in the strict sense. (Para 34)

Per Das, J.: The word "law" in Art. 31 does not appear to have been used exactly in the same sense in all the clauses; the context makes that quite clear. In Cl. (1), Art. 31, the expression "law" means a valid law. (Para 97)

✠ (p) Const. Ind., Art. 246 — State Legislature whether acts as agent of Parliament — 'Delegatus non potest delegare' — Applicability of.

Per Special Bench: The maxim 'delegatus non potest delegare' has no application to sovereign legislative bodies under the written constitution. Within the limits of their jurisdiction the State Legislatures have plenary powers. The conferment of the power on the State Legislatures to make laws for the State and for State purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in the lists of Sch. VII is not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Parliament. Within these limits of subjects and area the State Legislatures are supreme and have the same authority as the Parliament. (1883) 9 A C 117; 4 Cal 172 (P C), Rel. on.

The Bihar Land Reforms Act (30 of 1950), though it leaves by its provisions contained in S. 32 (2) read with S. 43 (1) (p) a fairly wide discretionary power to the State Govt. in the matter of form and manner of compensation, settles the legislative policy, lays down the limits of the discretion but confides to the State Govt. certain powers to carry out the details of the objects of the enactment. The Act is not, therefore, invalid on the ground of delegated legislation. (Paras 13,, 59, 112, 113)

(q) Const. Ind., Art. 246 — Affirmative and negative power of Legislature.

Per Das, J.: The power of the Legislature to legislate on a subject, particularly in a written federal constitution where there must be a nice balance of jurisdiction, can be looked at from two points of view — affirmative and negative. The conferment of the power is the affirmative aspect; a restraint or restriction on the exercise of the power is the negative aspect. The limitation on the power of legislation may arise by reason of restrictions imposed within the entry which confers the powers; and when the question of exceeding such a restriction arises, it is relevant to consider the true nature and character of the legislation. (Para 74)

(r) Const. Ind., Sch. VII, List II, Entry 18 — Scope of.

Per Shearer, J.: Legislation regarding land acquisition does not come within the general Entry 18 of List II. (Para 21)

(s) Const. Ind., Sch. VII, List II, Entry 36 — "Subject to the provisions of Entry 42" — Meaning and construction.

Per Shearer, J.: The words "subject to the provisions of Entry 42 of List III" which occur at the end of Entry 36 of List II indicate the existence of a condition or restriction on the power of the State Legislature. When a State Legislature ignores that condition or restriction, its purported law is a nullity. But the condition or restriction is not imposed by the concluding words in the entry. It is really imposed by Cl. (2), Art. 31. (Para 7)

Per Reuben, J.: The words "subject to" have the effect of excluding from the legislative power under Entry 36 in the State List, matters covered by Entry 42 of the Concurrent List. This interpretation is consistent with the meaning of this term in Entries 17, 22, 23, 24 and 33 of the State List and a similar limitation on the powers of the State Legislature seems to be imposed in entries Nos. 11, 26, 27 and 57 of the State List. (Para 25)

Per Das, J.: The expression "subject to" means that principles of compensation, etc. which have to be laid down for compulsory acquisition of property by reason of the provisions in Part III of the Constitution relate to and are a matter within the concurrent field of legislation, and a law relating thereto made by a State will attract the operation of Art. 254 of the Constitution. Chakravarty and B. B. Saran, for the State.

SHEARER, J: On 9-5-1950, the Bihar Land Reforms Act, XXX (30) of 1950, having passed through the Legislative Assembly & the Legislative Council, was reserved by the Governor for the consideration of the President The President assented to the Act on 11-9-1950. On 24-9-1950, the Govt. of Bihar issued a Notfn. u/s. 1 (3) of the Act declaring that on the day following the estates & tenures of three leading 'zamindars' in the province, namely, Sir Kameshwar Singh, the Maharajadhiraja of Darbhanga, his brother Raja Bahadur Visheshwar Singh & Raja Bahadur Kamakshya Narayan Singh of Ramgarh, should pass to & become vested in the State. These three 'zamindars' at once gave notice u/s. 80, Civil P. C. of their intention to institute suits & also applied to this Ct. for an injunction to restrain the Govt. of Bihar from taking possession of their property. 'Ad interim' injunctions were granted, &, in due course, suits were instituted & were withdrawn to be tried by this Ct. in the exercise of its extraordinary original civil jurisdiction. The applns. have been heard along with the suits as also have a number of similar applns. made by other 'zamindars', who apprehend that notfn. may issue declaring that their estates & tenures also shall pass to, & become vested in, the State. The following issues in the suits were framed:

"1. Is the Bihar Land Reforms Act XXX (30) of 1950, 'ultra vires' the legislative powers of the State of Bihar?

2. Is the said Act unconstitutional, unreasonable, inoperative & void for the reasons mentioned in para 5 of the plaint or any of them?

3. Have the properties of the pltf. vested in the State of Bihar under the said Act? If so, have they so vested under the authority of law?

4. Can any question regarding compensation or principles for the determination & giving of compensation be raised in this suit in view of the assent of the President under Cl. (4), Art. 31 of the Constitution?

5. Is the pltf. entitled to any of the reliefs prayed for?"

It will be convenient to deal with these issues together as, in effect, two points only are raised, namely, whether the Bihar Land Reforms Act, 1950, is or is not a constitutional law, &, if it is not a constitutional law, whether this Ct. is, by reason of Art. 31 (4) of the Constitution, disentitled to pronounce it to be unconstitutional, & to give the pltfs. the reliefs for which they ask.

(2) It is not necessary to set out in any detail the provisions of the impugned Act. The Act is described in the preamble as an Act

"to provide for the transference to the State of the interests of proprietors & tenure-holders in land & of the mtgees. & lessees of such interests including interests in trees, forests, fisheries, jalkars, ferries, hats, bazars, mines & minerals."

It is enough for our present purpose to say that certain rights of proprietors & tenure-holders are to be extinguished, & other rights are to be modified. The rent payable by 'raiyats' to the proprietors of estates or the holders of tenures, is in future to be paid to the State, & not to the proprietors or tenure-holders, this right of the latter being wholly extinguished. Proprietors & tenure-holders are, on the other hand, to be permitted to continue in possession of their homesteads, their 'zerat' & other agricultural or horticultural land actually cultivated by them, of any 'golas', factories or mills situated on their property & belonging to them, & of any mines which they themselves are working. They are to hold their homesteads free of rent, but are to be assessed to a fair & equitable rent so far as any other land of which they are permitted to continue in possession is concerned. Similarly, if they themselves are actually working any mines & are permitted to continue to do so, they must take a lease from the State, the terms of which are either to be settled by agreement or are to be determined by a Mines Tribunal. Any mines which are not being worked by the proprietors or tenure-holders themselves, but by their lessees, are to vest in the State, & the lessees are, except in certain circumstances, to be granted leases by the State. Compensation is to be given to proprietors & tenure-holders who are expropriated, & to these provisions in the Act I will refer in some detail later. Generally speaking, therefore, it may be said that the purpose of the Act is to substitute a 'raiyatwari' for a 'zamindari' system of land tenure, or, alternatively, to prevent any individual from deriving an income, which is an unearned income, from land, & to ensure that the whole of the land in the State shall belong to, & be in the possession of, the persons who actually cultivate it.

(3) The Const. Ind. recognises the inviolability of private property except in so far as the property of an individual may be required for the purposes of the Union or State or for some other public purpose, in which case compensation must be paid, in order that the individual expropriated may not be compelled to contribute to expenditure incurred by the State more than any other citizen does. Otherwise private property is sacr anct. To this, however, there is one important exception, namely, land or rather certain rights in land. The British Parliament, in enacting the Govt. of India Act, 1935, also recognised that land did not stand on precisely the same footing as other kinds of property. Sub-s (1) of S. 299, Govt. of India Act, 1935, embodied the general principle that no person should be deprived of his property save by authority of law. Sub-s. (2) provided that when property, or property of certain descriptions, belonging to an individual was taken over for public purposes compensation had to be paid. Sub-s. (3) dealt with bills

"making provision for the transference to public ownership of any land, or for the extinguishment or modification of rights therein, including rights or privileges in respect of land revenue."

When a comparatively small parcel of land belonging to an individual or to a small number of individuals is acquired for public purposes there is ordinarily no great difficulty either in determining the market-value of the land or in compensating the individual or individuals expropriated in money. When, however, some far-reaching scheme of land reform is undertaken, involving the extinguishment or modification of rights in land belonging to a great number of private individuals, it must necessarily be a matter of greatest difficulty, both to determine what is adequate compensation & to pay such compensation immediately, & in money. It is one thing to expropriate an individual, & it is quite another to expropriate an entire class of individuals, & legislation which has as its aim the latter object may have to be based on principles somewhat different to those underlying legislation which has as its aim the former object. That this was recognised by the British Parliament, & that it quite deliberately dealt in Sub-ss. (2) & (3), S. 299, Govt. of India Act in a very different manner with what it considered to be very different subjects of legislation is made clear by what is contained in para. 369 of the Report of the Joint Committee on Indian Constitutional Reforms. This is as follows:

"369. We think that some general provision should be inserted in the Constitution Act safeguarding private property against expropriation, in order to quiet doubts which have been aroused in recent years by certain Indian utterances. It is obviously difficult to frame any general provision with this object without unduly restricting the powers of the Legislature in relation particularly to taxation; in fact, much the same difficulties would be presented as those which we have discussed above in relation to fundamental rights. We do not attempt to define with precision the scope of the provision we have in mind, the drafting of which will require careful consideration for the reasons we have indicated; but we think that it should secure that legislation expropriating, or authorising the expropriation of, the property of particular individuals should be lawful only if confined to expropriation for public purposes & if compensation is determined, either in the first instance or on appeal by some independant authority. General legislation, on the other hand, the effect of which would be to transfer to public ownership some particular class of property, or to extinguish or modify the rights of individuals in it, ought, we think, to require the previous sanction of the Governor General or Governor (as the case may be) to its introduction; & in that event he should be directed by his Instrument of Instructions to take into account as a relevant factor the nature of the provisions proposed for compensating those whose interests will be adversely affected by the legislation."

(4) It will be seen that Sub-s. (3), S. 299 provided that no such bill or amendment as was refd. to in it should be "introduced or moved in either Chamber of the Federal Legislature without the previous sanction of the Governor-General in his discretion or in a Chamber of a Provincial Legislature without the previous sanction of the Governor in his discretion." Para. XVII of the Instrument of Instructions to the Governor forbade him to assent in His Majesty's name to "any bill which would alter the character of the Permanent Settlement" & required him to reserve it for the consideration of the Governor-General. At the same time the Governor was instructed not to withhold his sanction to the introduction of the bill, the object of this being, no doubt, to ensure that the merits or demerits of the bill should be fully discussed in the Legislature. Para XXVII of the Instrument of Instructions to the Governor-General similarly forbade the Governor-General to assent to "any bill passed by a Provincial Legislature & reserved for his consideration which would alter the character of the Permanent Settlement" & directed him to reserve it for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure. From a very early period in the history of the British Colonial Empire it was the practice for instructions to be issued to Colonial Governors requiring them to reserve bills passed by Colonial Legislatures for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure. Ss. 55 & 57, British North America Act, 1867, & Ss. 58 & 60, Commonwealth of Australian Constitution Act, 1900, made it obligatory on the Governor-General in certain cases to withhold his assent to legislation & made provision as to the circumstances in which such legislation should or should not take effect. The reason why this constitutional machinery was invented was to ensure that colonial legislation should not be such as to conflict with legislation by the British Parliament or to endanger imperial interests or lead to international complications. In enacting Sub-s. (3), S. 299, Govt. of India Act, 1935, & in issuing the instructions to the Governor-General & to Governors of Provinces to which I have refd., the British Parliament was making use of this constitutional machinery for another & somewhat different purpose, namely, to ensure that, if the Permanent Settlement was abolished or substantially altered, it should only be on conditions which were not unfair to the successors-in-interest of the persons with whom in 1793 the British Govt. had entered into a contract or agreement. Cl. (1), Art. 31 of the Constitution reproduces Sub-s. (1) of S. 299, Govt. of India Act, 1935. Cl. (2) of the Article substantially reproduces Sub-s. (2), S. 299. It is true that under Cl. (2) property of any kind may now be acquired or requisitioned by the State, & it is also true that the substitution of the words "for compensation" for the words "for the payment of compensation" indicates that compensation may now be given not in money, but in bonds, or possibly, in land, the reason, no doubt, being that when large numbers of individuals are to be expropriated under a scheme of land reform it may be impossible to compensate them in money, & that, when large numbers of cultivators are to be expropriated in order that land may be taken for such a public purpose as the construction of a dam, it may be in their own interest to receive land elsewhere rather than money. But, with these exceptions, the alterations made in Sub-s. (2), S. 299 are purely verbal. There is nothing in Art. 31 corresponding to Sub-s. (3), S. 299, but Cl. (3) requires that any expropriatory law must be reserved for the consideration of the President & must receive his assent before it can take effect. If Cls. (1) to (3) in Art. 31 had stood alone & had not been folld. by Cls. (4) to (6) proprietors of estates held under the Permanent Settlement would now have been in a very much stronger position than they were in under the Constitution in force prior to 15-8-1947. Under that constitution the terms on which they were liable to be expropriated was a matter in the last resort for the decision of a British Secretary of State or the British Cabinet. Once the Act rendering them liable to be expropriated had received the assent of His Majesty, the adequacy or even the validity of the provisions contained in it providing for compensation could not have been challenged in the Cts. Under the Constitution, however, if Cls. (4) to (6) had not been inserted in Art. 31, they could have appealed to the Cts. challenging the validity of the law on, among other grounds, that the compensation provided represented less than the market-value of their property. A multiplicity of suits would have been instituted & quite possibly each suit would have had to be decided on its own particular facts. Cls. (4) to (6) were, it is clear, inserted in order to prevent an impasse of this kind arising. Another consideration, however, may also have weighed with the Constituent Assembly.

(5) In the history of India an interregnum occurred between 15-8-1947, & 26-1-1950. The Constitution under which we lived during this brief period was very different to the Constitution under which we had lived hitherto. The conduct of the Governor-General & of the Governors of Provinces ceased to be regulated by the instructions which had been passed under the "Royal Sign Manual & Signet" to their predecessors. Ss. 13 & 53, Govt. of India Act, 1935, were deleted. So also were the concluding words of S. 76 (1) requiring the Governor-General, in certain circumstances, to reserve bills for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure thereon. The result, clearly, was that if the impugned Act, which was introduced into the Legislature on 30-12-1949, had been introduced & passed into law sooner than it was, or if the constitution had been adopted later than it was, the impugned Act would, at the commencement of the Constitution, have been an existing law which, however, would have become void in consequence of what is contained in Art. 13 (1) of the Constitution. The Constituent Assembly, in enacting Cl. (4), Art. 31, obviously desired to ensure that the time which the State Legislature had spent over the enactment of the impugned Act should not necessarily be altogether wasted, & that in certain circumstances, or subject to certain conditions, the Act should not be void. What exactly these circumstances or conditions were is the narrow point which we are called upon to decide. It is extraordinary that when the point at issue is so narrow a one, & when barely twelve months have elapsed since the adoption of the Constitution, the arguments before us should have occupied some ten days, & should have involved the citation of one hundred & fifty or more authorities. The expln. is to be found in the fact that the Indian Constitution is not, as were originally most written Constitutions, the Constitution of a political entity, which, until immediately before it was adopted, had had no separate existence. Nor is it, as was the American Constitution, a tiny organism intended to expand & grow with the passage of time into something very much bigger & perhaps something very different. India was already, & had for long been, a highly centralised State. The Constitution embodied in the Govt. of India Act, 1935, was, if I may change the metaphor, an elaborate piece of machinery so designed that with the removal or replacement of comparatively few parts, it was capable of being transformed into a Constitution similar to that of the dominions of the British Commonwealth. In point of fact, the necessary alterations were made in 1947. In 1950, however, while the basic structure of the machinery was left more or less intact, certain new devices were introduced into it which were borrowed from constitutional machinery of a radically different pattern. It is in consequence of this that Mr. P. R. Das for the pltfs. has been able to put forward, with a great show of plausibility, most of the arguments which have been addressed to us. In dealing with these arguments it is essential to bear in mind how the Constitution came to be evolved. If we fail to do so, we may be in danger of clutching at the shadow & missing the substance.

(6) It is well recognised in the United States of America & also in the Dominions of Canada & Australia that a law made in excess of the power conferred on the Legislature is not a law at all. Any one may disregard it. No doubt the individual who disregards it may find himself involved in litigation, but the law is not a valid (sic; invalid?) law unless & until it is pronounced by a Ct. of law to be unconstitutional. It is void. Relying on this principle Mr. P. R. Das contends that the impugned Act is not, & never has been, a law as there is no power conferred by the Constitution on the Bihar Legislature to enact it, & that, in consequence, the Govt. of Bihar is not entitled to rely on it as authorising it to take possession of his clients' estates & tenures. The subject-matter of the impugned Act is not, Mr. Das vehemently contends,

"Land, that is to say, rights in or over land, land tenures including the relation of landlord & tenant, & the collection of rents; transfer & alienation of agricultural land; land improvement & agricultural loans; colonization." (Item 18 in List II).

There are, it is said, no 'latifundia' in Bihar. The pltfs. are not the owners of vast demesne lands, which they cultivate through an army of labourers, paying subsistence wages to the labourers & appropriating & selling at great profit the crops grown by them. It may, perhaps, be that some of the 'parti' land, of which the State is to take possession, may prove to be culturable, & a small number of landless men may be settled on it. But it is not even suggested that the powers taken by the State under the impugned Act will result in a more equable distribution of land, or in any very considerable area of land becoming available for distribution to cultivators who, for one reason or another, have been reduced to the position of landless labourers. Nor, Mr. Das contends, with almost equal vehemence, is the subject-matter of the impugned Act

"Acquisition or requisitioning of property, except for the purposes of the Union, subject to the provisions of entry 42 of List III'. (Item 36 in List II)."

The Govt. of Bihar has, it is said, taken powers under this Act, & intends, to expropriate nearly one & a half million of property owners. The scheme is so vast that, in the nature of things, it cannot possibly be carried to completion in the immediate, or even the near, future. Years must elapse before the great number of estates & tenures are taken over by the State, & during this period, hundreds of thousands, & possibly, several millions, of citizens, whose sole means of livelihood is the income which they derive from their property, will be left in suspense, unable to raise money on the security of it & not knowing at what precise moment they are to be dispossessed. That, Mr. Das says, is not acquisition but spoliation, & that that is so, is made still more clear by the provisions contained in the Act relating to the payment, or rather to the partial cancellation, of debts secured on estates & tenures. In this part of his argument Mr. Das relied strongly on 'Gallagher v. Lyan', (1937 A C 863: (106 L J P C 161). The question that arose in that case was whether or not the Legislature of Northern Ireland had exceeded the power conferred on it by the British Parliament, or to be more strictly accurate, whether, in enacting certain legislation, it had acted in contravention of an express prohibition contained in the Act constituting it. The decision, however, can have no application unless it is conclusively shown either that the subject-matter of the impugned Act comes under one or other of the entries between entry No. 1 & Entry No. 96 in the Union List or that it does not or cannot come under any entry in the State List, in which latter case, of course, the subject-matter would come under entry No. 97 in the Union List, which is the residuary entry, & Parliament alone would have been competent to enact it. Mr. Das did not & could not make any serious attempt to do this. As was pointed out by the Judicial Committee in 'Megh Raj v. Allah Rakhia', 74 I A 12 at p. 20: (A I R (34) 1947 P C 72) land is primarily a matter of provincial concern, & it is abundantly clear that it was the intention of the Constituent Assembly, as it had also been the intention of the British Parliament, that bills of which the object was land reform should be introduced in, & passed into law by the Provincial Legislature, & not by the Central Legislature. The provisions in the Instruments of Instructions to the Governor-General & to the Governors of Provinces show that this was so in the one case, & Cl. (4), Art. 31 of the Constitution shows that this was so in the other. We may not be entitled to refer to the debates which took place in the Constituent Assembly when Art. 31 was finally adopted, for the purpose of construing any part of that Article, but we are entitled to refer to them for the purpose of ascertaining why so very extraordinary provisions as Cls. (4) & (6), Art. 31 were inserted in the Constitution at all. (See 'Attorney General for Alberta v. Attorney General for Canada', (1939) A C 117: (A I R (26) 1939 P C 53).

(7) Once it is established that it was the intention of the makers of the Constitution that land reform should be a subject for provincial legislation, it seems to me of little moment whether the impugned Act was made in exercise of the one power or in exercise of the other, or whether it was made partly in exercise of the one & partly in exercise of the other. I agree, however, with the learned Attorney General that Entry 18 is more directly applicable than Entry 36. The impugned Act, no doubt, states that estates & tenures are to pass to & become vested in the State, but as I have already pointed out, in actual fact certain rights of proprietors & tenure-holders are to be extinguished & others are to be modified, & so far as part at least of their property is concerned, their possession is not to be disturbed. S. 299, Govt. of India Act, was drawn in the way it was because the British Parliament drew a distinction between the acquisition of land for public purposes & schemes of land reform involving the transference of land to public ownership. It contemplated that schemes of land reform would necessarily involve the payment of compensation to persons adversely affected, but it did not contemplate that the insertion of provisions in a land reform bill for the payment of compensation would, of necessity make the bill also a bill for the compulsory acquisition of land. In fact it was in order to prevent such a contention being raised in the Cts. that sub-s. (3), S. 299 was enacted, & that instructions were issued to the Governor General to reserve for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure bills which involved an alteration in the character of the Permanent Settlement. It is not without significance that the word 'etc.' appears in the marginal note to S. 299 after the words "compulsory acquisition of land". Under the Constitution contained in the Govt. of India Act, 1935, compulsory acquisition of land was a provincial subject. There was no similar entry in the Federal legislative List, presumably because S. 127 required the provinces to acquire land compulsorily for the purposes of the Central Govt. Under the Constitution power is conferred both on the Union & on the States, & for that reason both are also given power to legislate regarding the principles to be followed in assessing compensation for land which is compulsorily acquired. An elaborate & very subtle argument has been addressed to us by Mr. Das, which is based on the words "subject to the provisions of Entry 42 of List III" which occur at the end of Entry 36. I agree with Mr. Das that these words indicate the existence of a condition or a restriction on the power of the State Legislature, & that when a state Legislature ignores that condition or restriction, its purported law is a nullity, but I cannot agree that the condition or restriction is imposed by the concluding words in the entry. It is really imposed by Cl. (2), Art. 31 of the Constitution. The same condition or restriction exists on the power of Parliament itself, & yet there is nothing in Entry 33 in List I to show that.

(8) Under the Constitution the validity of a law may be challenged in one or other of two ways. It may be challenged on the ground that in enacting it the Legislature which did so has usurped the jurisdiction of another Legislature. It may also be challenged on the ground that in enacting it the Legislature has exercised a jurisdiction which the Constitution forbade either it or any other Legislature to exercise. The Articles in the Constitution which confer on the citizens of India certain fundamental rights are themselves a fundamental law, that is a law which does not so much confer rights or impose duties, as a law which lays down the 'norm' or standard by which the validity of all other laws is to be tested. The impugned Act deals with a subject over which the State Legislature had legislative jurisdiction. Has it, nevertheless, so dealt with the subject as to transgress one of the fundamental laws embodied in the Constitution? Certain affidavits have been put in by or on behalf of the Maharajadhiraja of Darbhanga. One of these affidavits shows that a part of the estates of the Maharajadhiraja was acquired under sale deeds and that the aggregate of the consideration money given for the sale deeds was Rs. 89,96,528, & that, so far as another part of the property affected by the impugned Act is concerned, the Maharajadhiraja is in possession as a usufructuary mtgee., the aggregate amount of the money secured by the various mtge. deeds being Rs. 59,16,282. Another affidavit shows that the amount of compensation which will be payable to the Maharajadhiraja will be Rs. 8,89,452/-. The same affidavit shows that the arrears of rent due to him amount in the aggregate to Rs. 30,80,967. Now, under the impugned Act these arrears of rent are to be collected by the State, & the State is to pay over to the Maharajadhiraja only one half of the amount due. In effect, therefore, the Maharajadhiraja will receive no compensation whatever for the property of which the State deprives him, & will, in addition, be deprived of a part of the arrears of rent due to him. An affidavit has been put in on behalf of the petnr. in M. J. C. 239 of 1950 stating that, while under the scheme adopted in the impugned Act, the gross assets of his estate amount to Rs. 10,06,259, the deductions to be made will aggregate somewhat more than that namely, Rs. 10,26,108. No counter affidavits have been put in, & the learned Attorney General could only say that in particular cases, the results arrived at might be very inequitable, but that, nevertheless, as the impugned Act laid down the principles on which compensation was to be assessed, its validity could not be challenged. Clearly, however, it is necessary to inquire whether the principles of compensation embodied in the Act are, in fact, principles of compensation in the sense that, by the application of them, the compensation which proprietors & tenure-holders will receive will be what the law regards as compensation. Fletcher Moulton L. J. in 'In re, an Arbitration between Lucas & the Chesterfield Gas & Water Board', (1909) 1 K B 16 at p. 29: (77 L J K B 1009), explained the meaning of the expression "compensation" thus:

"The principles upon which compensation is assessed when land is taken under compulsory powers are well settled. The owner receives for the lands he gives up their equivalent i.e. that which they were worth to him in money. His property is, therefore, not diminished in amount, but to that extent it is compulsorily changed in form. But the equivalent is estimated on the value to him, & not on the value to the purchaser, & hence it has from the first been recognised as an absolute rule that this value is to be estimated as it stood before the grant of the compulsory powers. The owner is only to receive compensation based upon the market-value of his lands as they stood before the scheme was authorised by which they are put to public uses. Subject to that he is entitled to be paid the full price for his lands, & any & every element of value which they possess must be taken into consideration in so far as they increase the value to him."

(9) Now, in arriving at the net annual income of the proprietor or tenure-holder who is to be expropriated, the Act directs that from his gross annual assets deductions shall be made on account of the expenses of management & on account of works of benefit to the raiyats. The former deduction may amount to as much as 20 per cent, & the latter to as much as 12½ per cent of the gross annual assets. In certain parts of the province proprietors or tenure-holders may be under a legal obligation to maintain irrigation works but so far as I am aware, no proprietors or tenure-holders are under a legal obligation to expend as much or nearly as much as 12½ per cent of the gross receipts from their estates or tenures on such a purpose. Again, while the impugned Act takes into account the income derived from fruit-bearing trees, it does not take into account the value of standing timber, still less, the existence of mineral deposits. As is shown by the affidavit which has been put in on behalf of the Maharaja of Chotanagpur, who is the petnr. in M. J. C. 232 of 1950, such deposit may be very valuable indeed. Finally, the number of years' purchase is to vary from twenty years in the case of the smallest proprietors & tenure-holders to three years in the case of the pltfs. It is quite obvious that it is impossible for the latter to find any investment which can give them 33 1/3 per cent or indeed anything approaching that. Although, as I have pointed out, under the Constitution compensation need not necessarily be in money, nevertheless, it was, I have no doubt, intended by the Constituent Assembly when it enacted Art. 31 (2) that whatever compensation was made, it should be something which could fairly be said to be equivalent in value to the property taken over by the State.

(10) Mr. P. R. Das also attacked the impugned Act on the ground that the purpose for which the estates & tenures of his clients were to be taken over was not, in law, a public purpose. There is, Mr. Das points out, no recital in the impugned Act that it is enacted for a public purpose, nor is it possible to collect from what is contained in it the existence of any public purpose. All that the impugned Act does, Mr. Das says, is to augment the public revenues. Practically the whole of the culturable land in the province is, it is asserted, already in the possession of professional cultivators, who pay a rent which is a fair rent, & who enjoy fixity of tenure & freedom of transfer. They will continue to pay the same rent as they do at present. It will merely be collected by another agency which may be less efficient & more ruthless than the old, & in order to meet the ever-growing expenditure of the State, rents may soon have to be raised. On such grounds, Mr. Das invites us to say that, in the words of Lord Dunedin in 'Hamabai v. Secy. of State', 42 I A 44: (A I R (1) 1914 P C 20), the scheme embodied in the impugned Act is not one "which will redound to public benefit". In this part of his argument Mr. Das also reld. on 'Province of Bombay v. Khushaldas S. Advani', A I R (37) 1950 S C 222: (1950 S C R 621), & on a number of passages in Cooley's Constitutional Limitations. It is one thing to say that the judicature is entitled to question the correctness of a decision by the executive that the purpose for which in exercise of a power conferred on it by the Legislature, it proposes to acquire property is a public purpose, which was what was decided in the 'Province of Bombay v. Khushaldas S. Advani', A I R (37) 1950 S C 222: (1950 S C R 621), & another to say that when, as here, the Legislature has itself decided to acquire property, the judicature may question the propriety of its decision, at all events, in cases where the legislation embodies a scheme designed to advance the general welfare. As to the American decisions cited, these cannot be of assistance, &, in fact, are merely likely to mislead. Under the American Constitution property of all kinds, including land, is sacrosanct. In Kent's Commentaries, Edn. 14, Vol. II, p. 340, it is stated that pretext of some public use or service, such cases would be gross abuses of their discretion, & fraudulent attacks on private right, & the law would be clearly unconstitutional & void."

"if they (i.e. the Legislature) should vacate a grant of property, or of a franchise, under the

But under our Constitution land, or certain kinds of landed property, are not sacrosanct. On the contrary, the Constituent Assembly, by enacting Cls. (4) & (6), Art. 31, gave their express approval to legislation abolishing the Permanent Settlement, & extinguishing certain rights in land. Whatever our own views may be, we must, in my opinion, regard the scheme embodied in the impugned Act as a scheme intended to benefit the public. We cannot shut our eyes to the patent fact that the makers of the Constitution regarded it as likely to do so. Whatever construction may eventually have to be put on the expression "public purpose" in Art. 31 (2) is immaterial. We are, in my opinion, estopped from saying that the acquisition of estates & tenures is not an acquisition for such a purpose. That it is, has been decided by the Constituent Assembly itself.

(11) Finally, it has been contended by Mr. Das that the impugned Act is void as it is a piece of legislation which is expressly prohibited by Art. 14 of the Constitution. Art 14 is based on, & largely reproduces, the language used in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America. That amendment was adopted after the war of succession because, in the southern States, the negro population had never enjoyed equality with the white race in the Cts. of law. The American Constitution is a very brief instrument couched in very general language, & the framers of it & also the framers of the amendments were content to leave a very great deal to the Cts. In the period of very nearly a century which has elapsed since the fourteenth amendment was adopted the language used in it has been interpreted in an evergrowing variety of ways in order to make it applicable to the rapidly changing conditions of American life. How far these decisions may legitimately be called in aid in construing Art. 14 of our Constitution remains to be seen. The S. C. in 'Charanjit Lal v. Union of India', (A I R (38) 1951 S C 41), has, however, held that Art. 14 prohibits, as the S. C. of America has long since decided that the fourteenth amendment prohibits, legislation which is discriminatory & is hostile to an individual or class of individuals. Legislation which affects only one particular class is permissible so long as it does not discriminate against individuals within the class, & so long as it can be said that such a class does, in fact, exist; that is, that there is something to distinguish the individual citizens composing it from all other citizens. It is, I think, clear that proprietors of estates & tenure-holders may be said to form a distinct class, in that they all enjoy an income, which is an unearned income, & that they derive this unearned income from land, which economists have uniformly regarded as standing on a different footing from other kinds of property. The impugned Act, however, discriminates between individuals falling within the class which it affects. In fact, it divides the class into a large number of sub-classes, & to these sub-classes differential treatment is meted out. It is quite impossible to say that this subdivision is based on any rational grounds. On what principle, for instance, ought a proprietor or tenure-holder, whose net income is Rs. 20,000, to be given eight years' purchase, while a proprietor or tenure-holder, whose net income is Rs. 20,001 is given only six years' purchase? At one end of the scale are a vast number of proprietors & tenure-holders who are to be allowed twenty years' purchase. It is common knowledge that many small proprietors have a relatively large area of 'bakasht' land in their estates & that, in recent years, they have had difficulty in collecting such rents as are payable to them. As the net income is to be computed, not on the income actually received, but on the income that ought to have been received if all 'raiyats' had paid their rent, such small proprietors, who are to retain their 'bakasht land, are likely to receive adequate, & possibly more than adequate, compensation. At the other end of the scale are the great 'zamindars', who are to be allowed three years' purchase, &, as I have already pointed out, the result, at least in certain cases, will be that these men will not merely be deprived of their land, but will also be deprived of considerable sums of money which are due to them. The impugned Act confers power on the excutive to take over estates & tenures as & when it chooses. The Bihar Zamindari Abolition Act, 1948, which the impugned Act replaced, contained a provision that when any estate or tenure belonging to a particular category was taken over, all other estates & tenures belonging to that category should be taken over also. I can well understand that such a provision may have led to administrative difficulties. Nevertheless, the provision in the impugned Act, which confers the wide power it does on the executive, is clearly discriminatory in character, & there is an obvious danger that when the smaller estates come to be taken over & decisions as to whether particular estates should or should not be taken over have to be made on the recommendation, in the ultimate analysis, of quite subordinate officials, grave abuses may result. The difficulty which has been experienced in other countries in carrying out reforms, the object of which is to ensure that the whole of the land in the State will be in the possession of professional cultivators who are likely to make the best use of it, has been the difficulty of providing the funds necessary to expropriate the landlords. The charges for interest on loans raised in order to provide the money necessary were, it has usually been felt, likely to endanger the financial stability of the State.

(12) One extraordinary feature in the scheme embodied in the impugned Act is that it makes no provision whatever for the raising of money. The Legislature, it is clear, are optimistic enough to hope that this reform may conceivably be effected without raising any great loan. The conclusion, to my mind, is irresistible that the intention is to take over the great estates in the province, paying no compensation or the most inadequate compensation, & out of the considerable profits which are likely to be derived from them, to take over, in course of time, the remaining estates & tenures. In other words, a comparatively small minority belonging to this particular class are to be expropriated without compensation or with the most inadequate compensation in order that, when the great majority are expropriated, they may receive compensation which will not be inadequate & may, quite possibly, in many cases, be more than adequate. The learned Attorney-General was unable to deny that this amounted to discrimination of a very flagrant kind, but put forward two arguments in support of his contention that nevertheless the validity of the impugned Act could not be assailed, or at all events, could not be assailed at present. In dealing with 'Yick Wo v. Peter Hopkins', (1886) 30 Law Edn 220: (118 U S 356), on which Mr. P. R. Das had strongly relied, the learned Attorney-General pointed out that in that case there had already been discrimination, & suggested that, unless & until an estate or tenure had been actually taken over, the owner was not entitled to come to the Cts. & ask for relief. It is, no doubt, true that Mathews J. relied on the manner in which the ordinance had been administered as going to show that

"though the law itself be fair on its face & impartial in appearance, yet, if it is applied & administered by public authority with an evil eye & an unequal hand, so as practically to make unjust & illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the Constitution."

It is, however, clear that the ground on which the petnrs. were ordered to be released from custody was that the ordinance, under which they had been imprisoned, was held to be unconstitutional & void the decision was later so understood by the S. C. itself. (Vide 'Homer Adolph Pleasy v. John H. Ferguson', (1896) 41 Law Ed. 256: (162 U S 537). The other argument put forward by the learned Attorney-General is that the impugned Act is, or is very much in the nature of a tax law, & that tax laws may operate inequitably, & yet nevertheless be constitutional. It seems to me quite impossible to say that the impugned Act is or is in the nature of a tax law. It cannot be regarded as a law imposing a levy on capital & clearly, if it is so regarded, it is a levy, not on the whole capital of the persons affected, but only on a portion of their capital. The great 'zamindars', or some of them, may have invested much of the income which they have derived from their estates in stocks & shares, or in businesses of various kinds, & if they are now deprived of their estates, may still have ample means left to them. On the other hand, there must be other 'zamindars' belonging to the middle classes, who have used their savings to enlarge their 'zamindaris'. Such men may have little or no other property, & may, when their 'zamindaris' are taken over, be reduced to poverty. In other words, if the impugned Act can at all be regarded as in the nature of a tax law imposing a levy on capital, it operates with such patent inequality that it would be void under Art. 14 of the Constitution. It will serve no useful purpose to refer to the numerous American decisions which were cited, as for the most part they were cited in the S. C. & have been dealt with in the decision of the S. C. on which I rely. I ought, however, to make an exception in the case of two decisions, namely, 'George O. Campbell v. State of California', (1906) 50 Law Ed 382: (200 U S 87) & 'Jessie Norton Torrence Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Savings Bank', (1898) 42 Law Ed 1037: (170 U S 283). The question that arose in each of these cases was the validity of State legislation imposing a graduated tax on inheritances. The legislation was, in each case, upheld. But the ground on which it was upheld was that the State, in exercise of its plenary power to regulate inheritances, could take more from one class of heir than from another. Brewer J. who delivered dissenting judgment in the earlier case, (that is, 42 Law Edn. 1037 at pp. 1045, 1046 — Ed.) observed:

"It seems to be conceded that if this were a tax upon property such increase in the rate of taxation could not be sustained, but being a tax upon the succession it is held that a different rule prevails," & concluded his judgment with the following remarks:

".....by this statute upon property passing in accordance with its statutes a tax is imposed; a tax unequal because not proportioned to the amount of the estate; unequal because based upon classification purely arbitrary, to wit, that of wealth — a tax directly & intentionally made unequal. I think the Constitution of the United States forbids such inequality."

I must confess that I have found it difficult to understand & have been unable to discover, why Art. 14 was inserted in the Constitution. So far as I am aware, there was, in 1950, no class of persons anywhere in India who were subjected to such discrimination before the law, as, in 1867, the victorious Northern States apprehended the negro population of the Southern States might be subjected to. Art. 14 occurs at the beginning of a series of five articles which appear under the heading "Right to Equality" &, having regard to the succeeding articles, I should have been disposed myself to think that what the makers of the Constitution had in mind were potential evils of the mind which the American people aimed at when they adopted the fourteenth amendment. There are a number of articles in the Constitution which rather express the ideals of the makers than aim at existing evils or evils which are likely to arise. The S. C. has, however given to the article the extended interpretation which has been put on the fourteenth amendment in modern times in America. I am bound by that decision & am constrained to hold that the impugned Act is unconstitutional as it transgresses Art. 14.

(13) S. 32 (2) of the impugned Act provides that the amount of compensation shall be paid in cash or in bonds, or partly in cash & partly in bonds. The bonds shall be either negotiable or non-negotiable & non-transferable & be payable in forty equal instalments & shall carry interest at two & a half 'per centum per annum'. Cl. (p), S. 43 (1) empowers the Provincial Govt. to make rules as to the proportion in which compensation shall be payable in cash & in bonds & the manner of payment of such compensation. These provisions are in direct contravention of Cl. (2), Art. 31 which requires that if payment is to be made in bonds, this provision must be made in the Act itself, & not in rules made under the Act. It is immaterial that the Provincial Govt. may intend to make payment in cash, but cannot at the moment foresee whether it may not eventually be necessary to make payment in bonds, & it is also immaterial that, if the Act were to provide for payment in money & had later to be amended, amendment might be a matter of perhaps insuperable difficulty. Mr. P. R. Das, however, does not invite us merely to say that these provisions in the impugned Act transgress Cl. (2) of Art. 31. Mr. Das invites us to go a very great deal further. What the learned Counsel contends is that so wide a delegation of legislative power, whether contained in an Act relating to the acquisition of property for public purposes, or in any other Act on a subject within the legislative jurisdiction of the State, is impliedly prohibited by the Constitution. Further, Mr. Das contends, these provisions are not severable from the rest of the impugned Act, & in consequence, if they are void, the Act as a whole is necessarily void, & the provisions contained in Cl. (4), Art. 31 cannot validate it. Reliance was mainly placed by Mr. Das on the recent 'decision of the S. C. in the 'State of Bombay v. Narottamdas', (A I R (38) 1951 S C 69)'. It is to be observed that the Act, the validity of which was there challenged, was an Act made under the Constitution embodied in the Govt. of India Act, 1935, & its validity was upheld on the ground that it was a piece of conditional legislation, that is, that the Legislature had itself decided what the law should be & had merely left it to an external authority to decide when the law should be brought into operation. There is nothing in the judgment to suggest ,for a moment, that, when an Act delegating legislative power cannot properly be described as a piece of conditional legislation, the delegation is void & the Act is, or may be void as a whole. A decision which, in my opinion, is more in point is 'Archibald G. Hodge v. The Queen', (1883) 9 A C 117. That decision is, I think, more directly applicable because there was in it a real delegation of legislative power, that is, of a power to make rules which should have the force of law, & not merely a power to decide when, or in what local areas, an Act should come into operation. The validity of the delegation in that case was challenged on the ground that the Ontario legislature was a creation of the British Parliament, & the maxim 'delegatus non potest delegare' applied. In repelling this contention Sir Barnes Peacock made the following observations:

"It appears to their Lordships, however, that the objection thus raised by the applts. is founded on an entire misconception of the true character & position of the provincial legislatures. They are in no sense delegates of or acting under any mandate from the Imperial Parliament. When the British North America Act enacted that there should be a legislature for Ontario, & that its legislative assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the Province & for provincial purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in S. 92, it conferred powers not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial Parliament, but authority as plenary & as ample within the limits prescribed by S. 92 as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed & could bestow. Within these limits of subjects & area the local legislature is supreme, & has the same authority as the Imperial Parliament, or the Parliament of the Dominion would have had under like circumstances to confide to a municipal institution or body of its own creation authority to make bye laws or resolutions as to subjects specified in the enactment, & within the object of carrying the enactment, into operation & effect."

There is clearly no room for the application of the maxim 'delegatus non potest delegare' under the Indian Constitution. If a delegation of legislative power is prohibited, it must be prohibited on quite another ground, namely, that in the Constitution, as indeed perhaps in every written Constitution, there is, to some extent, a separation of governmental powers, that is, of the legislature, the executive & the judiciary. The preamble to the Constitution no doubt states: "We the people of India, having solemnly resolved to constitute India into a Sovereign Democratic Republic..... do hereby adopt, enact & give to ourselves this Constitution" in the same way as the preamble to the American Constitution states that "We the people of the United States.....:do ordain & establish this Constitution for the United States of America". But the Indian Constitution, like the Constitution of Canada, which in its preamble contains a recital that the "Provinces.....have expressed their desire to be federally united into one Dominion.....with a Constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom" sets up a system of Parliamentary Cabinet Govt. as opposed to the system of Presidential Govt. in the United States. The contention has been put forward in several cases in the H. C. of Australia that the separation of governmental powers under the Australian Constitution imposes limitations on the power of the Legislature to delegate legislative power. The leading decision is the 'Victorial Stevedoring & General Contracting Co. Ltd. v. Dignan', (46 C L R 73), in which very elaborate judgments were delivered by Dixon, J. & Evatt, J. It will serve no useful purpose for me to add to the length of this judgment by referring in detail to the grounds on which the decision was based. The conclusion arrived at may be succinctly stated in the language used by Dixon, J. (p. 101 of the report) that "a statute conferring upon the Executive a power to legislate upon some matter contained within one of the subjects of the legislative power of the Parliament is a law with respect to that subject & a distribution of legislative, executive & judicial powers in the Constitution does not operate to restrain the power of the Parliament to make such a law."

The power to delegate legislative power, it has been said, is implied in the idea of parliamentary sovereignty itself. As at present advise, I am not prepared to say that such restrictions as may exist on this power under the constitution are greater than the very limited restriction which, in the opinion of the H. C. of Australia, exists on the Australian Legislatures. The impugned Act is an Act on a subject within the legislative jurisdiction of the Bihar Legislature, & the provisions which are now assailed must be regarded as containing merely a delegation of a power to legislate on what the legislature considered were points of detail relating to the scheme embodied in the impugned Act. It may have been unwise of the Legislature to delegate so wide a power to the executive without imposing some restriction, so as itself to be able to control the exercise of the power as, for instance, by providing that any rules made should be laid before the Legislature & should not become operative unless & until they were confirmed by resolution. That, however, is a political matter, & not a matter for the Cts.

(14) I come now to what is the real crux of these cases, namely, the scope & the effect of Cl. (4), Art. 31 of the Constitution. It is easy enough to understand why Cl. (4) & also Cl. (6) were inserted in Art. 31. The reasons were substantially the reasons which had led the British Parliament, in enacting the Govt. of India Act, 1935, to deal in one way with land reform schemes which involved the payment of compensation & in another way with the acquisition of land for public purposes. It is a matter of the very greatest difficulty to assess the market-value of zamindari property which is extensive & which contains a great deal of standing timber or mineral deposits. The Cts. have found an almost insuperable difficulty in dealing with cases of this kind arising under the Bihar Money-lenders' Act. Again, in carrying out a scheme of land reform, such as is embodied in the impugned Act, it is, or may be, impracticable to give compensation in money or to give compensation which represents the market-value of the property taken over. Indeed, there may be valid reasons for giving compensation which does not represent by any means so much as the market-value, & is not in law an exact equivalent. It is obvious that if Cls. (4) & (6) had not been inserted in Art. 31, there would have been almost endless litigation. Mr. P. R. Das for the pltfs contends that the real object of the Constituent Assembly was to prevent such litigation, & that it was intended that the compensation which was to be given should be something which could fairly be described as compensation by any reasonable layman, although not perhaps by a lawyer applying the principles embodied in the Land Acquisition Act. It cannot possibly, it is said, have been intended that certain persons affected by the Act should receive nothing or practically nothing at all. Nor can it have been intended that one co-owner of a property should receive three-twentieths of the compensation given to another co-owner whose interest in the property was exactly the same as his. Mr. Das went on to contend that, in so far as the impugned Act purported to lay down principles of compensation & yet produced results so palpably inequitable, it amounted to a fraud on the Constitution, & that this Ct. was not merely entitled but was bound to declare it to be unconstitutional. In putting forward this argument Mr. Das appears to have had in mind certain observations made by prominent members of the Constituent Assembly in the debate which took place when Art. 31 was adopted. But we are not entitled to turn to these debates in order to discover what the language used by the Constituent Assembly in enacting Cl. (4), Art. 31 means. As Latham C. J. observed in 'the State of South Australia v. The Commonwealth', (1941) 65 C L R 373.

"Members of Parliament frequently have differing opinions, not only as to the merits & real objects of Bills presented, but as to their meaning. Neither the validity nor the interpretation of a statute passed by Parliament can be allowed to depend upon what members, whether Ministers or not, choose to say in parliamentary debate."

Quite apart from this, this Ct. is, under the Constitution, either under a duty to interfere or under a duty to refrain from interfering. It has no discretion whatever in the matter. Mr. Das was on somewhat firmer ground when he contended that it was the duty of the advisors of the President to examine a land reform bill, or indeed any reserved bill from certain standpoints, & that, in this particular case, either there had been no such examination, or the President had been wrongly advised to give his assent. In so far as the assent of the President had been wrongly & improperly obtained, a fraud had, Mr. Das again said been committed on the Constitution, & this Ct., as the upholder of the Constitution, was bound to interfere. The reservation of bills for the assent of a higher authority is not a mere matter of procedure. It is an essential & important part of the law-making machinery set up by the Constitution. It is a device which has been used for many decades in the Constitutions of the colonies & dominions of the British Commonwealth & was used in the Constitution embodied in the Govt. of India Act, 1935. The position under the Indian Constitution is exactly the same as under the Canadian Constitution, the reason, no doubt, being that in India, as in Canada, the States & the Union have, in an extensive field, concurrent powers of legislation. From a very early period in the development of the Canadian Constitution it was recognised that when a bill was reserved for the consideration of the Governor General, it was the duty of the Law Officers of the Dominion to examine it with a view to ascertaining whether, in the first place, it was unconstitutional in whole or in part, &, secondly, whether, if assent was given to the bill the differences between the law obtaining in the province, to which the bill applied, & the law obtaining in other provinces would be merely differences in point of detail rather than in principle. (See Egerton's Federations & Unions in the British Empire, Foot-note 2 at p. 145). It may, I think, safely be assumed that, when bills are reserved by the Governors of the States in India for the consideration of the President, they are intended to be examined by the Law Officers of the Union from that standpoint. It is obviously desirable that, in matters over which the Union & the States alike have legislative jurisdiction, there should be a certain degree of uniformity in legislation & also that assent should not be given to a bill if there is any serious probability of its being eventually pronounced to be unconstitutional by the Cts. Cl. (3), Art. 31 suggests that bills relating to the acquisition of property for public purposes are intended to be subjected to a more than ordinarily careful scrutiny of this kind. Bills on other subjects in the Concurrent List, if assented to by the Governor, take effect, & if they do not conflict with provisions contained in an Act of Parliament, are constitutional. Bills relating to the acquisition of property for public purposes are, however, to be wholly inoperative unless & until they have been assented to by the President. The President, Mr. Das says, has given his assent to three land reform bills passed by three State Legislatures. There is no uniformity in this legislation, & so far as the impugned Act is concerned, it, in certain cases at least, provides for no compensation at all. Mr. Das concedes that a certain latitude was intended to be given to the President, as, for instance, if the provisions relating to compensation were such that a reasonable man untrammelled by considerations which would, or might, weigh with a lawyer, could, or might, consider them as fair to the zamindars & also to the State. But, Mr. Das contends, the latitude given has been greatly exceeded. The assent given to the bill has not been given in a proper exercise of the President's discretion in accordance with the principles which underlie the provisions of the Constitution relating to the reservation of bills.

(15) In this part of his argument Mr. Das refd. to 'Maharaja Luchmeswar Singh v. Chairman of the Darbhanga Municipality', 17 I A 90: (18 Cal 99 P C), & 'Mayor of Westminster v. L & N W Rly. Co.', (1905) A C 426 at p. 430 & 439. The former decision is not in point, & the question that arose in the latter was whether or not a statutory body has exceeded the limits of the authority conferred on it. There is a palpable difficulty in the way of applying that decision in the present case. The broad principles on which assent is intended to be given to, or withheld from, a reserved bill may be easily deducible, but they are not specifically laid down in the Constitution. The result of this is that it is not open to the Cts. to question the propriety of the President's action. Even under the pre-1947 Constitution, in which the Govenor-General was bound by his Instrument of Instructions to withhold his assent from certain bills, a bill assented to in contravention of these instructions could not be challenged in the Cts. as unconstitutional on that ground. (Vide S. 13 (2), Govt. of India Act, 1935). Again, whatever may have been said in the debates in the Constituent Assembly, I am unable to accept the contention that, when anything in the nature of a fraud has been committed on the Constitution, there is some inherent power in the Cts. to interpose & prevent the fraud taking effect. As I said a moment ago, this Ct. is under a duty either to pronounce the impugned Act as unconstitutional, or is, by reason of what is contained in Art. 31 (2), under a duty to refrain from doing so. It is, I think, clear that the Cts. were not intended to obey & enforce this Act in precisely the same manner as the Cts. in England are bound to obey & enforce any Act of Parliament. Before the Constitution was adopted the Legislature of the United Provinces had enacted a similar statute which, under the Constitution in force during the interregnum between 15-8-1947, & 26-1-1950, it undoubtedly had power to enact. Nevertheless, the Constituent Assembly, instead of inserting a proviso to Art. 13 (1) of the Constitution that the statute should not be void when the Constitution came into operation chose instead to enact Cl. (6), Art. 31. Even if it had been intended that the Act should be subjected to scrutiny by the Law Officers of the Union, still, if it was intended wholly to oust the jurisdiction of the Cts., one would expect provision to have been made in Art. 13 (1). On the other hand, it is equally clear that it was intended to take away from the Cts. the power to pronounce that Act & also the impugned Act to be void on the ground that they do not "specify the principles on which, & the manner in which, compensation is to be determined & given". It may be said that a power conferred on the President to assent to & thereby render non-justiciable a bill which does not provide for compensation, or provides for wholly inadequate compensation, necessarily involves a power to assent to & thereby render non-justiciable a bill which gives relatively large compensation to one set of persons affected by it & little or no compensation to another set of persons. Art. 31 (4) does not, however, in terms, confer a power on the President, what it does is to take away a right of action from the citizen. The pltfs. may not be entitled to ask for relief on the ground that the principles of compensation specified in the impugned Act are such that they will, in fact, receive no compensation at all, nor on the ground that the impugned Act does not specify how payment is to be made to them of the amount which is euphemistically described as compensation. They ask, however, in the alternative, for relief on the ground that the impugned Act specifies different principles of compensation for different categories of persons affected by the Act, the subdivision of such persons into categories being wholly artificial or irrational one. They are not raising a purely technical point, but are complaining of a serious grievance. If the impugned Act had specified one set of principles of compensation applicable to all persons affected by the Act, & not different sets of principles, the pltfs. would have received much more & numerous other persons would have received much less. The bigger 'zamindars' are to be given little or no compensation in order that the smaller 'zamindars' may be given adequate compensation. That is an invasion of the pltfs' right to equality as that right has been interpreted by the S. C. I had occasion to point out earlier in this judgment that the basic principle on which compensation is given when land is compulsorily acquired for purposes of the State is that the owner shall not be compelled indirectly to contribute more than any other citizen to the expenditure incurred. There is nothing in Art. 31 (4) to suggest that the Constituent Assembly intended that in a scheme of land reforms involving the payment of compensation this basic principle might be completely ignored. If the State is prevented from invading the pltfs' right to equality, is it material that the State is indirectly prevented from invading their right to property which it could have invaded if it had not, in doing so, also invaded their right to equality? In my opinion, it is not. The one fundamental right cannot be said to be merely a part of the other; they are separate & distinct. It has also to be remembered that the impugned Act is not an Act which thet Legislature has made & the President has assented to in the belief that it is a constitutional law. It is an unconstitutional law enacted in the belief that the right of the pltfs. to challenge it & ask for relief from its operation has been taken away. The onus was on the State to show that this was so, & this onus has not been satisfactorily discharged.

(16) In the result, then, I would answer the issues which have been raised in the following manner:

"Issue No. 1: The subject-matter of the Bihar Land Reforms Act XXX (30) of 1950 is a subject-matter within the legislative jurisdiction of the Bihar Legislature.

Issue Nos. 2 & 4: The said Act is unconstitutional on the ground that it transgresses Art. 14 of the Constitution & on no other ground. Cl. (4), Art. 31 does not debar the Ct. from entering into the question of compensation in order to decide whether or not the impugned Act offends against Art. 14.

Issues 3 & 5: As the impugned Act is an unconstitutional Act, the properties of the pltfs. have not vested in the State of Bihar. The pltfs. are entitled to decrees declaring that the Act is unconstitutional & to an injunction restraining the defendants from taking possession of their properties. They are also entitled to their costs.

(17) In the Miscellaneous judicial Cases which have been heard along with the suits the 'ad-interim' injunctions which have already been issued, will be made permanent. The petnrs. in each of these cases are also entitled to their costs. The hearing fee is assessed at ten gold mohurs in each case.

(18) REUBEN, J.: I have had the advantage of perusing the judgment prepared by my learned brother Shearer, J. & agree with the conclusion at which he has arrived but, in view of the importance of the issues involved, I shall give my reasons separately.

(19) The points urged before us may most conveniently be dealt with under the following heads:

(1) What is the effect of the assent of the President under Art. 31, Cl. (4), Const. Ind.? Is the impugned Act entitled to protection by reason of such assent?
(2) Is the impugned Act void for an absolute want of legislative power?
(3) Is the impugned Act void as contravening the Fundamental Right guaranteed by Cl. (1), Art. 31 of the Constitution?
(4) Is the impugned Act void as contravening Cl. (2), Art. 31 by making no provision for compensation?
(5) Is the impugned Act void as contravening Cl. (2), Art. 31 by the absence of public purpose?
(6) Is the impugned Act void as contravening Art. 19, Cl. (1) (f) of the Constitution?
(7) Is the impugned Act void as contravening Art. 14 of the Constitution?
(8) Is the impugned Act void by reason of the delegation of legislative power?
(9) Is the impugned Act void as being a fraud on the Constitution?
(10) Is the impugned Act void as being unenforceable?

(20) Point No. 1: Cl. 4, Art. 31 provides that, if a bill pending in the Legislature of a State at the Commencement of the Constitution has been reserved, after it has been passed by the Legislature, for the consideration of the President & received his assent, then

"notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, the law so assented to shall not be called in question in any Ct. on the ground that it contravenes the provisions of Cl. (2)."

The protection given by the assent under this clause is similar to that given by a certificate under Cl. (6), Art. 31 to a law of a State enacted not more than 18 months before the commencement of the Constitution, namely that it shall not be called in question in any Ct. on the ground that

"It contravenes the provisions of Cl. (2) of this Article or has contravened the provisions of Sub-s. (2), C. 299, Govt. of India Act, 1935."

The words "notwithstanding anything in this Constitution" do not appear in Cl. (6), for the purposes of this case it is not necessary to consider if the omission is intentional & what is the effect of it. Cl. (2), Art. 31 reproduces with modifications sub-s. (2), S. 299 & for convenience of comparison I place them side by side:

"Section 299 (2): Neither the Dominion Legislature nor a Provincial Legislature shall have power to make any law authorising the compulsory acquisition for public purposes of any land, or any commercial or industrial undertaking, or any interest in, or in any Co. owning, any commercial or industrial undertaking, unless the law provides for the payment of compensation for the property acquired & either fixes the amount of the compensation, or specifies the principles on which, & the manner in which, it is to be determined.

Art. 31 (2): No property, moveable or immovable, including any interest in, or in any Co. owning, any commercial or industrial undertaking, shall be taken possession of or acquired for public purposes under any law authorising the taking of such possession or such acquisition, unless the law provides for compensation for the property taken possession of or acquired & either fixes the amount of the compensation, or specifies the principles on which & the manner in which, the compensation is to be determined & given."

Cl. (2) is wider in its application than sub-s. (2) in so far as it extends to property, movable & immovable, & to the requisitioning of property as well as to the acquisition thereof; this difference is irrelevant for the present enquiry. We are concerned with the two requirements which according to these enactments are essential for the validity of legislation of the type contemplated, namely (1) the acquisition or taking possession must be "for public purposes", & (2) the law must provide for compensation for the property taken & either fix the amount of compensation or specify the principles on which & the manner in which the compensation is to be determined & given. Are both these requirements "provisions" within the meaning of Cls. (4) & (6), Art. 31? This question was recently before a S. B. of this Ct. in 'Kameshwar Singh v. Province of Bihar', AIR (37) 1950 Pat 392: (29 Pat 790) & B. P. Sinha & Das, JJ. held that only the latter requirement is a "provision" of sub-s. (2), S. 299 within the meaning of Cl. (6), Art. 31. According to both these learned Judges the requirement of a public purpose is assumed by the sub-section to be inherent in compulsory acquisition &, therefore, the certificate under Cl. (6) protects only against a contravention of the second requirement. The position is exactly the same in Cl. (2), Art. 31, a conclusion in which I am supported by the observation of Mukherjee, J. in 'Charanjit Lal v. Union of India', AIR (38) 1951 S C 41 at p. 54: (1950 S C R 869):

"One limitation imposed upon acquisition or taking possession of private property which is implied in the clause is that such taking must be for public purpose."

Hence, the protection under Cl. (4), Art. 31 extends only to contraventions of the provision relating to compensation. Its operation even to this limited extent &, if it operates, the extent of its operation have been challenged before us; I will deal with the challenge in the appropriate place in my judgment.

(21) On behalf of the Govt., it has been urged by the learned Attorney-General that the question of public purpose & compensation does not arise & no protection under Art. 31, Cl. (6) is necessary. According to him, the impugned Act has been enacted not under Entry 36 of List II & Entry 42 of List III, but under Entry 18 of List II:

"Land, that is to say, rights in & over land, land tenures including the relation of landlord & tenant, & the collection of rents; transfer & alienation of agricultural land; land improvement & agricultural loans; colonization."

It is true that in 'Megh Raj v. Allah Rakhia', 74 I A 12: (AIR (34) 1947 P C 72), Lord Wright held that the corresponding Item No. 21 in List II, Govt. of India Act, 1935 should be interpreted in the widest sense & includes mtges. of land as an incidental & auxiliary subject, but he qualified his observation about wide construction by adding

"unless for some reason it is cut down either by the terms of item 21 itself or by other bars of the Constitution which has to be read as a whole."

In that case there was no express provision in the Constitution relating to mtges. Here, on the contrary, we have special items relating to acquisition of property both in the Union List & in the List relating to the State. Similarly, Guyer, C. J. in 'United Provinces v. Atiya Begum', 1940 F C R 110 at p. 134: (A I R (28) 1941 F C 16), observed that the subjects dealt within the three legislative Lists of the Govt. of India Act, 1935 are not "always" set out with scientific definition, & observed that "each general word should be held to extend to all ancillary or subsidiary matters 'which can fairly & reasonably be said to be comprehended in it'."

We have, therefore, to read the Constitution as a whole & to take the entry in question along with the other entries. Doing so, what we find is a comprehensive entry under the main head "land" with sub-heads indicating what that main heading is intended to cover. Side by side with this we have special entries in all the three Lists relating to the acquisition or requisitioning of property. Similarly, in the Govt. of India Act, 1935, which immediately preceded the present Constitution, we find an entry for acquisition of land in addition to the entry "Land". Going further back to the earliest delimitation of Legislative powers between the Central & the Provincial Legislatures contained in the Devolution Rules, 1920, we find:

"Part I. CENTRAL SUBJECTS.

16. Civil law, including laws regarding status, property, civil rights & liabilities, & civil procedure.

44. Immovable property acquired by, & maintained at the cost of, the Governor-General in Council.

Part II. PROVINCIAL SUBJECTS.

8. Land revenue administration, as described under the following heads, namely:

(a) assessment & collection of land revenue;

(b) maintenance of land records, survey for revenue purposes, records of rights;

(c) laws regarding land tenures, relations of landlords & tenants, collection of rents;

(d) Courts of Wards, incumbered & attached estates;

(e) land improvement & agricultural loans;

(f) colonisation & disposal of Crown lands & alienation of land revenue; &

(g) management of Govt. estates.

15. Land acquisition: subject to legislation by the Indian Legisature."

Considering all this, the conclusion is irresistible that legislation regarding land acquisition does not come within the general Entry 18 of List II.

(22) Like the learned Attorney-General, Mr. N. C. Chatterji has argued that Art. 31 (4) has no application to the impugned Act but with the opposite result namely that protection necessary but it is not afforded by this provision. He relies on the fact that there are certain differences between the bill which was pending in the Bihar Legislature at the commencement of the Constitution & the bill as passed by the Legislature & assented to by the President. He has drawn our attention to four such differences. Cl. (3), Sub-cl. (1) of the bill then pending included a proviso which required the Provincial Govt. when issuing a notfn. in respect of the estates or tenures of a proprietor tenure-holder, to issue simultaneously such notfn. in respect of the estates or tenures of all other proprietors or tenure-holders falling within that income group. There is no such proviso in the corresponding provision S. 3, sub-s. (1) of the Act. Secondly, the proviso to S. 13 of the Act empowers the State Govt. to entrust the management of the expropriated estates & tenures to a 'gram panchayat'. Under the corresponding proviso in the bill, the management could also be entrusted to a co-operative society. Thirdly, Cl. 32, Sub-cl. (2) of the bill made the compensation payable in bonds of guaranteed face value at maturity carrying interest at 2½ per cent, per annum with effect from a date to be prescribed by the State Govt. The corresponding provision of the Act makes the compensation payable in forty equal instalments & the interest runs from the date of issue. Fourthly, S. 33 of the Act & the corresponding provision in the bill fix different dates up to which 'ad interim' interest will run. Art. 31, Cl. (4) of the Constitution protects "any bill pending at the commencement of this Constitution 'which' has, after it has been passed....., been reserved for the consideration of the President & has received his assent". I do not see anything in this which requires that the Act as passed must be identical with the bill that was pending at the commencement of the Constitution. The alterations to which Mr. Chatterji has drawn our attention are not such, in my opinion, as to make the Act that was passed distinguishable from the bill which was pending.

(23) Point No. 2: According to Mr. P. R. Das, the legislative heads which cover legislation of this kind are Entry 36 of List II & Entry 42 of List III. I reproduce them below:

"LIST II — STATE LIST.

36. Acquisition or requisitioning of property except for the purposes of the Union, subject to the provisions of Entry 42 of List III.

LIST III — CONCURRENT LIST.

42. Principles on which compensation for property acquired or requisitioned for the purposes of the Union or of a State or for any other public purpose is to be determined, & the form & the manner in which such compensation is to be given."

He urges that these two entries taken together make the existence of a public purpose & the payment of compensation for the property acquired the basis & foundation of the power of legislation given under these entries. He would interpret the words "subject to the provisions of Entry 42 of List III" as imposing upon legislation in exercise of the power conferred by Entry 36 the necessity of making a provision for compensation. On this line of reasoning, he contends, the existence of a public purpose & the necessity for provision regarding compensation are requirements imposed on such legislation by the legislative heads & any contravention of these requirements is open to challenge in spite of the President's assent under Cl. (4). He has, therefore, invited us to an examination of the question as to whether these ingredients are present in the case before us & has contended that both these ingredients being absent, there was no jurisdiction to legislate.

(24) Doubt is thrown upon Mr. Das's interpretation by Entry 33 of the Union List which is:

"Acquisition or requisitioning of property for the purposes of the Union."

Had the words on which Mr. Das has laid stress in Entry 36 of the State List been intended to impose the restriction suggested, we would have expected to find a similar provision in Entry 33 of the Union List. It has been suggested that the difference between Entry 33 of the Union List & Entry 36 of the State List is due to bad drafting & oversight, but this is not borne out by the Draft Constitution prepared by the Drafting Committee of the Constituent Assembly in 1948. This shows two entries in the original draft:

"UNION LIST No. 43: Acquisition or requisitioning of property for the purposes of the Union."

"STATE LIST, Entry No. 9: Compulsory acquisition of land except for the purpose of the Union."

there was no separate entry in the legislative Lists relating to compensation & the necessity of providing for compensation was imposed by Draft Art. 24, Cl. (2), which is substantially in the same terms as C. (2), Art. 31 of the Constitution. The Drafting Committee inserted draft Entry 35 in the Concurrent List:

"The principles on which compensation is to be determined for property acquired or requisitioned for the purpose of the Union or a State."

& recommended the addition to the entries in the Union & the State Lists of the words:

"Subject to the provisions of List III with respect to regulation of the principles on which compensation is to be determined for property acquired or requisitioned for the purposes of thte Union/a State."

The debates in the Constituent Assembly when these three entries in the Legislative Lists were considered & took their final form do not show why the suggested qualification of the entry in the Union List was dropped though the modification was made in the entry in the State List. A little consideration, however, makes the reason clear. The entries in the original form in which they came up to the Drafting Committee spoke only of "acquisition or requisitioning of property". The payment of compensation for property acquired would necessarily come under this entry. As the entries stood, it would have been open to the State Legislature legislating under the entry in the State List to provide for compensation for the property acquired &, the legislation being on a matter in the exclusive list appertaining to the State, the State Legislature would be free of control by the Indian Parliament. It was felt that this was not desirable &, therefore, the modification suggested by the Drafting Committee in the State Legislative List was accepted. On the other hand, the modification was not necessary in the entry in the Union List, since it would make no difference whether the Indian Parliament legislates regarding compensation in respect of acquisition for the purposes of the Union in the Union List or in the Concurrent List.

(25) On my construction of the entry in the State List, the words "subject to" have the effect of excluding from the legislative power under Entry 36 of the State List, matters covered by Entry 42 of the Concurrent List. This interpretation is consistent with the meaning of this term in Entries 17, 22, 23, 24 & 33 of the State List & a similar limitation on the powers of the State Legislature seems to be imposed in Entries Nos. 11, 26, 27 & 57 of the State List.

(26) Under the Govt. of India Act, 1935, the power to legislate in respect of acquisition was vested entirely in the Provincial Legislature under item 9 of the Provincial List: "Compulsory acquisition of land", the Dominion being given power u/s 127 of the Act to require the Province to acquire land on behalf of the Dominion for the purposes of the Dominion. Control over the Provincial Legislature was, however, retained by Sub-s. (3), S. 299, requiring sanction for introduction of the bill in the legislature, by the provisions in Ss. 75 & 76 for assent to bills & in S. 77 for the disallowing of acts & by directions to Governors & the Governor-General in their Instruments of Instruction.

(27) Mr. Das approaches the interpretation of the qualifying clause in Entry 36 in another way. He points out that, whereas S. 299, Sub-s. (2) expressly related to legislative power & provided that the Legislature "shall not have power to make any law" for compulsory acquisition without complying with certain requirements, Cl. (2), Art. 31 provides that without such a provision no property "shall be taken possession of or acquired", words affecting the operation of the law. Therefore, he urges, Art. 31 merely lays down a fundamental right of a citizen of India & it is Entry 42 of the Concurrent List which places a limitation on the legislative power of the State Legislature. According to him, the fundamental right guaranteed by this clause, that no person shall be deprived of his property save by authority of law, assumes the existence of an authority to make such a law & that authority is to be sought for in Entry 36 of the State List read with Entry 42 of the Concurrent List. I am not impressed with the distinction pointed out between S. 299 & Art. 31. Art. 31 occurs in Part III of the Constitution dealing with Fundamental Rights & Art. 13, Cl. (2) in this Part provides that "The State shall not make any law which takes away or abridges the rights conferred by this Part & any law made in contravention of this clause shall to the extent of the contravention be void." Reading this provision with the provisions of Art. 31, there is a clear limitation on the legislative powers of the State Legislature, & it is not necessary to derive this limitation from the entries in the legislative lists.

(28) An attempt has been made to distinguish between the expression "subject to" as occurring in Entries 11 & 26 of the State List & the same words in Entry 36. It is argued that in the case of the former two entries the field of legislation is narrowed down by the exclusion of certain subjects from that field, but there is no such subtraction in the case of Entry 36 & the power of the State under this entry to acquire or requisition property extends to all properties within the State. The legislative field, however, must not be considered as extending only in the dimension of space. The legislative field under a particular entry extends to different topics ancillary or cognate to the subject-matter named. Thus, in the case of acquisition under Entry 9 of the Provincial List under the Govt. of India Act, 1935, it would extend to provision for giving compensation for the land acquired. The qualification of the corresponding entry in the present Constitution excludes from the field of legislation the topic of compensation & there is a cutting down as in the case of Entries 11 & 26.

(29) In my opinion, the legislative heads contained in Entry 36 of the State List & Entry 42 of the Concurrent List empower the Legislature to pass laws relating to the subject-matter contained therein without placing any restrictions on the powers of the Legislature within the limits of those heads. As these entries stand, it would be open to the Legislature to legislate for acquisition without at the same time legislating about compensation. The limitation which makes provision about compensation essential is imposed by Cl. (2) of Art. 31 read with Cl. (2); Art. 13. This requirement is, therefore, a "provision" of Cl. (2), Art. 31.

(30) Another approach to the same conclusion, namely that there is no legislative authority for this Act, was attempted by way of Arts. 245 & 13 of the Constitution. Art. 245 provides that, subject to the provisions of the Constitution, the Legislature of a State may make laws for the whole or any part of the State, & Cl. (2), Art. 13 that all laws of the State which take away or abridge the Fundamental Rights conferred by Part III shall to the extent of the contravention be void. The argument is that the impugned Act is void because it contravenes the Fundamental Right to property under Cl. (2), Art. 31. The answer to the contention is that a limitation on the Fundamental Right is imposed by Cl. (4), Art. 31 & legislation will not be open to attack under Art. 13 if it keeps within that limitation.

(31) Yet another line of attack is that the Act is purely confiscatory & not covered by any entry in the Legislative Lists. In support of this contention reliance has been placed on an observation of Shearer, J. in 'Kameshwar Singh v. Province of Bihar', AIR (37) 1950 Pat 392 at p. 398: (29 Pat 790). That was a decision under the Govt. of India Act of 1935, the relevant legislative entry in which was: "Compulsory acquisition of land" (Entry 9 in List II) & the Act impugned was not in the nature of acquisition but merely sought to place 'zamindaris' under state management for a period of time. The Act with which we are concerned, on the other hand, is for the nationalisation of land. It seeks to put the Govt. in the place of the present owners of the land. It transfers to Govt. the rights of the proprietors & tenure-holders. Even where lands in their immediate possession are left with them the nature of their rights in the lands are altered; such rights as they had are transferred to the State Govt. & they become tenants under the Govt. The transaction, therefore, even in respect of these lands is an acquisition of their interests with a re-letting of the property to them. In my view, what is done by this Act clearly comes within Entry 36 of List II of the Constitution. Two bills with similar objects were before the State legislatures at the time when the Constituent Assembly considered & passed Art. 31, one in Madras & the other in the United Provinces. Besides this, in Bihar, the Bihar Abolition of Zamindaris Act, 1948 had received the assent of the Governor-General in July 1948. It was to protect these pieces of legislation that safeguards were provided in Cls. (4) & (6), Art. 31. The legislation in question was of a type new to this country but it was not of a type that had not been thought of previously. Provision relating to such legislation is contained in Sub-s. (3), S. 299 of the Govt. of India Act, 1935, & the limitation placed by this sub-section on the power of passing such legislation assumed that there was power to pass such legislation. The Constituent Assembly similarly placed restrictions on such legislation in Art. 31 & made provision to protect certain legislation of this kind. In these circumstances, I find it difficult to hold that the Constituent Assembly did not provide any legislative head within which such legislation is included.

(32) Point No. 3: Mr. Das formulated a ground which, he urged, goes to the root of the impugned legislation. The Constituent Assembly, he urges, in enacting in Art. 31 that no person shall be deprived of his property save by authority of "law" meant by that word not the particular statute enacted to make the acquisition but the general law of the land, the 'lex terrae' of the Magna Charta, the common law of England as introduced into India in the guise of rules of equity, justice & good conscience; the impugned Act is contrary to the law in this sense & hence it is void under Art. 31, Cl. (1). In view of the S. C. having repelled a similar contention regarding the word

"law" in Art. 21 of the Constitution in 'A. K. Gopalan v. State of Madras', A I R (37) 1950 S C 27 at pp. 39, 72, 103 & 114: (51 Cr L J 1383), Mr. Das did not press his contention in this Ct. but reserved his right to press the point at a later stage if necessity arises.

(33) He contended, however, that the word "law" in this provision must at least mean a valid law, for "An unconstitutional Act is not a law; it confers no rights; it imposes no duties; it affords no protection; it creates no offence; it is in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it had never been passed." ('Norton v. Shelby County', (1886) 30 Law Ed 178 at p. 186: (118 U S 425).

Under the Constitution, he contends, there is no power to legislate for acquisition without a public purpose. Hence, if the Ct. is satisfied that there is no public purpose in the present case, the assent of the President cannot save the legislation. To this extent, I accept the contention & it will be necessary in the proper place to consider whether a public purpose has been made out.

(34) Point No. 4: The contention is that the word "law" in Art. 31, Cl. (4) means a valid law & that where the bill that was passed by the Legislature offends against Cl. (2) of that Article it is not a "law" at all & therefore cannot be saved by the assent of the President; Cl. (4) assumes the existence of a law which can be saved by his assent whereas, if Cl. (2) is contravened, there is no law to be saved. This interpretation would have the effect of making Cl. (4) nugatory. From the context it is clear that the word cannot be read in this strict sense, for the protection given by Cl. (4) assumes that the "law" is open to attack & therefore is not law in the strict sense. The word seems to have been used as a compendious way of describing legislation which has passed through the legislature of a State & has not yet received assent. A similar use of the word "law" is to be found in the Govt. of India Act, 1915, S. 80 A, Sub-s. (3), which provides that the local legislature shall not without the previous consent of the Governor-General consider any "law" relating to any of the subjects detailed in the sub-section. In Cl. (3), Art. 31 also, we find "law" being used in this sense for this clause speaks of a law being reserved for the consideration of the President & receiving his assent though it does not become a "law" in the strict sense till it has received his assent. I may also mention Art. 13, Cl. (2) of the Constitution which speaks of a "law" made in contravention of the clause as being "void".

(35) Point No. 5: I have held above that the assent of the President under Art. 31, Cl. (4) does not protect the Act against attack on the ground that there is no public purpose. It is, therefore, necessary to enquire if there was a public purpose. The proper attitude of the Cts. in such an investigation has been considered frequently by the American Cts. & may be taken as well established. Every intendment is in favour of the Constitutionality of the impugned Act; it will be presumed to be valid unless its invalidity is plain & apparent ('United States v. Gattysburg Electric Rly. Co.', (1896) 40 Law Ed 576 at p. 581: (160 U S 669)). Where the Legislature has declared the purpose to be a public one by implication, if not by express words, its decision is entitled to deference unless it is shown to involve an impossibility. ('Old Dominion Land Co. v. United States of America', 70 U S Law Ed 162 at p. 165). Any departure from this judicial restraint would result in Cts., deciding on what is & is not a governmental function & in their validating legislation on the basis of their view on that question at the moment of decision, a practice which has proved impracticable in other fields ('United States Ex. Rel. T. V. A. v. Welch', 90 U S Law Ed 843 at p. 848), Weaver sums up the position thus:

"What constitutes a public use is largely a question for the legislature & the Cts. will not interfere except to enquire whether the legislature could reasonably have considered the use a public one." (S. P. Weaver's Constitutional Law & its Administration.)

(36) The first question is: What is a public purpose? The position is well illustrated by the words of Batchelor J. approved by Lord Dunedin in 'Hamabai Framjee v. Secy. of State', 42 I A 44: (A I R (1) 1914 P C 20):

"General definitions are, I think, rather to be avoided where the avoidance is possible, & I make no attempt to define precisely the extent of the phrase 'public purposes' in the lease; it is enough to say that, in my opinion, the phrase, whatever else it may mean, must include a purpose, that is, an object or aim, in which the general interest of the community, as opposed to the particular interest of individuals, is directly & vitally concerned."

I accept Mr. Das's contention that the acquisition of private property to increase public revenues is not acquisition for a public purpose (Willis on Constitutional Law, p. 817); that is a matter in the domain of taxation & legislation for that purpose would come under other legislative entries. This does not affect the impugned Act, the effect of which may be to increase public revenues but only incidentally, the real object of the Act being the nationalisation of the land. Continuing, Mr. Das has stressed that "public purpose" must be something definite & specific & drew our attention to several American authorities in support of this contention, of which I need refer only to Weaver:

"Eminent domain is generally defined as the right or power of a sovereign state to condemn private property for 'some particular public use' for the purpose of promoting the general welfare & to appropriate the ownership or possession of such property for such use upon paying the owner due compensation. It embraces all cases where, by the authority of the state, the property of the individual is appropriated for public good without the consent of the owner for the purpose of 'devoting it to some particular use' either by the state itself or by a corporation, public or private, or by an individual". (P. 541).

"The Cts., however, require that the use shall be fixed & definite." (P. 546).

"The extent of the power is limited by the necessities of the 'particular public purpose or use' in the land sought to be condemned." (P. 549).

The italics (here in quotations) are mine. Mr. Das has particularly stressed that mere state policy does not constitute a public purpose:

"The purpose must be public, & must have reference to the needs or convenience of the public, & no reason of general public policy will be sufficient to validate other transfers when they concern existing vested rights" (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, p. 744).

In connection with the authorities cited it is well to keep in mind the words of the learned author of Cooley's Constitutional Limitations prefacing his investigation of the meaning of "public use" in the sphere of eminent domain:

"We find ourselves somewhat at sea, however, when we undertake to define, in the light of the judicial decisions, what constitutes a public use." (P. 1129).

He appropriately ends his investigation with a judicial pronouncement from Missouri, that "no satisfactory definition of the term 'public use' has ever been achieved by the Cts." (P. 1139).

(37) In applying these citations it is necessary to remember that they relate to the exercise of the right of eminent domain in a setting of political ideas very different from those which lie behind the impugned Act. They relate to ordinary cases of compulsory acquisition of land such as we have known in this country ever since Bengal Regulation I of 1824, that is, the acquisition of particular land for a particular public purpose. The legislation now before us is of an entirely different type. It aims at the nationalization of land & at bringing Govt. face to face with the cultivator or the person in direct occupation of land. The authorities cited, therefore, will not furnish any real guidance in deciding whether there is a "public purpose" in the present case & we have to proceed primarily on the provisions of the Constitution. Some idea of the meaning of this expression is furnished by the legislative heads relating to acquisition in Sch. 7, to the Constitution. Entries 33 of the Union List & 36 of the State List speak of "purpose of the Union" & Entry 42 of the Concurrent List speaks of "purposes of the Union, or of a State or.....any other public purpose". Therefore, acquisition for a purpose of the Union or for a purpose of a State is acquisition for a public purpose. The intention appears to be to give the term "public purpose" a wide & comprehensive meaning. Another indication of the extent of that meaning is given by Cl. (5), Art. 19 which empowers a State to make laws imposing reasonable restriction on the exercise of the right of acquiring, holding & disposing of property "either for the interests of the general public or for the protection of the interests of any Scheduled Tribe". Cl. (2), Art. 23 uses the expression "public purposes" in connection with the imposition of compulsory service by the State, thus applying the term to the domain of police power as the American jurists call it. Hence, the investigation should be on the lines whether the legislation is designed for the performance of any functions of the State or of the Union & whether it aims at the securing of benefit to the general public of the State.

(38) The expression "public use" in the 5th amendment to the American Constitution has given rise to divergent views in that country. According to the earlier view, there must be a use by the public. The later & more liberal view takes it as sufficient if there is a general benefit to the public. The adoption by our Constituent Assembly of the expression "public purpose" points to a preference for the later view. The word "purpose" is wider in its connotation than the word "use". It is connected with the intention of the Legislature whereas "use" points to the result of the legislation. We have seen that even when the Cts. had to interpret the words "public use" they have taken the attitude that the Ct. must defer to the judgment of the Legislature unless it is shown to involve an impossibility. The use of the word "purpose" has a similar effect. Hence, I do not think that the authority of the Cts. extends to determining whether the legislation will achieve the end intended.

(39) The impugned Act does not speak in express terms of any public purpose. The Preamble & the Long Title merely recite the necessity for providing for the transference to the State of the interests of proprietors & tenure-holders in land & of the mtgees. & lessees of such interests including interests in trees, forests, etc., & to provide for the constitution of a Land Commission for the State of Bihar with powers to advice the State Govt. on the agrarian policy to be pursued consequent on such transference. The Act took the place of the Bihar Abolition of Zamindaris Act, & the bill by which it was introduced into the Legislature was prefaced by a Statement of Objects & Reasons explaining only why the proposed substitution was to be made, namely, the necessity for providing for the collection of rents in the acquired 'zamindaris' by 'gram panchayats' & co-operative societies & for the establishment of a body of officials & non-officials to advise the State Govt. in matters of land administration. For the objects & reasons underlying the Act, therefore, we have to go back to the bill by which the Bihar Abolitions of Zamindaris Act was introduced in 1947. This states:

"It is the policy of Govt. in the interest of the 'raiyats' & for the general material & social advancement of the province to remove all intermediaries between Govt. & 'raiyats'. Without a radical change in the system of land tenure no co-ordinated plan of agricultural reconstruction can be undertaken with a fair rent, fixity of tenure, proper maintenance of local irrigation systems & consequent increase of crop yield & extension of cultivation. It is essential for the good of the inhabitants of the Province that the maximum result from planned exploitation of the land & water resources of Bihar should be obtained. For this purpose it is essential to get rid of the middleman & to bring Govt. into direct touch with the 'raiyat'. For this reason Govt. have decided that the time has come to do away with the existing outmoded agricultural frame-work known as the zamindari system & to replace it by a 'raiyatwari' system analogous to that of Bombay & Madras Provinces."

The idea in short is to remove the middleman. In the Act, apart from the establishment of the Land Commission whose functions are purely advisory & a provision for the making over of collection of rent to 'grampanchayats', there is no express provision for the other reforms mentioned.

(40) Looking at the terms of the Act, therefore, it appears that all that the Act provides for is the transference of the interests of proprietors & tenure-holders to the Govt. with the underlying idea that the Govt. will thereby be able to provide better conditions under which the cultivators & other direct occupiers of the land may use the land & thus contribute to the general welfare of the State. The question whether this merely amounts to a public policy & not to a public purpose has been answered by the Constituent Assembly itself. Legislation of the type which we are considering, namely, the Bihar Abolition of Zamindaris Act, 1948, was before the Constituent Assembly at the time when the Constitution was being framed. Bills relating to such legislation were pending in the Legislatures of the Provinces of Madras & United Provinces. The Constituent Assembly provided protection for both these classes of legislation by means of Cls. (4) & (6), Art. 31. From Art. 31, Cl. (2), it is clear that the Constituent Assembly considered two requirements as essential for compulsory acquisition, namely, a public purpose & provision for compensation. The protection which the Constituent Assembly gave under Cls. (4) & (6) was confined to the latter requirement. Evidently, therefore, the Constituent Assembly thought that protection was not required under the other head, that is to say, the Constituent Assembly regarded the nationalization of land as itself constituting a public purpose. I would, therefore, hold that there is a public purpose for the impugned Act within the meaning of Cl. (2), Art. 31.

(41) Point No. 6: It is urged that under Art. 19 (1) (f) all citizens have the Fundamental Right to acquire, hold & dispose of property & that a State can only impose reasonable restrictions on that Right within the meaning of Cl. (5) of that Article. In view of the decision of the S. C. in the 'case of A. K. Gopalan', A I R (37) 1950 S C 27: (51 Cr L J 1383) regarding the relation between Art. 21 of the Constitution & the Fundamental Right of free movement guaranteed by Art. 19 (1) (d), there appears to be no substance in this point. Under the impugned legislation what is being done is that the property of the zamindars, tenure-holders & other persons is being taken away & is being vested in the State. No question therefore, arises of placing restrictions on the right of any subject to hold that property. The impugned legislation must stand or fall on the provisions of Art. 31.

(42) Point No. 7: Art. 14 of the Constitution provides that the State shall not deny to any person equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws within the territory of India. The meaning & effect of the guarantee of equal protection of the laws is thus set out by Willis in his work on Constitutional Law:

"The guaranty of the equal protection of the laws means the protection of equal laws. It forbids class legislation, but does not forbid classification which rests upon reasonable grounds of distinction. It does not prohibit legislation, which is limited either in the objects to which it is directed or by the territory within which it is to operate. It merely requires that all persons subjected to such legislation shall be treated alike under like circumstances & conditions both in the privileges conferred & in the liabilities imposed.' 'The inhibition of the amendment.....was designed to prevent any person or class of persons from being singled out as a special subject for discriminating & hostile legislation'. It does not take from the States the powers to classify either in the adoption of police laws, or tax laws, or eminent domain laws, but permits to them the exercise of a wide scope of discretion, & nullifies what they do only when it is without any reasonable basis. Mathematical nicety & perfect equality are not required. Similarly, not identity of treatment, is enough. If any state of facts can reasonably be conceived to sustain a classification, the existence of that state of facts must be assumed. One who assails a classification must carry the burden of showing that it does not rest upon any reasonable basis."

This passage has been approved by Fazl Ali, J. as a correct exposition of the principles underlying this guarantee in the 'case of Charanjit Lal', A I R (38) 1951 S C 41 at p. 44: (1950 S C R 869). His Lordship laid particular emphasis on the principle that "a proper classification must always rest upon some difference & must bear a reasonable & just relation to the things in respect of which it is proposed."

Mukherjee, J., with whom Kania, C. J. agreed, took substantially the same view. According to him, classification "must always rest on some real & substantial distinction bearing a reasonable & just relation to the things in respect to which the classification is made; & classification made without any substantial basis should be regarded as invalid."

Patanjali Sastri, J. similarly emphasised that the basis of the classification must have "a just & reasonable relation to the object which the legislature has in view."

(43) Mr. Das would have us go further & hold as unconstitutional the conferring of an arbitrary & unguided discretion by S. 3 of the impugned Act on the State Govt., giving it absolute discretion whenever it pleases to take action under the Act against whichever proprietor or tenure-holder it selects. In the opinion of the Ct. delivered by Matthews, J. in 'Yick Wo v. Hopkins', (1886) 118 U S 356: (30 Law Ed 220), there is more than one passage which supports the contention of Mr. Das, but the case was one, not merely of a grant of unguided discretion but also of an unjust & discriminatory exercise of that discretion against the petnrs. in error, & it is on these facts that the petnrs. in error were discharged from custody. Our attention was drawn to 'Homer Adolph Plassy v. John H. Ferguson', (1896) 41 Law Ed 256 at p. 260: (163 U S 537), in which Brown J. spoke of the decision in 'Yick Wo v. Hopkins', (1886) 118 U S 365: (30 Law Ed 220), as holding that the impugned Ordinance was unconstitutional if it gave the municipal authorities an arbitrary discretion. His Lordship's observation was 'obiter', as he was concerned not with the grant of an arbitrary discretion but with a discrimination alleged to be made by the impugned statute itself. Further, his Lordship's observation should be read with the passage that immediately precedes:

"The reply to all this is that every exercise of the police power must be reasonable, & extend only to such laws as are enacted in good faith for the promotion of the public good, & not for the annoyance or oppression of a particular class". Also, his Lordship pointed out that in that case the impugned Ordinance was held to be a covert attempt on the part of the municipality to make an arbitrary & unjust discrimination against the Chinese race. A different view of the decision in 'Yick Wo v. Hopkins', (1886) 118 U S 356: (30 Law Ed 220), was taken in 'New York ex rel. Lieberman v. Van De Carr', (1905) 50 Law Ed 305 at p. 311: (199 U S 552):

"These cases leave in no doubt the proposition ,that the conferring of discretionary power upon administrative boards to grant or withhold permission to carry on a trade or business which is the proper subject of regulation within the police power of the state is not violative of rights secured by the 14th Amendment. There is no presumption that the power will be arbitrarily exercised, & when it is shown to be thus exercised against the individual, under sanction of state authority this Ct. has not hesitated to interfere for his protection, when the case has come before it in such manner as to authorise the interference of a F. C. 'Yick Wo v. Hopkins', (1886) 118 U S 356: (30 Law Ed 220), 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1064."

This is in agreement with the observation of Kania, C. J. with whom Fazl Ali & Patanjali Sastri, JJ. agreed, in the case of 'N. B. Khare v. State of Delhi', A I R (37) 1950 S C 211 at p. 214: (1950 S C R 519):

"Moreover, this whole argument is based on the assumption that the Provincial Govt. when making the order will not perform its duty & may abuse the provisions of the section. In my opinion it is improper to start with such an assumption & decide the legality of an Act on that basis. Abuse of the power given by a law sometimes occurs; but that validity of the law cannot be contested because of such an apprehension."

B. K. Mukherjee & Mahajan, JJ., though they disagreed with the learned Chief Justice & the other two learned Judges regarding the reasonableness of the discretionary power given to the State Govt. by the impugned Act, proceeded on an examination whether the circumstances justified the conferring of such a power of restricting the liberty of free movement & not on the basis that the conferring of unguided discretion is by itself unconstitutional

(44) Applying the principle to the present case I am not prepared to say that the conferring of this power on the State Govt. was unreasonable. There is a large number of estates & tenures in the State & it is impossible for the State to acquire all of them at one time. Nor was it possible for the Legislature to lay down any order in which the estates & tenures should be acquired. An attempt was made to regulate this & S. 3 of the Bihar Abolition of Zamindaris Act, 1948 contained a proviso inserted at the instance of the President:

"Provided that where the Provincial Govt. proposes to issue such notfn. in respect of the estates or tenures of a proprietor or tenure-holder whose gross annual income in the opinion of the Collector exceeds a particular amount, the Provincial Govt. shall issue simultaneously such notfn. in respect of the estates or tenures of all other proprietors or tenure-holders falling within that income group."

This proviso was included in the Bihar Land Reforms Bill of 1949 when it was first introduced into the Assembly on 30-12-1949 but was omitted by the Assembly & does not appear in the bill passed on 20-4-1950. The reasons for which the proviso was omitted do nōt appear but the omission does not affect the validity of the discretion vested in the Govt. The restriction imposed by the proviso was merely a rough attempt to ensure equality of treatment by insisting that, when the property of a particular proprietor or tenure-holder is acquired, the property of all other proprietors or tenure-holders having an equal or greater gross annual income must be acquired also. The result of such a provision might well be extremely inconvenient for administrative reasons. If the object of the Act was to be attained, namely, to bring the State Govt. into direct touch with the occupiers of the land, it would be necessary in respect of each estate acquired to acquire at one time all the intermediate interests therein. Under the operation of the proviso, however, such action in one estate would necessitate the immediate acquisition of the intermediate interests of the same standing throughout the State of Bihar. In other words, the proviso, if retained, would have meant that in order to effect the object of the Legislature the State would have to acquire all intermediate interests in the land at one time throughout the State, thus defeating the object of the discretionary power given to the Govt.

(45) It has been suggested that here we have a case not merely of a delegation of absolute discretion but also of an exercise of arbitrary & unfair discrimination inasmuch as action under the Act has been taken only in respect of the zamindari properties & tenures held by the three pltfs. in the suits before us. I was at first impressed by this argument. For instance in notfn. No. 5068 L. R. Act T. R. D. 20 dated the 25-9-1950 relating to the Maharajadhiraj of Darbhanga we find that his proprietary interest in a large number of estates, extending to a fractional share in one instance as small as 2 gandas 2 kauris, has been acquired & yet the interests of his co-sharers have been left untouched. But it must be remembered that the notfns. in respect of these three persons were the very first steps taken by the State Govt. in administering the Act. It was necessary that the Govt. should begin somewhere &, after taking stock of the situation, proceed gradually to acquire other properties in accordance with administrative convenience. The notfn. relating to the Darbhanga Raj shows that the immediate effect would have been to put the Govt. in the place of the Maharajadhiraj in a large number of estates in which he was the sole proprietor. It would only be after getting into this position that the Govt. would be able to ascertain the nature & particulars of the subordinate tenures therein & to acquire them. It may be that similar considerations influenced the Govt. in their choice of the other two persons in respect of whom they have proceeded. The Ct. must presume that the action of the Govt. was constitutional & if unfair discrimination is alleged it is for the persons alleging it to establish the fact.

(46) The pltfs. are on a stronger ground when they attack the constitutionality of the classification made in Ss. 23 & 24 of the Act, relating to the computation of the net income & the compensation respectively.

(47) According to S. 22, "gross assets" of a proprietor means the aggregate of the rent including cesses which were payable in respect of the estate to such proprietor for the previous agricultural year by the tenure-holders & 'raiyats' holding immediately under him. The term includes certain notional sums in respect of lands left in the possession of the proprietor, 'gair mazrua malik, zamindari' offices, etc. S. 23 provides for the computation of a net income by the deduction from the gross assets of certain amounts as representing expenditure necessary to be met by the proprietor in the ordinary course, for example, land revenue, agricultural income-tax, income-tax in respect of non-agricultural income & so on. Among other items to be deducted are the cost of management at the following rate:

"Amount of gross asset —	Rate.
(i) where the gross asset does not exceed Rs. 2,000	5 per centum of such gross asset ;
(ii) where the gross asset exceeds Rs. 2,000 but does not exceed Rs. 5,000	7½ per centum of such asset ;
(iii) where the gross asset exceeds Rs. 5,000 but does not exceed Rs. 10,000	10 per centum of such gross asset ;
(iv) where the gross asset exceeds Rs. 10,000 but does not exceed Rs. 15,000	12½ per centum of such gross asset ;
(v) where the gross asset exceeds Rs. 15,000	not less than 15 and not more than 20 per centum of such gross asset,"

& the cost of works of benefit to the 'raiyats' of such estate or tenure at the following rates:

"Amount of gross asset —	Rate.
(i) where the gross asset does not exceed Rs. 5 000	4 per centum of such gross asset ;
(ii) where the gross asset exceeds Rs. 5,000 but does not exceed Rs. 10,000	6 per centum of such gross asset ;
(iii) where the gross asset exceeds Rs. 10,000 but does not exceed Rs. 15,000	8 per centum of such gross asset ;
(iv) where the gross asset exceeds Rs. 15,000 but does not exceed Rs. 20,000	10 per centum of such gross asset ;
(v) where the gross asset exceeds Rs. 20,000	12½ per centum of such gross asset."

(48) The small proprietors & tenure-holders may be assumed to be managing their properties personally or with the help of the members of their families, & their wealthier fellows to employ low paid or highly paid staff according to their means. This will explain the graded rates at which the cost of management is to be assessed on estates according to their gross assets, though it is debatable whether as the size of the estate increases the proportion which the cost of management will bear to the gross assets of the estate will continue to increase. I fail, however, to see any obvious connection between the costs of works of benefit to the 'raiyats' & the amount of the gross assets of the estate. The term "works of benefit" is vague & I find it difficult to understand what it is intended to mean. In this State it is not usual for agricultural tenants to enter into agreements with their landlords requiring the latter to provide for beneficial works & it is only in districts like Gaya, where a complicated system of irrigation is necessary, that a custom prevails under which the landlords become responsible for maintaining works of irrigation. That the landlord discharged this duty was ensured in the old days by making the rent payable for the land a produce rent, thus giving him a direct interest in keeping up the irrigation works. There is now the Bihar & Orissa Private Irrigation Works Act, 1922 (Bihar & Orissa Act V of 1922), under which the duty can be enforced by proper action. Anything that may be done by the landlord for the 'raiyats' beyond the maintenance of works of irrigation is largely a matter of charity & good feeling. The monetary value of such work as the landlord may do for the benefit of his 'raiyats' would, therefore, depend not on the gross assets of his estate but on his generosity & on the income available to him after meeting his necessary expenses. The provision made in S. 23 is not a case of enforced charity. The deductions proposed to be made are not deductions of money intended to be applied to works of benefit to the 'raiyats'; they are deductions by which the net income of the proprietor, which is to be the basis of calculating the compensation payable to him, is to be reduced. The effect of the provision is that the deduction under this head from the gross assets will vary from 4 per cent in the case of small proprietors to 12½ per cent in the case of the large proprietors. The conclusion is forced on one that these deductions are provided for reducing the amount of the compensation that the State will have to pay for the property acquired, & that the classification has been so made that the reduction will be proportionally greater in the case of the big proprietors than in the case of the small proprietors.

(49) The inequality between the two classes of proprietors will be further swelled by the appln. of the rates prescribed in S. 24 to which I now proceed. This section deals with the computation of the compensation to be paid for the property acquired. It prescribes that after the net income has been computed u/s 23 the compensation Officer shall prepare a compensation roll determining the amount of compensation in respect of each proprietor or tenure-holder, as the case may be, at certain multiples of the net income specified in the section. The multiples vary from twenty times where the net income does not exceed 500 rupees; to three times where the net income exceeds one lac of rupees. I can see no reasonable basis on which this application of different multiples to net incomes of differing amounts can be justified. The learned Attorney-General has made an attempt to support it by reliance on a principle which has been applied to progressive taxation vide (Will's Constitutional Law, p. 597), a principle that is commonly applied in India in the sphere of income-tax. He points out that unlike the American Constitution, the Const. Ind. provides for "compensation", not for "just compensation". It is not possible, he urges, for the States to pay full compensation & the Constituent Assembly deliberately avoided the use of the word "just". He urges that, this being so, the Legislature was justified in distributing the loss between the expropriated proprietors & tenure-holders according to the rule obtaining for progressive taxation, namely that a person better able to pay should pay in a larger proportion than a person with smaller means.

(50) I cannot agree that the omission of the word "just" has the effect contended for. The word "compensation" in respect of compulsory acquisition of property had a well accepted legal significance at the time when the Constituent Assembly framed the Const. Ind. In 'Lucas & Chesterfield Gas & Water In re', (1909) 1 K B 16: (77 L J K B 1009), Fletcher Moulton, L. J. defined it as the equivalent of the lands acquired i.e. "that which they were worth to him (the expropriated owner) in money". This definition is accepted by the P. C. ('Cedar Rapids Manufacturing Co. v. Lacoste', (1914) A C 569: (A I R (1) 1914 P C 199), though it does not agree with Fletcher Moulton, L. J. as to the principles on which the monetary value is to be computed 'Narayana Gajapatiraju v. Revenue Divisional Officer', A I R (26) 1939 P C 98: (I L R (1939) Mad 532). According to the Judicial Committee in 'Fraser v. City of Fraserville', (1917) A C 187: (86 L J P C 91), the compensation payable is to be based on "the value to the seller of the property in its actual condition at the time of expropriation with all its existing advantages & with all its possibilities but excluding any advantages due to the carrying out of the scheme for which the property is compulsorily acquired."

The principles according to which the compensation was to be assessed in India were set out in the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 (Act I of 1894), & it has always been well understood that the compensation represents the money value of the property acquired. In fact, it is usual to give the owner something more than the value of the property by way of a solatium for the compulsory nature of the acquisition. When the Constituent Assembly used the word "compensation", it must be taken to have used it in the accepted sense as representing the money value of the property. The giving of compensation for property compulsorily acquired was considered to be of sufficient importance to be guaranteed by a provision in the Part of the Constitution dealing with Fundamental Rights. It does not appear likely that the Constituent Assembly would by that very provision empower the legislature to give as compensation such amount as it thinks proper without any reference to the real value of the property acquired.

(51) We have been invited by the learned Advocate-General of Bihar to hold that the power given to the Legislature to legislate with regard to the principles on which compensation for the property acquired is to be determined makes the matter of compensation non-justiciable. The very fact that this matter has been included in Part III of the Constitution & that it has been thought necessary to provide protection to such legislation under Cls. (4) & (6), Art. 31 shows that the matter was intended to be justiciable. What Cl. (2) requires is provision for compensation & the Cts. are entitled to enquire, subject to Cl. (4), whether the payment for which the impugned legislation provides is "compensation" within the meaning of this clause. I cannot accept the contention that by reason of the omission of the word "just" the State Legislature is entitled to provide for payment to the expropriated proprietors & tenure-holders of "compensation" less in value than the monetary equivalent of the expropriated properties, & therefore to distribute the loss between the expropriated proprietors & tenure-holders in accordance with their respective abilities to bear the loss. It seems to me that the insertion of the word "just" in Cl. (2), Art. 31 would not have any difference. In support of my conclusion I cite the words of Brewer, J. in 'Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States', (1893) 37 Law Ed 463 at p. 468: (148 U S 312):

"The noun 'compensation', standing by itself, carries the idea of an equivalent. Thus we speak of damages by way of compensation, or compensatory damages, as distinguished from punitive or exemplary damages, the former being the equivalent for the injury done, & the latter imposed by way of punishment. So that if the adjective 'just' had been omitted, & the provision was simply that property should not be taken without compensation, the natural import of the language would be that the compensation should be the equivalent of the property. And this is made emphatic by the adjective 'just'."

To the same effect is this passage from Nichols on Eminent Domain, Volume III, at p. 29:

"Many of the State constitutions require that the compensation shall be 'just' 'reasonable' or 'adequate', but these words are mere epithets rather than qualfications & add nothing to the meaning. The phrase 'just compensation' means the value of the land taken & the damage, if any, to land not taken. More than this it does not imply. The adjective 'just' only emphasizes what would be true if omitted, — namely, that the compensation should be the equivalent of the property. It has been said in this regard that it is difficult to imagine an 'unjust compensation'. The word 'just' is used evidently to intensify the meaning of the word 'compensation', to convey the idea that the equivalent to be rendered for property taken shall be real, substantial, full, & ample, & that 'no legislature can diminish by one jot the rotund expression of the constitution'. Substantially the same meaning is attributed to the term 'due compensation' and 'adequate compensation'."

(52) Our attention has been drawn to the following observation about the corresponding expression "just terms" in the Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth:

"It is submitted that the view that a Commonwealth Act authorising acquisition of property & fixing a nominal sum for compensation would be a valid enactment, is correct. No measure of justice is laid down in the Constitution & it is not conceivable that the Ct. would question the judgment of Parliament on this matter. But if the Commonwealth passed an Act seizing property without fixing or referring to compensation or terms at all, this would undoubtedly be 'ultra vires', for such an Act could not be described as a law with respect to 'the acquisition of property on just terms' at all; it would require no investigation by the Ct. into questions of policy to see that such an enactment was not within the Commonwealth legislative power." (Wynes's Legislative & Executive Powers in Australia, p. 248).

This is merely a submission of the learned author & is not supported by any authority. On the contrary, the majority of the Judges in 'The Minister of State for the Army v. Dalziel', (68 Commonwealth L R 261), consd. & answered in the negative the question whether the compensation provided for by Reg. 60 H of the National Security (General) Regulations was "just terms" within the meaning of the Constitution of that Commonwealth.

(53) Willis in his book of Constitutional Law of the United States notes that in the sphere of eminent domain the problem of classification is not so important as in the spheres of police power & taxation & that as between the latter two spheres a wider discretion is allowed by the S. C. under taxation than is given under police power. The extent of the discretion permitted is indicated by the following passage occurring at pp. 802, 803 of this book:

"Taxation is reasonable when it is for a public purpose. Nothing else is required to make it reasonable. For taxation to be due process of law as a matter of substance, it does not have to be levied on the theory of protection, or benefits, or ability to pay, or public need, or physical power, but only for a public purpose. Ability to pay, or special benefits, may be sufficient basis for classification, but neither is required for due process of law. It is not essential to the validity of taxation that taxes be levied according to rules of abstract justice. Neither strict justice nor absolute equality is attainable. It is impossible to prevent the escape of some property from taxation while other property is being taxed twice. Owners may be taxed on property which has ceased to exist or which they have ceased to own. This cannot be prevented. All that the Constitution requires is that taxes shall be for a public purpose."

Nevertheless, in the very passage relied on by the learned Attorney-General, Willis mentions the existence of a doubt as to whether a progressive property tax would be constitutional or not. It will, therefore, be relevant to consider some cases of this nature. In 'Cumberland Coal Co. v. Board of Revision', (76 U S Law Ed 146), it was held that the deliberate & systematic assessment for taxation of all the coal lands in a township at the same sum per acre, notwithstanding differences in actual & market-value due to distances from transportation facilities & other factors was a contravention of the right of equal treatment under Amendment xiv inasmuch as some owners were assessed on the full value of their properties & others at a smaller value. In 'Stewart Dry Goods Co. v. Lewis', (79 U S Law Ed 1054), a gross sales tax which classified vendors for the imposition of a varying rate of taxation solely by reference to the volume of their transactions was held to violate the equality clause. In 'Cotting v. Godard', (1901) 46 Law Ed 92: (183 U S 79), the impugned Ordinance fixed the charges which could be made by stock-yard operators whose volumes of business exceeded certain limits. It was held that this was a contravention of the equality clause as the relation of the operator's charges was not to be measured by the aggregate of his profits but by the value to the person charged of the service rendered. The principle underlying these cases is the principle emphasized by the S. C. in 'the case of Charanjit Lal' (AIR (38) 1951 S C 41), namely that classification is permissible but it must be on a principle which bears some relation to the object sought to be attained. The object of the legislation here impugned is the giving of compensation, that is, something which will represent the value in money of the property that is being acquired. It cannot be said to be a reasonable classification which assesses that value at twenty times the net income in the case of the poor man & three times in the case of the rich man. The difference between taxation & eminent domain is thus defined by Weaver at pp. 543-544 of his Constitutional Law & Its Administration:

"Under Taxation the individual is required to make an enforced contribution of money or property as his share of the burden for the support of the Govt. Property taken under eminent domain is so much beyond the owner's share of the burden of govt., & for this reason he is entitled to compensation."

This explains why the principle of progressive taxation does not apply to compensation for land acquired. In my opinion, therefore, the objection that this provision contravenes the equality clause must be allowed.

(54) It has been suggested that the assent of the President under Cl. (4) of Art. 31 precludes the Ct. from going into the question of compensation &, therefore, from considering whether the provision regarding compensation contravenes Art. 14. I do not think the assent has this effect. The protection afforded by this clause is strictly confined to the ground that the impugned legislation "contravenes the provisions of Cl. (2)." The only "provision" of Cl. (2) is that the impugned law must provide for compensation for the property taken possession of or acquired & either fix the amount of compensation or specify the principles on which & the manner in which the compensation is to be determined & given. It is not for the absence of any of these essentials that the impugned Act is here being questioned.

(55) Another line of approach on the point of inequality is suggested by the following observation of Brewar, J. in 'Reagan v. Farmer Loan & Trust Co.', (1894) 38 Law Ed 1014 at p. 1024: (154 U S 362), John H.:

"The equal protection of the laws which, by the 14th Amendment, no state can deny to the individual forbids legislation, in whatever form it may be enacted, by which the property of one individual is without compensation wrested from him for the benefit of another, or of the public. This, as has been often observed, is a Govt. of law, & not a govt. of men, & it must never be forgotten that under such Govt., with its constitutional limitations & guarantees, the forms of law & the machinery of Govt., with all their breach & power, must in their actual workings stop on the hither side of the unnecessary & uncompensated taking or destruction of any private property, legally acquired & legally held."
On this line of reasoning, it may be contended that, if the Ct. on an examination of the terms of the impugned statute considers that the payment provided for by that statute is not compensation, the statute is void on the ground of discrimination. I shall not follow up this line, as it was not taken in the arguments before us. Also, I am doubtful whether, in view of the President's assent under Cl. (4), Art. 31, this Ct., can enquire whether the payment provided for is compensation.

(56) For the reasons I have given above, I hold that there is a contravention of the Fundamental Right under Art. 14.

(57) The question then arises what is the effect of the conclusion I have come to. Does it invalidate only the particular provision in which the contravention occurs? Or, does it invalidate the Act as a whole? In my opinion, it has the latter effect. The contravention which I have found relates to the determination & payment of compensation. The entire scheme of the Act is that the property of the landlords & tenure-holders is to be acquired & in exchange therefor they are to get compensation either in cash or in bonds payable in forty equal instalments. On my finding, the provisions relating to the determination of the amount of compensation are void. Therefore, an essential element of the Act disappears & the remainder cannot survive. I do not think that the assent of the President under Art. 31 (4) helps to save the Act, for I cannot take the view that the assent covers a case in which the provisions relating to compensation are found to be void. I have two reasons for this view. Firstly, I rely on the importance which the Constituent Assembly evidently attached to the giving of compensation in payment for property acquired. The eixstence of such a provision & of a public purpose were regarded by the Constituent Assembly as essential for a compulsory acquisition by law. It is not conceivable that the Constituent Assembly could have intended by Cls. (4) & (6), Art. 31 to protect a total absence of provision for compensation. This is corroborated by the fact that in the bills & in the Act which these two clauses were designed to protect there was provision for compensation. All that Cls. (4) & (6) do is to empower the President to decide whether the sum so provided is compensation or not & to this extent these two clauses make his decision non-justiciable. This is why I have refrained, except so far as was necessary for determining the point of inequality, from considering whether the sum to be determined according to the principles provided in the Act is compensation, as that term is understood in law. My second reason is allied to my first reason. The Constituent Assembly, as I have said, attached great importance to the provision for compensation but instead of making it justiciable, entrusted to the President the power to decide finally whether it is compensation. The President, by giving his assent under Cl. (4) or the certificate under Cl. (6), gives his approval to that provision. If, however, it is found that, for some reason unconnected with Cl. (2), Art. 31, the provision is void, an essential part of the Act has gone & the statute is no longer "the law" assented to or certified by the President.

(58) Point No. 8: Sub-s. (2), S. 32 provides:

"The amount of compensation so payable in terms of a Compensation Assessment-roll as finally published shall be paid in cash or in bonds or partly in cash & partly in bonds. The bonds shall be either negotiable or non-negotiable & non-transferable & be payable in forty equal instalments to the person named therein & shall carry interest at two & a half per centum per annum with effect from the date of issue."
The corresponding provision in the rule-making section is S. 43 (2):

"In particular & without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing power ,such rules may provide for all or any of the following matters, namely:

* * * * *

(p) the proportion in which compensation shall be payable in cash & in bonds & the manner of payment of such compensation under Sub-ss. (2) & (3), S. 32."
It is contended that this provision amounts to a delegation of legislative power to the State Govt. An objection on this ground was dealt with by the S. C. in 'State of Bombay v. Narottamdas', A I R (38) 1951 S C 69: (1951 S C J 103). Their Lordships were considering the Bombay City Civil Act, 1948, which empowered the Bomaby City civil Ct. to entertain suits & proceedings of a value up to Rs. 10,000. The point at issue was the validity of S. 4 of the Act, which empowered the Provincial Govt. to invest the City Civil Ct. with jurisdiction to receive, try & dispose of all suits & other proceedings of a civil nature arising within Greater Bombay & of such value not exceeding Rs. 25,000 as might be specified in the notfn. Mukherjea J. observed:

"I have no hesitation in holding that the Legislature in empowering the Provincial Govt. to invest the City Ct., by notfn., with jurisdiction of such value not exceeding Rs. 25,000 as may be specified in the notfn., has not delegated its legislative authority to the Provincial Govt. The provision relates only to the enforcement of the policy which the legislature itself has laid down. The law was full & complete when it left the legislative Chamber permitting the Provincial Govt. to increase the pecuniary jurisdiction of the City Ct. up to a certain amount which was specified in the statute itself. What the Provincial Govt. is to do is not to make any law; it has to execute the will of the Legislature by determining the time at which & the extent to which within the limits fixed by the legislature, the jurisdiction of the Ct. should be extended. This is a species of conditional legislation which comes directly within the principle enunciated by the Judicial Committee in 'The Empress v. Burrah', 5 I A 178: (4 Cal 172 P C) where the taking effect of a particular provision of law is made to depend upon determination of certain facts & conditions by an outside authority."

Mahajan, J. with whom Fazl Ali, J. substantially agreed pointed out that the Bombay Legislature must have applied its mind to the question of extending the City Civil Ct's pecuniary jurisdiction up to Rs. 25,000 when it fixed that limit, by limiting the jurisdiction initially to Rs. 10,000 & empowering the Provincial Govt. to increase that jurisdiction, it merely gave the Provincial Govt. power to determine the circumstances under which the enhanced powers should be given to the City Civil Ct.:

"The vital matters of policy having been determined, the actual execution of that policy was left to the Provincial Govt."

Similarly, Das, J. with whom Patanjali Sastri, J. agreed, observed that in enacting S. 4, the Legislature itself decided that it is fit & proper to extend the pecuniary jurisdiction of the new Ct., not necessarily & at all events or all at once but if & when the Provincial Govt. should think it desirable to do so; it was wrong to say that the legislature had not applied its mind or laid down any policy & the very fact that the extension of pecuniary jurisdiction should not exceed Rs. 25,000 indicated a decision that the jurisdiction of the Ct. should be limited to this extent.

(59) The test applied was: Was the legislation full & complete when it left the legislative Chamber? Did the Legislature apply its mind to the subject-matter of the legislation & lay down a policy, merely leaving duties of an executive character to the State Govt? The legislative powers vested in the State Legislature were to make provisions relating 'inter alia' to "the form & manner" in which compensation is to be given. The impugned sub-section relates to "the form & manner" in which compensation is to be given. The Act provides that compensation may be given in cash or by deferred payment or partly in cash & partly by deferred payment. These are not the only forms in which compensation can be given. Thus under Sub-s. (3), S. 31 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 (Act 1 of 1894) other property may be given in exchange, or there may be a remission of Govt. dues on other lands. In deciding on the particular forms between which the State Govt. may choose the legislature has applied its mind to the question & has prescribed the limits within which the State Govt. may exercise the discretion vested in it. So also as regards the manner in which compensation shall be given the Act contains elaborate directions regarding payment. The term payment & its derivatives have been used widely & seem to cover the delivery of cash as well as the making over of the bonds, if any. It is further provided that, if there are bonds they will be redeemed in 40 equal instalments, but it is left to the State Govt. to determine the intervals between the instalmnts. That is to say, the legislature has determined that the bonds must be redeemable, & that the instalments should be of a particular size. It has left it to the legislature (sic) to decide when those instalments will be paid. Further, the legislature has provided that the bonds shall "carry" interest at 2½ per cent 'per annum' leaving it to the legislature (sic) to decide when & at what intervals the interest will be paid. Finally, it has provided that if bonds are issued they may be negotiable or non-negotiable, as the State Govt. may decide. The matters left to the discretion of the State are matters dependent on the condition of the State finances & on political & economic considerations of which the State Govt. may be taken to be a proper Judge. The discretion given is very wide & at first I was inclined to doubt its constitutionality but, on a careful examination, I think that it satisfies the test in 'Narottamdas's case', (A I R (38) 1951 S C 69: 1951 S C J 103). In these circumstances, it is not necessary to consider the wider question as to the power of the legisature to authorise the executive to perform "a function which, if not subordinate, would be essentially legislative" 'Victoria Stevedoring & General Contracting Co. Proprietary, Ltd. & Meakes v. Dignam', (46 C L R 73 at p. 100).

(60) Point No. 9: The argument is that the Bihar Legislature committed a fraud on the Constitution by pretending to comply with Cl. (2), Art. 31 & to provide for compensation, although in fact the sums determined by those principles as payable to the expropriated proprietors & tenure-holders are not compensation. This point necessarily involves an investigation of the question whether the sums determined by the principles laid down in the Act are compensation or not, an investigation which I have held that the Ct. is precluded from making by reason of the assent under Cl. (4), Art. 31 of the Constitution. Apart from this consideration, I think there is no substance in the contention. There is no fraud on the Constitution because the Bihar Legislature had done exactly what the Constituent Assembly intended. The Constituent Assembly was anxious that legislation of the class to which the impugned Act belongs should be protected from challenge in the Cts. so far as provision for compensation is concerned. Therefore, it entrusted the President with the responsibility for determining whether this essential of legislation for the acquisition of property was complied with. The bill passed by the Bihar Legislature was duly submitted to the President for his scrutiny & we may take it that when the President gave his assent, he was satisfied that there was provision for compensation. That the sum determinable under the provisions of the Act might not be compensation as understood by the Ct. is irrelevant.

(61) Point No. 10: The enforceability of the Act has been attacked on the ground that Sub-s. (2), S. 32 does not fix the intervals at which the forty equal instalments become payable. The omission to fix the intervals is really relevant under point No. 8. Either this is conditional legislation & the State Govt. may lawfully determine what the period is to be or it is a delegation of legislative power. In view of the conclusion which I have arrived at there this point is of no importance.

(62) I am now in a position to record my findings on the issues framed.

Issue No. 1: Is the Bihar Land Reforms Act of 1950 (Bihar Act XXX (30) of 1950) 'ultra vires' the legislative powers of the State of Bihar?

Answer: The Act is covered by Entries 36 of List II & 42 of List III in Sch. 7 to the Constitution. It is, therefore, not 'ultra vires' of the Legislative powers of the State Legislature.

Issue No. 2: Is the said Act unconstitutional, unreasonable, inoperative & void for the reasons mentioned in para. 5 of the plaint or any of them?

Answer: The Act is void on the ground that it contravenes the provisions of Art. 14 of the Constitution.

Issue No. 3: Have the properties of the pltf. vested in the State of Bihar under the said Act? If so, have they so vested under the authority of law?

Answer: It follows from the finding on issue No. 2 that the properties of the pltfs. have not vested in the State of Bihar.

Issue No. 4: Can any question regarding compensation or principles for the determination & giving of compensation be raised in this suit in view of the assent of the President under Cl. (4), Art. 31 of the Constitution?

Answer: The assent protects the Act from challenge on the ground that it contravenes the provision of Cl. (2), Art. 31. There can be no challenge regarding the adequacy of the compensation or the correctness of the principles prescribed by the Act for determining the compensation or of the manner in which the Statute directs that the compensation is to be given. The assent does not protect the Act if there is no provision for compensation. It does not protect the Act from attack on a ground not arising under Cl. (2), Art. 31.

Issue No. 5: Is the pltf. entitled to any of the reliefs prayed for?

Answer: The pltfs. are entitled to have their suits decreed as proposed by Shearer, J.

(63) DAS J: The Act which is impugned in all these cases is the Bihar Land Reforms Act, 1950 (Bihar Act XXX (30) of 1950). For brevity & convenience, I shall hereinafter refer to it as the impugned Act. I venture to think that a brief history of the impugned legislation will not be out of place here.

(64) History of the legislation: An Act called the Bihar Abolition of Zamindaris Act, 1948 (Bihar Act XVIII (18) of 1949) was passed by the Bihar Legislature, & received the assent of the Governor-General on 6-7-1949. This assent was first published in the Bihar Gazette Extraordinary, of 22-7-1949. That Act, which was the predecessor of the impugned Act, contained provisions similar to the provisions of the impugned Act; but as the former Act was repealed by the latter, I confine myself to the impugned legislation only.

(65) On 9-12-1949, the Bihar Land Reforms Bill was published under R. 83 of the Bihar Legislative Assembly Rules. On 30-12-1949, the Bill was introduced & refd. to a Select Committee. On the 31-1-1950, the report of the Select Committee on the Bihar Land Reforms Bill, 1949, was submitted, & the same was published on 1-2-1950. On 20-4-1950, the Bill was passed by the Assembly. On 4-5-1950, the Bill was passed with certain amendments by the Council. On 9-5-1950 the Bill was finally passed by both Houses of the Bihar Legislature. On 11-9-1950, it received the assent of the President of India. On 3-10-1950, a Bill called the Bihar Land Reforms (Amendment) Bill, 1950, purporting to amend the long title of, the preamble to, & certain provisions of the impugned Act was introduced; this amending Bill was not, however, proceeded with, did not pass through all the stages of legislation, & remained a still-born child. On 25-9-1950, the impugned Act with the assent of the President of India was first published. On that date, certain other notfns. were also published; first, there was a notfn. under Sub-s. (3), S. 1 of the Act stating that the Act shall come into force on 25-9-1950; & then there were other notfns. under Sub-s. (1), S. 3 of the impugned Act stating that the estates & tenures, described in certain schedules to the notfns., belonging to some of the leading landlords of the State including the Maharajadhiraj Sir Kameshwar Singh Bahadur of Darbhanga, have with effect from 25-9-1950, passed to & become vested in the State of Bihar under the provisions of the impugned Act.

(66) A summary of the impugned Act: It is now necessary to give a summary of the provisions of the impugned Act. The Act is divided into eight chapters, & contains forty-three sections. The long title & the preamble are practically the same, & the latter reads:

"Whereas it is expedient to provide for the transference to the State of the interests of proprietors & tenure-holders in land & of the mtgees. & lessees of such interests including interests in trees, forests, fisheries, jalkars, ferries, hats, bazars, mines & minerals, & to provide for the constitution of a Land Commission for the State of Bihar with powers to advice the State Govt. on the agrarian policy to be pursued by the State Govt. consequent upon such transference & for other matters connected therewith etc."

The recital in the preamble has an important bearing on the question, to be discussed later, of the aims, objects or purposes of the Act: the two important objects for which the Act provides, as stated in the preamble, are: (1) transference to the State of the interests of proprietors & tenure-holders in land & of the mtgees. & lessees of such interests; & (2) the constitution of a Land Commission with powers to advise the State Govt. on the agrarian policy to be pursued by the State. Chapter I deals with certain preliminary matters. U/s. 1 (3), the Act comes into force on such date as the State Govt. may by notfn. appoint. S. 2 is the definition or interpretation section. According to Cl. (h) of that section, "date of vesting" means the date of publication in the official Gazette of the notfn. under Sub-s. (1), S. 3 in respect of the estate or tenure. Cl. (i) & (q) define 'state' & 'tenure', & the important point to note about them is that they include a share in or of an estate or tenure, so that transference of a share in an estate or tenure, is permissible. The expressions 'lease' (in relation to mines & minerals) & 'mine' have an artificial meaning, the former including a sub-lease, prospecting lease & even an agreement to lease & the latter meaning an excavation where any operation for the purpose of searching for or obtaining minerals has been or is being carried on. It is not necessary to refer here to the other clauses of the definition section.

(67) Chap. II is headed "Vesting of an Estate or Tenure in the State & its consequence". It comprises Ss. 3 to 12, S. 3 is important. Under Sub-s. (1) of that section, the State Govt. may, from time to time, by notfn., declare that the estates or tenures of a proprietor or tenure-holder, specified in the notfn., have passed to & become vested in the State. Two points need to be stated here one is that the sub-section gives the State Govt. an unfettered discretion or power to declare that the estates or tenures of a proprietor or tenure-holder have passed & become vested in the State, so that it may pick & choose; the second is that the declaration is in respect of the estates or tenures of a proprietor or tenure-holder in other words, if the proprietor or tenure-holder has only a share in the estate or tenure, it is that share which vests in the State. If the proprietor or tenure-holder has shares in more estates or tenures than one, all those shares pass on the making of the declaration in respect of that proprietor or tenure-holder. As the learned Advocate General of Bihar put it, the scheme in Sub-s. (1), S. 3 is that a notfn. is to be made in respect of the estates or tenures 'of a proprietor or tenure-holder' (the '.....' are mine; the transference to State-ownership is not estate by estate or tenure by tenure, but rather proprietor by proprietor or tenure-holder by tenure-holder. S. 4 states the consequences of vesting in brief, these are: (a) the entire interest of the proprietor or tenure-holder, free from incumbrance ,including sub-soil rights, etc., passes to the State; (b) all arrears of rent, royalty, etc., vest in the State; (c) the liability to pay arrears of revenue & cesses does not, however, cease, & these can be recovered from the compensation money payable. (d) all suits & proceedings to recover money, the payment of which is secured by a mtge. or charge on the estate or tenure are barred; (e) the estate or tenure is not liable to attachment or sale; (f) the Collector has the right to take charge & possession & (g) the Collector has the power to make certain enquiries, & set aside the settlement or lease of any land comprised in the estate or tenure made or created any time after 1-1-1946. Ss. 5, 6 & 7 relate to (1) homesteads, (2) lands in the 'khas' possession of the proprietor or tenure-holder for agricultural or horticultural purposes, & (3) buildings or structures together with lands on which they stand in the possession of the proprietors & tenure-holders & used as golas, factories or mills, etc. These properties the proprietor or tenure-holder is entitled to retain, homesteads free of rent, but the other properties subject to the payment of rent as may be determined by the Collector in the prescribed manner. S. 8 provides an appeal against the order of the Collector. Ss. 9, 10, 11 & 12 deal with mines & minerals. The mines which are being directly worked by the proprietor or tenure-holder shall be deemed to have been leased by the State Govt. to the proprietor or tenure-holder; the terms & conditions being settled by agreement between the parties & in the absence of any such agreement, by a Mines Tribunal appointed u/s. 12. S. 10 deals with subsisting leases of mines & minerals comprised in the estate or tenure or any part thereof. These again will be deemed to have been leased by the State Govt. to the holder of the subsisting lease, the terms & conditions being the same as the terms & conditions of the subsisting lease, subject, however, to an important condition. The condition is that the State Govt. may terminate the lease if in its opinion the holder of the lease had not done any prospecting or development work, apparently without payment of any compensation to the lessee. The holder of any subsisting lease of mines & minerals is precluded from claiming damages from the outgoing proprietor or tenure-holder. Section 11 vests in the State all buildings & lands not included in the lease but which are in the use & occupation of the lessee for purposes connected with the working or extraction of the mines & minerals comprised in the lease.

(68) Chapter III contains only one section, S. 13, which says that all estates & tenures vested in the State shall be managed according to the rules for the management of Govt. estates. In a proviso to the section, there is a reference to a Gram Panchayat, & the State Govt. may, on such terms & conditions as it may fix, entrust the management of estates & tenures to the Executive Committee of a Gram Panchayat Chap. IV which contains Ss. 14 to 18 deals with secured creditors, the determination of their claims by a claims Officer, appeal against the decision of the claims officer, & the constitution of a Board for hearing such appeals.

(69) Chap. V is important, & deals with the assessment of compensation. The assessment appears to be based primarily on income — income falling in two main categories, namely (1) income from rents, cesses, etc., & (2) income from mines & minerals. S. 19 relates to the appointment of a compensation officer who will make the assessment. S. 20 says that in preparing an assessment every proprietor or tenure-holder shall be treated separately, & for the purposes of assessment the interests of the proprietor or tenure-holder in all estates and tenures shall be treated jointly; in other words, the Act again proceeds, as I have already explained, proprietor by proprietor or tenure-holder by tenure-holder. Ss. 22 & 23 explain how the net income of a proprietor or tenure-holder in respect of rents & cesses is to be computed; S. 22 explains what is meant by "gross assets", & S. 23 explains how the net income is to be be calculated by making certain deductions from the gross assets. In the gross assets enter such items as the aggregate of rents & cesses payable by raiyats, aggregate of rents determined by the Collector for certain kinds of land, gross income from fisheries, trees, jalkars, ferries, hats, bazars & sairati interests, gross income from forests calculated on the basis of average annual income of twenty-five agricultural years, & gross annual income of the previous agricultural year from any other interest. The deductions to be made u/s. 23 are land revenue, the sum payable as agricultural income tax, any sum payable as income tax under the Indian Income Tax Act, chaukidari tax, cost of management at certain rates to be presently mentioned, & lastly cost of works of benefit to the raiyats at certain rates laid down in the section. Now, the cost of management varies according to, & is dependant on, the gross assets. There is a slab system consisting of five slabs, beginning at the lower & with a case where the gross asset does not exceed Rs. 2,000/- & ending at the upper end with the case where the gross asset exceeds Rs. 15,000/-. There is a similar (but not same) slab system with regard to the cost of works of benefit to the raiyats. The lowest slab consists of an estate or tenure where the gross asset does not exceed Rs. 5,000. The highest slab is that of an estate or tenure where the gross asset exceeds Rs. 20,000. The rates vary according to the slabs. In the highest slab, the deduction for the cost of management is not less than 15 per cent & not more than 20 per cent of the gross asset; & for the cost of works of benefit of the raiyats, the deduction is $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the gross asset. Then, there is S. 24 which introduces a third slab system. When the net income computed in the manner laid down in S. 23 has been determined, the rate of compensation payable is a multiple of the net income. There are eleven slabs; in the lowest rung of the ladder is the case where the net income does not exceed Rs. 500, & in the highest rung is the case where the net income exceeds Rs. 1,00,000. The highest compensation payable is twenty times the net income, & the lowest is three times the net income; the lower the income, the higher is the compensation. With regard to arrears of rent, royalty, cess, etc. which also vest in the State, there is a provision that 50 per cent shall be paid & added to the compensation. From the compensation money are to be deducted any arrears of land revenue the amounts to be paid in satisfaction of the claims of creditors, etc. With regard to mines & minerals, a computation is to be made of the gross income & net income from royalties, & the gross income & net income from mines worked directly by the proprietor or tenure-holder; thereafter, the amount of compensation payable shall be determined by agreement, if possible, but if no agreement is possible, then by a Tribunal. It is worthy of note that there is no provision for payment of compensation in respect of the following: (a) un-opened & un-developed mines & minerals from which there is no present income; (b) trees in the shape of standing timber which do not yield any present income, but which may be of great value when felled; & (c) half the arrears of rent which vest in & are recoverable by the State.

(70) Chapter VI deals with payment of compensation. S. 32 (2) lays down that the amount of compensation shall be paid in cash or in bonds or partly in cash & partly in bonds: the bonds shall be either negotiable or non-negotiable & non-transferable & be payable in forty equal instalments, & shall carry interest at 2½ per cent per annum with effect from the date of issue. The section does not state at what intervals of time, the forty equal instalmens shall be payable, nor does it lay down the proportion, if the compensation is to be paid partly in cash & partly in bonds. All these seem to have been left to be determined by the State Govt. by rules made u/s. 43 of the Act. S. 33 provides for making 'ad interim' payments to a proprietor or tenure-holder. Chap. VII deals with the constitution of a Binar Land Commission. The only function of the Commission will be to advise the State Govt. generally with regard to the agrarian policy which the State Govt. should follow in administering the system of land revenue in the State. The function is purely advisory, & the State Govt. will not be bound by the opinion of the Land Commission. Chap. VIII is the last chapter, which contains misc. provisions. S. 36 empowers the State Govt. to direct that any power which is conferred on it by the Act shall be exercised or discharged by any officer or authority subordinate to the State Govt. S. 43, another important section in this chapter gives the State Govt. power to make rules on many matters including the proportion in which the compensation shall be payable in cash & in bonds & the manner of payment of such compensation under Sub-ss. (2) & (3), S. 32.

(71) Legislative competence: absence of power in the Legislature which enacted the impugned Act: Now, the principal point for decision in these cases is if the impugned Act is unconstitutional. It has been contended that it is unconstitutional on various grounds. The first ground, which goes to the very root of the matter, is that the impugned Legislation is 'ultra vires' the legislature which enacted it. Mr. P. R. Das, appearing for the pltfs. in Title Suits Nos. 1 & 2 of 1951 & the petnrs. in some of the misc. Judicial cases, put his arguments on this part of his case, so far as I have been able to appreciate them, in the following way. Art. 245 of the Constitution, 'inter alia', states:

"Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, Parliament may make laws for the whole or any part of the territory of India, & the Legislature of a State may make laws for the whole or any part of the State."

Art. 246 & the Articles which follow that Article relate to what is known as distribution of legislative powers. Put briefly, the position is that Parliament has exclusive power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List I of Sch. 7 (called the Union List); Parliament, & subject to the power mentioned above, the Legislature of any State specified in Part A or Part B of Sch. 1 have power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List III of Sch. 7 (called the Concurrent List); subject to the above powers, the Legislature of any State specified in part A or part B of Sch. 1 has exclusive power to make laws for such State or any part thereof with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List II (called the State List). For our present purpose, it is not necessary to refer to the provisions of the Articles which follow Art. 246. I go straight to Sch. 7 & the three Lists. Mr. P. R. Das has refd. to Entry 36 of the State List which reads:

"Acquisition or requisitioning of property except for the purposes of the Union, subject to the provisions of Entry 42 of List III."

Entry 42 of the Concurrent List reads:

"Principles on which compensation for property acquired or requisitioned for the purposes of the Union or of a State or for any other public purpose is to be determined, & the form & the manner in which such compensation is to be given."

The contention of Mr. Das, stated very briefly, is that the power to make a law for acquisition of property under Entry 36 above, is subject to the provisions of Entry 42 of the Concurrent List, & the expression "subject to" means: (a) that the law so made must be for a public purpose, & (b) must determine the principles on which compensation for the property acquired is to be paid, & the form & manner in which such compensation is to be given. His argument is that the impugned Act compulsorily acquires the interests of proprietors & tenure-holders in land; but it is neither for a public purpose, nor does it lay down the principles, form & manner of "compensation", as that word is understood in law. According to him, the word 'compensation' has a known legal significance, & the Constituent Assembly must have used the term in that sense when it talked of principles, form & manner of compensation in Entry 42. He has refd. to the observations of Fletcher Moulton, L. J. 'In re an Arbitration between Lucas and the Chesterfield Gas & Water Board', (1909) 1 K B 16 at p. 28: (77 L J K B 1009). The observations are:

"The principles upon which compensation is assessed when land is taken under compulsory powers are well settled. The owner receives for the lands he gives up their equivalent, i.e. that which they were worth to him in money. His property is therefore not diminished in amount, but to that extent it is compulsorily changed in form. But the equivalent is estimated on the value to him, & not on the value to the purchaser, & hence it has from the first been recognised as an absolute rule that this value is to be estimated as it stood before the grant of the compulsory powers. The owner is only to receive compensation based upon the market-value of his lands as they stood before the scheme was authorised by which they are put to public uses. Subject to that he is entitled to be paid the full price for his lands, & any & every element of value which they possess must be taken into consideration in so far as they increase the value to him."

This meaning of the word "compensation" was accepted in many subsequent decisions, & it is not necessary to refer to them all. What Mr. Das contends is that by reason of the use of the expression "subject to" in Entry 36 of the State List, the power to make a law by a State Legislature under that entry is subject to certain conditions or qualifications, which qualifications or conditions are stated in Entry 42 of the Concurrent List. His argument is that those conditions or qualifications not having been fulfilled, the impugned Act is 'ultra vires' the Legislature which enacted it.

(72) It would, I think, be convenient, if I state here the reply of the learned Attorney General, who appeared for the State of Bihar, with regard to this part of the case. The learned Attorney-General has based his reply primarily on two grounds: firstly, he contends that the impugned Act was made not necessarily under Entry 36 of the State List, but under Entry 18 of that List; secondly, assuming that the impugned Act was made under Entry 36, the expression "subject to" occurring in that entry has not the meaning which Mr. Das gives to it. The learned Attorney General states that the expression "subject to" merely restricts or cuts down the field of legislation, but does not import any conditions or qualifications. According to him, the idea was to put principles of compensation, etc., in the concurrent field of legislation, so as to attract the operation of Art. 254 of the Constitution & make such legislation liable to control of Parliament. He has refd. to various other entries in the three Lists where the expression "subject to" or a similar expression is used, & has contended that the expression has not the meaning suggested by Mr. P. R. Das.

(73) Having stated, in brief, the respective arguments on behalf of the parties before us, I now proceed to consider them & give my decision thereon. The Const. Ind. is an organic, basic statute, made by the Constituent Assembly representing the people of India. It constitutes India, as the preamble states, into a Sovereign Democratic Republic. It is not merely a mechanism under which laws are to be made, but is something more than that, it creates & defines the essential foundation, general framework & structure of the States & their Union, it provides the rules in accordance with which powers of sovereignty are to be exercised; it embodies the ideals & aspirations of a nation; it lays down fundamental rights, & provides remedies for enforcement of such rights; in other words, it seeks to shape & mould the growth of the political, social & economic life of the nation. It is now well-settled that such a charter or document is not to be construed in any narrow & pedantic sense. It is true that the rules which apply to the interpretation of other stautes, apply equally to the interpretation of a constitutional enactment; but the application of those rules must always have reference to the subject-matter of the enactment itself. (See the observations of Gwyer, C. J. in 'In the matter of the C. P. & Berar Sales of Motor Spirit & Lubricant Taxation Act, 1938', AIR (26) 1939 F C 1 at p. 4: (1939 F C R 18). Keeping the above rules in mind, I propose to examine the relevant provision of the Const. Ind.

(74) The power of the legislature to legislate on a subject, particularly in a written, federal constitution where there must be a nice balance of jurisdictions, can be looked at from two points of view — affirmative & negative. The conferment of the power is the affirmative aspect; a restraint or restriction on the exercise of the power is the negative aspect. It is important to remember that the restraint may be imposed in different ways — by introducing words of limitation in the very entry which confers the power, or by substantive provisions to which the power to legislate is made subject, or even by delimiting the field of legislation. This distinction between the conferment of power & the restraint on power to which I am now referring is, I think, important in dealing with the arguments of the parties on this part of the case. The contention of Mr. Das is that the entry which confers the power itself imposes limitations; the argument of the learned Attorney General is that the restrictions, if any, on the exercise of the power are to be found not in the legislative entries, but elsewhere e.g. in the chapter on fundamental rights. Ordinarily, this distinction may be of little or no importance; because whether there is absence of power or the power has been exceeded by ignoring certain restraints, the result is the same, namely, the law made is unconstitutional. But there is a meaning & purpose in making the distinction in these cases: this arises because of Cl. (4), Art. 31, Const. Ind. I shall, later on, discuss the meaning & effect of Cl. (4), Art. 31. But it is clear that Cl. (4) seeks to get over a contravention of, at least, one fundamental right, viz., that stated in Cl. (2), Art. 31. Mr. P. R. Das is naturally anxious to steer clear of Cl. (4), Art. 31, & has accordingly raised the more fundamental plea of absence of power. The learned Attorney-General is equally anxious to steer clear of that legislative entry which relates to compulsory acquisition of property by stating that the impugned Act is legislation under Entry 18 of the State List rather than Entry 36. Both, if I may say so wihout meaning any disrespect, are extreme views, though expounded with consummate skill & rare advocacy. Entry 21 of List II of Sch. 7, Govt. of India Act, 1935, which corresponded to Entry 18 of the State List of the Const. Ind., was considered by a Special Bench of this Ct., of which I was a member, in 'Kameshwar Singh v. Province of Bihar', AIR (37) 1950 Pat 392: (29 Pat 790). The decisions bearing on the interpretation of that entry were also refd. to therein, including the decision in 'Megh Raj v. Allah Rakhia', 74 I A 12: (AIR (34) 1947 P C 72). In the case of 'Jagannath Baksh v. United Provinces', AIR (33) 1946 P C 127: (I L R (1946) Kar P C 129), Lord Wright pointed out that

> "to regulate the relations of landlord & tenant & thereby diminish rights, hitherto exercised by the landlord in connection with his land, is different from compulsory acquisition of the land."

He made those observations with reference to S. 299, Govt. of India Act, 1935, which dealt with compulsory acquisition of land, etc. Ordinarily, it is not important to know whether a legislature having plenary power to legislate on more subjects than one has exercised that power under one entry or the other, because if the power is there, it does not very much matter under what head it comes. Speaking generally a comprehensive enactment like the impugned Act will probably come under several heads of legislation. If & when, however, there is a conflict of power or jurisdiction or the question of any restraint on power comes in, then it becomes important to know under what head or entry the power has been exercised. The pith & substance doctrine has often been resorted to, to resolve a conflict of jurisdiction. The true nature & scope of the enactment is, in my opinion, a relevant consideration in determining the question whether it comes under one head of legislation or the other, when the question of an absence of power or exceeding a restraint on power arises. In the classic case of 'Gallaghar v. Lynn', (1937) A C 863: (106 L J P C 161), the question that arose for consideration was whether certain limitations imposed on the power to legislate by the Parliament of Northern Ireland for the peace, order & good Govt. of Northern Ireland as were exceeded or not, one of the limitations being that the Parliament of Northern Ireland did not have power to make laws in respect of trade with any place out of the part of Ireland within their jurisdiction except so far as trade might be affected by the exercise of the powers of taxation etc. The question was answered with reference to the true nature & character of the legislation. Lord Atkin said as follows:

"If, on the view of the statute as a whole you find that the substance of the legislation is within the express powers then it is not invalidated if incidentally it affects matters which are outside the authorised field. The legislation must not under the guise of dealing with one matter in fact encroach upon the forbidden field."

The following observations of Datham, C. J. in 'Bank of New South Wales v. The Commonwealth', (76 Commonwealth L R 1 at p. 186), are, I think, relevant:

"In determining the validity of a law it is in the first place obviously necessary to construe the law & to determine its operation & effect (that is, to decide what the Act actually does), & in the second place to determine the relation of that which the Act does to a subject-matter in respect of which it is contended that the relevant Parliament has power to make laws. A power to make laws with respect to a subject-matter is a power to make laws which in reality & substance are laws upon the subject-matter. It is not enough that a law should refer to the subject-matter or apply to the subject-matter: for example, income tax laws apply to clergymen & to hotel-keepers as members of the public; but no one would describe an income tax law as being, for that reason, a law with respect to clergymen or hotel-keepers. Building regulations apply to buildings erected for or by banks; but such regulations could not properly be described as laws with respect to banks or to banking."

The point which I wish to emphasise is that the limitation on the power of legislation may arise by reason of restrictions imposed within the entry which confers the powers; & when the question of exceeding such a restriction arises, it is relevant to consider the true nature & character of the legislation.

(75) In my view, in its true nature, scope & effect, the impugned Act is acquisition of property in the sense that it transfers to the State the entire or totality of interests of proprietors & tenure-holders in land & of the mtgees. & lessees of such interests, even though such transference be part of a general scheme of land reform or a stage in the evolution of a new system of land tenure: it is still acquisition of property, though different from acquisition 'simpliciter'. I think that it is no answer to say that Entry 18 of the State List is comprehensive enough to include rights in or over land; land tenures including the relation of landlord & tenant; & the collection of rents. Entry 18 is undoubtedly very comprehensive, but the different entries in the State List must be read together, in a broad & liberal spirit no doubt, but not so as to make one entry cancel or override another entry or make another entry meaningless. I am aware of the view expressed in several decisions that the entries are not mutually exclusive, & a certain amount of over-lapping is unavoidable when such a lengthy enumeration of subjects, as has been made in Sch. 7, is attempted in a constitutional enactment. But if the comprehensive entry relating to Land etc. includes compulsory acquisition of land, it was unnecessary or meaningless to have an entry for compulsory acquisition. There are other general entries, such as, "Forests", "Inns & inn-keepers". I do not think that it can be argued with any show of reason that those general entries can be called to aid in support of legislation for acquisition of private forests, private inns or other kinds of private property. As was pointed out by Spens. C. J. in 'Lal Singh v. C. P. & Berar', 1944-6 F C R 284: (A I R (31) 1944 F C 62), acquisition implies that there must be an actual transference of & it must be possible to indicate some person or body to whom is or are transferred, the land or rights in land.

(76) Compulsory acquisition or property for a public purpose has a long legislative history behind it, which goes back to more than hundred years (see Bengal Regulation I of 1824). Even when the first classification of legislative subjects was attempted under the Devolution Rules made under the Govt. of India Act, 1919, (which introduced in India provincial autonomy of a limited type, then commonly called dyarchy), 'Land Revenue Administration' including land tenures, collection of rent, etc., was distinguished & kept separate from 'Land acquisition'. Since then, compulsory acquisition of property for a public purpose has always been a separate subject of legislation, & I do not think that the Const. Ind. has made any departure from this long standing legislative practice.

(77) I think the fact that the Bill as passed by the Legislature was reserved for the consideration of the President shows that it was considered to be hit by Cl. (2), Art. 31, & the assent of the President was considered necessary under Cl. (3) of the said Article.

(78) I hold, therefore, that the impugned Act is substantially referable to Entry 36 of the State List & Entry 42 of the Concurrent List, so far as it is necessary to enquire into the legislative entries under which it is enacted, even though the compulsory acquisition authorised by it be part of a general scheme of land reform.

(79) But does that mean that the Legislature which enacted it had no power to enact it, by reason of the expression 'subject to' in Entry 36 & the provisions of Entry 42? I think that the answer must be in the negative.

(80) It is necessary to bear in mind the narrow scope of the argument of Mr. P. R. Das on this point. For his argument on the point of absence of power, he is not invoking the aid of any of the Articles in Part III (Fundamental Rights), Const. Ind., Art. 13 of the Constitution states that all laws in force immediately before the commencement of the Constitution, in so far as they are inconsistent with any of the fundamental rights shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, be void. It further states that the State shall not make any law which takes away or abridges the rights conferred by Part III & any law made in contravention of Cl. (2), Art. 13, shall, to the extent of the contravention, be void. Art. 245 which I quoted in an earlier part of this judgment, states clearly that the power to make laws is "subject to the provisions of this Constitution". Art. 31, Cls. (1) & (2) read together, guarantees a fundamental right, namely, that no person shall be deprived of his property save by authority of law & that no property, moveable or immoveable, shall be taken possession of or acquired for public purposes under any law authorising the taking of such possession unless the law provides for compensation for the property & either fixes the amount of the compensation, or specified the principles on which, & the manner in which, the compensation is to be determined & given. To me, it seems clear that the provisions of Art. 31, Cls. (1) & (2), read with Arts. 13 & 245, are a restraint on the power of law-making with regard to compulsory acquisition of property. On the question of absence of power, Mr. Das does not rely on those provisions, though I must make it clear (to avoid any misunderstanding) that Mr. Das does rely on Art. 13 & some other Arts. in Part III of the Constitution, for another branch of his argument which I shall presently consider. For his contention that the impugned legislation is 'ultra vires' the legislature which enacted it, Mr. Das relies principally on the use of the expression 'subject to' in Entry 36, & the provisions of Entry 42 of List III.

(81) I do not think that the expression 'subject to' has the meaning sought to be given to it by Mr. Das. That expression has been used in several other entries where the meaning is not open to any doubt. Take, for example, Entry 11 of List II. It relates to education including universities, subject to the provisions of Entries 63, 64, 65 & 66 of List I. Those entries relate to the Benares Hindu University, the Aligarh Muslim University, the Delhi University, institutions for scientific or technical education, etc. The obvious meaning is that the State may make a law with respect to education including universities, but not with regard to the universities or institutions mentioned in Entries 63, 64, etc. of List I. The same meaning can be gathered from many other entries. There is, I think, intrinsic evidence in the Constitution itself to show that the expression "subject to" has not the meaning sought to be given to it by Mr. Das. Cl. (4), Art. 31 itself furnishes such evidence. If Mr. Das is right, then Cl. (4), Art. 31 becomes meaningless, as it cannot cure the defect of an initial absence of legislative power. Take again Cl. (5), Art. 31. That clause says that nothing in Cl. (2) shall affect, among other things, the provisions of any law which the State may hereafter make for the promotion of public health or the prevention of danger to life or property, etc. If there is no power to legislate by reason of the use of the expression "subject to" in Entry 36, then Cl. (5), Art. 31 becomes meaningless & cannot cure a defect of initial absence of power. Then there is another reason. Entry 33 of List I refers to acquisition of property for the purposes of the Union. There is no such expression as 'subject to' in this entry. If the contention of Mr. Das is accepted, then the position comes to this that a law made for the acquisition of property for the purposes of the Union is not subject to the provisions of Entry 42 of List III. I do not think that it was ever intended that acquisition of property for State purposes should be placed on a different footing from acquisition of property for Union purposes, in the sense suggested by Mr. Das.

(82) I think that the argument of Mr. Das has been put in rather an extreme form, & the proper answer to the question is this: all that the expression "subject to" means is that principles of compensation, etc. which have to be laid down for compulsory acquisition of property by reason of the provisions in Part III of the Constitution relate to &. are a matter within the concurrent field of legislation, & a law relating thereto made by a State will attract the operation of Art. 254 of the Constitution. I do not think that the expression "subject to" has any other meaning; nor do I agree with Mr. N. C. Chatterjee, who folld. Mr. Das in one of the cases, that the expression "subject to" should be interpreted by reference to decisions relating to ordinary commercial or contractual transactions. Therefore, the correct position is that the proper legislature enacted the impugned legislation, & there was no initial absence of power in the sense in which Mr. Das wishes to infer it from the provisions of Entry 36 of List II & Entry 42 of List III. There are restrictions on the power to make laws with regard to acquisition of property, but those restrictions are to be found elsewhere in the Constitution. The question of those restrictions & how far they or any of them have been ignored or exceeded will be considered by me when I take up the question of fundamental rights, with particular reference to Cl. (4), Art. 31.

(83) Purposes of the impugned Act: whether public purpose or not: But before I do so, there is another point which must be dealt with. Mr. Das has contended that the impugned legislation compulsorily acquires the interests of proprietors & tenure-holders in land, but envisages no public purpose for such acquisition. It is contended that in the absence of a public purpose, the law is invalid. In 'Kameshwar Singh v. Province of Bihar', AIR (37) 1950 Pat 392: (29 Pat 790), I had expressed the following views with regard to Sub-s. (2), S. 299, Govt. of India Act, 1935:

"The effect of the two parts of the sub-section read together is clearly this: it is not open to any legislature to make any law authorising the compulsory acquisition of land unless the following two conditions are fulfilled. The first or rather inherent condition is that the compulsory acquisition must be for public purpose. It is true that Sub-s. (2), S. 299, as worded, does not, strictly speaking, make 'public purpose' a condition precedent, but rather assumes that compulsory acquisition can be for public purpose only; it makes 'public purposes' inherent in compulsory acquisition."

I refd. to the history of legislation on the subject of compulsory acquisition of property, & pointed out that the principle that such acquisition is made for "purposes of general convenience to the community or arrangement of public utility" was always recognised in India. I think that the position is the same under the present Const. Ind. Entry 33 of List I talks of

"Acquisition or requisitioning of property for the purposes of the Union."

Entry 36 of List II says,

Entry 42 of List III talks of

Three purposes are mentioned in these entries: (1) purposes of the Union; (2) purposes of the State; & (3) any other public purpose. The use of the word 'other' indicates that the purposes of the Union or of a State are also public purposes. Art. 31 of the Constitution which relates to compulsory acquisition of property says in Cl. (1):

"No person shall be deprived of his property save by authority of law."

Cl. (2) reads:

"No property, moveable or immoveable, including any interest in, or in any Co. owning any commercial or industrial undertaking, shall be taken possession of or acquired for public purposes under any law authorising the taking of such possession or such acquisition, unless the law provides for compensation for the property taken possession of or acquired & either fixes the amount of compensation, or specifies the principles on which, & the manner in which, the compensation is to be determined & given."

Cl. (2), strictly speaking, does not, in express words, make 'public purposes' a condition precedent to compulsory acquisition, but rather assumes that such acquisition can be for public purposes only; it does so by necessary implication. In dealing with Art. 31, his Lordship Mukherjea, J. in 'Charanjit Lal v. The Union of India', AIR (38) 1951 S C 41: (1950 S C R 869), observed as follows:

"It is a right inherent in every sovereign to take & appropriate private property belonging to individual citizens for public use. This right, which is described as 'eminent domain' in American law, is like the power of taxation, an off-spring of political necessity, & it is supposed to be based upon an implied reservation by Govt. that private property acquired by its citizens under its protection may be taken or its use controlled for public benefit irrespective of the wishes of the owner. Art. 31 (2) of the Constitution prescribes a two-fold limit within which such superior right of the State should be exercised. One limitation imposed upon acquisition or taking possession of private property which is implied in the clause is that such taking must be for public purpose. The other condition is that no property can be taken, unless the law which authorises such appropriation contains a provision for payment of compensation in the manner laid down in the clause."

There is, thus, high authority for the contention of Mr. Das that an inherent condition of any legislation for compulsory acquisition of private property by the State is that it must be for a public purpose.

(84) The right of 'eminent domain' has been stated by American jurists to be the power of the sovereign to take property for public use without the owner's consent. Nichols in his Law of Eminent Domain, (Volume 1, p. 2) thus states the meaning of the power in its irreducible terms: (a) power to take; (b) without the owner's consent; & (c) for the public use. Willis has pointed out that the right of 'eminent domain' is "an implied power of the Federal Govt., implied either from the limitation in the Fifth Amendment, or because necessary & proper to carry out other express powers of the Federal Govt., or implied from the grant of legislative power." (Willis on Constitutional Law, Chapter XXVIII, p. 814).

The Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution contains the limitation, "nor shall private property be taken for a public use, without just compensation", & all the state constitutions in America, except three (Kansas, New Hampshire & North Carolina), contain express prohibitions against the taking of private property for public use without compensation. Willis observes:

"Since three States have no express limitation, & other States might not apply their express limitations as due process would be applied by the United States S. C., it became important to decide whether or not the due process clause as a matter of substance protects personal liberty against social control so far as concerns 'eminent domain'. The United States S. C. has definitely held that the due process clause does have this effect. It has held that it applies to State action so that States cannot take private property for a public use without compensation, & that private property cannot be taken for a private use even upon the payment of compensation either by the States or by the Federal Govt. These cases make the due process clause cover not only the scope of the express limitation in the Fifth Amendment, but everything else involved in 'eminent domain'. It is due process of law to take private property for a public use whenever just compensation is made. This is, therefore, constitutional social control". Willis on Constitutional Law, Chap. XXVIII, pp. 814-15).

Nichols has pointed out that the term "dominium eminens" (eminent domain) seems to have been originated in 1625 by Hugo Grotius, who wrote of this power in his work, 'De Jure Belli et Pacis". He has further pointed out that the definitions & discussions of this right by political writers of the seventeenth & eighteenth centuries in Europe are of great importance in determining the extent of the power of eminent domain under American constitutions, for it is known that the authors of American constitutions were familiar with those writings.

(85) I have refd. to these observations not for any academic or pedantic purpose. My purpose is to show that the idea of "public use or public purpose" as an inherent or implied condition to the compulsory acquisition of private property by the State owed its origin in America to politico-historical reasons; the idea was further developed by reason of the limitation in the Fifth Amendment & the due process clause in the American Constitutions in a way which was peculiar to America. This must be borne in mind while considering American decisions; therefore, there is a danger in following them or relying on commentaries made thereon by eminent American jurists, with regard to a constitution where the due process clause was deliberately omitted. The ideas which entered into the American political heritage of the eighteenth century exercised considerable influence over the marks of the American Constitutions, & the American decisions must be construed against the background of those ideas.

(86) The expression 'public use' or 'public purpose' has not been defined. Mr. Das has contended that it must be particular, fixed & definite. He has refd. to Weaver on Constitutional Law & its Administration", where the learned commentator has said:

"What constitutes a public use is largely a question for the legislature, & the Cts. will not interfere except to inquire whether the legislature could reasonably have considered the use a public one. Generally, the phrase is not limited to business necessity & ordinary convenience, but may extend to matters of public health, recreation & enjoyment. It may include not only the present demands of the public, but also those which may be fairly anticipated in the future. The Cts., however, require that the use shall be fixed & definite. It must be one in which the public actually has an interest, & the terms & manners of enjoyment must be within the control of the state." (Weaver on Constitutional Law & its Administration at p. 546).

Cooley in Constitutional Limitations thus summarised the position:

"No satisfactory definition of the term 'public use' has ever been achieved by the Cts. Two different theories are presented by the judicial attempts to describe the subjects to which the expression would apply. One theory of 'public use' limits the application to 'employment' 'occupation'. A more liberal & more flexible meaning makes it synonymous with 'public advantage' —'public benefit'. A little investigation will show that any definition attempted would exclude some subjects that properly should be included in, & include some subjects that must be excluded from, the operation of the words 'public use'. As might be expected, more limited application of the principle appears in the earlier cases, & the more liberal application has been rendered necessary by complex conditions due to recent development of civilization & the increasing density of population. In the very nature of the case, modern conditions & the increasing interdependence of the different human factors in the progressive complexity of a community make it necessary for the Govt. to touch upon & limit individual activities at more points than formerly." (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, Volume II, p. 1139-40).

(87) I have already refd. to the two purposes which are mentioned in the preamble of the impugned Act. In an affidavit filed on behalf of the State of Bihar, three other objects or purposes are suggested. It is alleged therein that the landlords as a class neglected to maintain the irrigation system, failed to bring to cultivation culturable waste lands & frittered away forests & mineral resources of the State. The suggestion is that when the interest of the proprietors & tenure-holders are transferred to the State, the State will be able to look after irrigation works, bring culturable waste lands to cultivation & conserve forests & mineral resources. Mr. Das has challenged the correctness of these allegations made in the affidavit refd. to above, & has drawn our attention to several affidavits filed on behalf of his clients. He has pointed out that there never was any general or absolute duty on the landlords to maintain irrigation works, but such maintenance was a matter of custom or contractual incident of the tenancy. He has also drawn our attention to the Bihar Private Irrigation Works Act under which it was open to the State Govt. to take necessary action in the matter of maintenance of works of irrigation. With regard to forest, he has drawn our attention to the affidavit of one Parmeshwar Prasad Sinha which showed how forests in possession of the State were damaged or destroyed. He has pointed out that in the Land Revenue Administration Report of 1945-46, the number of recorded proprietors of estates was 8,45,103, & the number of recorded tenure-holders was 4,90,816. He pointed out that the area of culturable waste lands was very small; & in any view, there was already in the statute book an Act called the Waste Lands Reclamation Act (Act XVI (16) of 1946) under which it was possible to take necessary action by the State. The sum & substance of Mr. Das's contention is that the transference of the interests of the proprietors & tenure-holders to the State by the impugned Act has not been shown to be for any public purpose within the meaning of that expression as understood in American decisions & in the commentaries of American jurists. He has pointed out that there is no provision in the impugned Act for an equitable distribution of land; nor for cultivation of waste lands, if any. He has stated that, in spite of the deduction for cost of works of benefit to the raiyats (which deduction, according to him, is meant only for the purpose of artificially reducing thet compensation), the impugned Act does not compel Govt. to spend a pice for the benefit of raiyats. It provides just for transference of interests, followed possibly by augmentation of public revenue. According to him, if the purpose be to augment public revenues, that would not be a public purpose within the meaning of that expression. (See Willis on Constitutional Law, p. 817, line 2).

(88) This question whether there is any public purpose for the impugned Act has caused me considerable anxiety. In 'Kameshwar Singh v. Province of Bihar', AIR (37) 1950 Pat 392: (29 Pat 790), we had occasion to deal with the Bihar State Management of Estates and Tenures Act (Act XXI (21) of 1948). I referred therein to the decision in 'Hamabhai Framjee v. Secy. of State', 42 IA 44: (AIR (1) 1914 PC 20), where it was observed:

"Whatever else the expression may mean it must include a purpose, that is, an object or aim, in which the general interest of the community, as opposed to the particular interest of individuals, is directly and vitally concerned."

That was a case, as has been rightly pointed out by the learned Attorney-General, regarding the meaning of the expression "public purpose" occurring in a lease by the East India Company, & not in the Act of a sovereign legislature. After referring to the various provisions of the Bihar State Management of Estates & Tenures Act, 1949, I said:

"I have very carefully considered the provisions of the impugned Act, but find it very difficult to hold that the acquisition or deprivation of rights in land therein provided was for a public purpose. No public purpose as envisaged by the tests mentioned above is apparent either from the preamble or the provisions of the impugned Act. The provisions of the impugned Act do not benefit the State pecuniarily. It is conceded by Mr. Lalnarain Sinha that the State gets no benefit. The tenants get no benefit either: the provision for irrigation costs is highly problematic or hypothetical. I can find nothing in the provisions to avoid conflicts between landlords & tenants or give larger rights to tenants. As far as one can make out, the impugned Act is intended either as an experiment, without incurring any cost, of large scale management of estates, or as a confiscation of rights in land without payment of compensation."

That Act, in the view which I held, was a mere pejorative imitation of the Chota Nagpur Encumbered Estates Act, 1876 & provided for a number of things — possession, deprivation, repudiation, etc. — without any scheme of land reform or full-scale acquisition of property for land reform. In those circumstances, I expressed the view that there was no apparent or real public purpose behind it. At the same time, I guarded myself against saying that in no circumstances could there be a public purpose in acquiring zamindaries or in acquiring the interest of intermediaries or rent collectors, either in exercise of the right of eminent domain or in exercise of the police powers of the State. I made it quite clear that all that I said in that case about a public purpose related solely to the provisions of the Act which was under consideration in that case.

(89) The learned Attorney-General has contended before us that in dealing with the Act of a sovereign legislature, the expression "public purpose" must be interpreted in a liberal & comprehensive sense. In my opinion, the learned Attorney General is right. I have already refd. to the three entries in the legislative Lists which show that purposes of the Union & purposes of the State stand on the same footing as other public purposes. This, by itself, would enlarge the meaning of the expression "public purpose"; in any case, would give it a meaning wider than what was arrived at in America by the due process clause. In the Australian Constitution the Commonwealth Parliament is empowered by S. 51 (xxxi) of the Constitution to make laws with respect to: "The acquisition of property on just terms from any State or person 'for any purpose in respect of which the Parliament has power to make laws'." I have underlined (here in inverted commas) the words which I consider to be of some importance. Union purposes or State purposes would, in my opinion, be somewhat similar to the words used in the placitum quoted above. Dealing with this power of the Commonwealth Parliament in Australia, Dr. Wynes says as follows:

"Probably, Sub-s. (xxxi) both widens & limits the conditions of exercise of the power which would otherwise come within the incidental power — enlarges it to cover cases of direct acquisition 'simpliciter' without the necessity of mere acquisition as part of a scehme, & limits the conditions of exercise to taking 'on just terms'."

"The Commonwealth power is limited in two respects: (a) the acquisition is to be 'on just terms' & (b) it must be in respect of some purpose in respect of which the Parliament has power to make laws." (See Wynes on Legislative & Executive Powers in Australia, pp. 247-248).

On the question of the purpose of acquisition, the Commonwealth power is limited to by the provision that the acquisition must be for some purpose with respect of which Parliament has power to make laws, while in America the power of eminent domain is limited to taking for a public use (or purpose), & what is public use is a question cognizable by the Cts. in the State as well as in the United States, in accordance with a line of decisions which refined & developed the due process clause. Dr. Wynes then says:

"The suggestion that the Commonwealth power is probably limited to acquisition for public purposes, that the test of validity is whether the acquisition is for a 'public purpose' & that the American cases as to what is a public purpose may be applicable in Australia, is submitted to be clearly incorrect. The subtle refinements & distinctions which are perceptible in the numerous American cases on this matter are not applicable in this country, where the sole test is whether the property has been acquired for a purpose in respect of which the Commonwealth has legislative power."

Even without going to the length suggested by Dr. Wynes, it is permissible, I think, to hold, on the words used in Entry 33 of List I, Entry 36 of List II & Entry 42 of List III, that the connotation of the expression "public purpose" in the Indian Constitution is fairly wide & comprehensive, because it embraces all purposes of the Union or a State. It cannot, I think, be denied that acquisition of intermediate interests in land as part of a scheme of land reform is a legitimate & valid State purpose. The learned Attorney-General has drawn our attention to the use of the expression "public purpose" in other parts of the Constitution. e.g., in Art. 23 (2) of the Constitution. Cl. (2), Art. 23 is in the nature of a proviso or exception to Cl. (1), Art. 23, which prohibits traffic in human beings & 'begar' & other similar forms of forced labour. Cl. (2) states that nothing in the Article shall prevent the State from imposing compulsory service for public purposes. It is obvious that the expression "public purposes" occurring in Cl. (2) is used in a wide & comprehensive sense. Another point to be kept in mind is that "public purpose" with reference to direct acquisition 'simpliciter of the property of an individual must stand on a somewhat different footing from that of acquisition of property of a class of individuals as part of a general scheme. In the former case, the purpose must be fairly obvious to every body. In 'Province of Bombay v. Khushaldas S. Advani', AIR (37) 1950 S C 222: (1950 S C R 621), his Lordships Fazl Ali, J. made the following observations with regard to such cases:

"Indeed, it appears to me that in a large majority of cases no inquiry should be necessary as the existence of a public purpose would be seif-evident or obvious, & a mere reference to the purpose will make any one say: this is of course a public purpose."

His Lordship further pointed out that

"since the question as to whether it is necessary or expedient to acquire land (given a public purpose) has been left entirely to the satisfaction of the Provincial Govt., the opinion, formed by it, provided it was formed in good faith, cannot be questioned; but the same cannot be said with regard to the decision of the executive as to the existence of a public purpose, which is the foundation of its power & is a condition precedent to its exercise."

It is to be remembered, however, that these observations were made by his Lordship in respect of the power of the executive, with reference to the words used in S. 3, Bombay Land Acquisition Ordinance. The validity of the Ordinance itself was not the subject matter of that decision.

(90) In the class of cases where acquisition of property of a large number of individuals is being made as part of a general scheme, say, of land reform, there must necessarily be some difference of opinion as to whether the scheme is for the general benfit or not. Such a difference of opinion has existed with regard to the Permanent Settlement for a very long time. In the course of arguments before us, repeated references were made to the report of the Land Revenue Commission, Bengal (Floud Commission), & observations of learned authors who had occasion to consider the merits & demerits of the two systems of land tenure known as zamindari & raiyatwari. At pp. 41 to 43 of the Report, is set out the majority view of the Floud Commission. The majority concludes as follows:

"A majority of the Commission have also come to the conclusion that the zamindari system has developed so many defects that it has ceased to serve any national interest. No half measures will satisfactorily remedy its defects. Provided that a practicable scheme can be devised to acquire the interests of all classes of rent receivers on reasonable terms, the policy should be to aim at bringing the actual cultivators into the position of tenants holding directly under Govt."

Some of the defects of the Zamindari system were mentioned by Baden Powell in his Land Systems of British India, Vol. I, p. 407. It is I think, unnecessary to refer to all the documents which have been placed before us with regard to the history of landlordism or the merits & demerits of the two systems of land tenure. We have been refd. to the resolution of the Govt. of India dated 16-1-1902, the final report of the Famine Enquiry Commission of 1946 & various other documents. It is, I think, unnecessary to consider these documents, because I do not think that it is our duty to investigate into the question whether a particular scheme of reform is good or bad. The position, as I understand it, is that it is a question for the appropriate legislature, & the Cts. will only enquire whether the legislature could reasonably have considered such a scheme as the transference of the interests of proprietors or tenure-holders in land to the State, to be a public purpose. It is clear to me that the legislature could do so: it could take the view that such transference was necessary as part of a general schme of land reform, or as a stage in the evolution of a better system of land tenure, or even as a step towards better management & cultivation of land. Whether the legislature is right or wrong is not for us to decide; for us the test is — could the legislature reasonably take such a view?

(91) One must, I think, bear in mind that the Const. Ind. was made in 1950, by which year the conception of social control all the world over had undergone very considerable change. Even in countries other than India similar schemes of social control had raised constitutional questions. As one American author put it,

"every legal system for a living society, even when embodied in a written constitution, must itself be alive. It is not merely the imprisonment of the past; it is also the unfolding of the future." Justice Holmes declared in 1904,

"Great constitutional provisions must be administered with caution. Some play must be allowed for the joints of the machine." (Missouri, K. & T. K. Co. v. May', 194 U S 267: 48 Law Ed 971).

I have examined such statutes as the Bank of England Act 1946 (9 & 10 Geo. 6 Ch. 27) & the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946 (9 & 10 Geo. 6 Ch 59), which were passed in England in recent years as part of a scheme of nationalisation, In England, there is no written constitution, & Parliament is sovereign. The public purpose for enactments of the nature refd. to above, cannot, I think, be determined in the same way as or by the same standard as the purpose of a direct acquisition 'simpliciter' of the property of an individual.

(92) There is, I think, clear indication in the Const. Ind. itself that the expression "Public purpose" is to be understood in a wide & comprehensive sense. Furthermore, there is indication that the Constituent Assembly representing the people of India which made the Constitution, was itself aware of the existence of legislation of the nature of the impugned Act. This is clear from Cl. (4), Art. 31. As a matter of fact, the Land Reforms Bill was pending at the commencement of the Constitution. The learned Attorney-General has refd. to the debates in the Constituent Assembly to show that the Bihar Abolition of Zamindari Bill, 1949 & certain other bills of a similar nature were also pending in other state Legislatures at the time when the Constituent Assembly was discussing the provisions of Art. 31. I agree that neither the validity nor the interpretation of a statute can be allowed to depend upon what members, whether Ministers or not, choose to say in Parliamentary debates. But the debates can be looked into for ascertaining historical facts, viz., that certain bills were pending at the time when Art. 31 was being considered, & that Cl. (4), Art. 31 refd. to such bills. If the legislation then pending was not for a public purpose, it was, indeed, surprising that the Constituent Assembly tried to save such legislation by means of the provisions of Cl. (4), Art. 31. One may, I think, say that there was an implied declaration by the Constituent Assembly that such legislation was for a public purpose, & such declaration will be given deference by the Cts. until it is shown to involve an impossibility. (See 'Old Dominion Land Co. v. United States of America', 269 U S 55: (70 Law Ed 162).

(93) For the reasons given above, I hold that the impugned Act does not fall for want of a public purpose.

(94) Fundamental Rights: contravention, if any, & the effect of Cl. (4) of Art. 31: I now proceed to consider if any of the provisions in Part III (Fundamental Rights) of the Const. Ind. have been contravened by the impugned Act, & if so, with what effect. I shall also consider to what extent Cl. (4), Art. 31 prevents us from calling in question the impugned Act on the ground of any such contravention.

(95) Mr. Das has contended — (1) that the impugned Act contravenes the provisions of Art. 19 (1) (f) of the Constitution, & is not saved by Cl. (5) of the said Art. (2) that it contravenes Art. 31 (1) of the Constitution, & is not saved by Cl. (4) of the said Article; & (3) that it contravenes the provisions of Art. 14 of the Constitution & is accordingly void under Art. 13 (2) of the Constitution. The first two contentions can, I think, be disposed of easily. In 'Kameshwar Singh v. Province of Bihar', AIR (37) 1950 Pat 392: (29 Pat 790). I had pointed out that when the property itself is acquired by the State, the right mentioned in Art. 19 (1) (f) can have no application; because the provisions of Art. 31 are in the nature of special provisions, & the general right to freedom must yield to the special provisions relating to acquisition of property. I still adhere to that view. Even assuming that Art. 19 refers to a matter different from the subect-matter of Art. 31, I do not think that there is any scope for the application of the provisions of Art. 19 (1) (f) in a case where the property itself has been acquired for public purposes. When the property itself has been acquired, how can the citizen say that he still has the right to acquire, hold & dispose of the property? In the view which I have taken it is unnecessary to decide whether Cl. (5), Art. 19 saves the impugned Act or not: that question does not really arise.

(96) As to Art. 31 (1), the contention of Mr. Das is that the words "by authority of law" do not mean the particular law which expropriates, but means the general law, the 'lex-terrae' of the 'Magna Charta'. Mr. Das conceded, however, that in view of the decision of the S. C. in 'Gopalan's case', AIR (37) 1950 S C 27: (51 Cr L J 1383), he was not in a position to press this contention in this Ct., but would reserve his right to press the point at a later stage if & when the occasion arises.

(97) There is one other point in this connection. If it were held that the impugned Act authorises compulsory acquisition of private property without a public purpose, the Act may be held invalid under Cl. (1), Art. 31, provided Cls. (1) & (2), Art. 31 are & can be read together. The word 'law' in Art. 31 does not appear to have been used exactly in the same sense in all the clauses; the context makes that quite clear. In Cl. (1), Art. 31, the expression 'law' must, I think, mean a valid law. If public purpose is an implied or inhrent condition to legislation on the subject of compulsory acquisition of private property by the State, then a law which is made in contravention of this implied condition, will not be a valid law within the meaning of Cl. (1), Art. 31 of the Constitution. I am further of the view that an invalidity of that nature will not be cured by the assent of the President. This point of view I explained in some detail in 'Kameshwar Singh's case', AIR (37) 1950 Pat 392: (29 Pat 790), & I have no desire to repeat what I said there. However, that question does not really arise in view of my finding on 'public purpose' & it is unnecessary to say anything more about the vexed question if Cls. (1) & (2), Art. 31 should be construed conjunctively or disjunctively, or if the expression deprived' in Cl. (1) means deprivation of a nature other than by acquisition.

(98) Now, remains the third contention, viz., whether the impugned Act contravenes Art. 14 of the Constitution, & if so, with what effect. This is the most important question in these cases, & requires a very careful consideration. Art. 14 of the Constitution appears to be based on the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America, which Amendment was adopted soon after the close of the Civil War in America, & had its origin in the purpose to secure to the people of the coloured race the full enjoyment of their civil rights. The relevant portion of the Fourteenth Amendment reads:

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of Citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; 'nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws'."

In the Indian Constitution Article 14 reads:

"The State shall not deny to any person equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws within the territory of India."

It has been stated that the equality of rights is a basic principle of republicanism (Weaver on Constitutional Law, p. 393). A classic exposition of the principle occurs in a judgment of justice Field, given as far back as 1884, in 'Barbier v. Connolly', (1885) 113 U S 27: (28 Law Ed 923). The learned judge said:

"This clause undoubtedly intended not only that there should be no arbitrary deprivation of life or liberty or arbitrary spoliation of property but that equal protection & security should be given to all under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their personal & civil rights; that all persons should be equally entitled to pursue their happiness & acquire & enjoy property; that they should have like access to the Cts. of the country for the protection of their persons & property, the prevention & redress of wrongs & the enforcement of contracts; that no impediment should be interposed to the pursuits of anyone except as applied to the same pursuits by others under like circumstances, that no greater burdens should be laid upon one than are laid upon others in the same calling & conditions, & in the administration of criminal justice no different or higher punishment should be imposed upon one than such as is prescribed to all for like offences."

A large number of American decisions on the question were cited at the Bar; but we are, to some extent, relieved from the duty of considering all these decisions in detail, in view of the decision of the S. C. of India in 'Charanjit Lal Chaudhary v. Union of India', A I R (38) 1951 S. C. 41: (1950 S C R 869), where a number of the same American decisions as were cited before us, were considered, & certain principles were approved. These principles are summarized by Willis in a para. headed "Meaning & Effect of the Guaranty", at p. 579 in the Constitutional law of the United States. His Lordship Fazl Ali, J. of the S. C. of India accepted the summary as a correct statement of the law on the equal protection clause in the American Constitution (vide 'Charanjitlal v. Union of India', A I R (38) 1951 S C 41 at p. 44: (1950 S C R 869). Three of these principles refd. to by Willis have a direct bearing on the question before us. These three principles are:

"1. The guaranty of the equal protection of the laws means the protection of equal laws.

2. It forbids class legislation, but does not forbid classification which rests upon reasonable grounds of distinction: it merely requires that all persons subjected to such legislation shall be treated alike under like circumstances & conditions both in the privileges conferred & in the liabilities imposed.

3. Mathematical nicety & perfect equality are not required, & one who assails a classification must carry the burden of showing that it does not rest upon any reasonable basis."

(99) I now proceed to consider the arguments advanced before us on this part of the case in the light of the principles stated above. Mr. Das has contended that S. 3 of the impugned Act gives an arbitrary & naked power to the State Govt., untrammelled by any considerations, to pick & choose estates or tenures of any particular proprietor or tenure-holder & say that they have passed to & become vested in the State, while no action is taken against other proprietors or tenure-holders standing in like circumstances & conditions. It is stated that, as a matter of fact, the estates & tenures of some of the big landlords have only been notified so far. Mr. Das has refd. to certain affidavits filed on behalf of his clients. In one of the affidavits (that of Lakshman Nidhi), a statement of the gross income, etc., has been made, & the statement shows that the net income from the estates & tenures of the Maharajadhiraj, calculated under the provisions of the impugned Act, will be in the neighbourhood of three lakhs only. On that basis, the compensation payable to him will be about ten lakhs. A statement of the arrears of rent payable to the Maharajadhiraj, the estimated value of the standing timber in the estates of the Maharajadhiraj, a statement showing details of land settlement from 2-1-1946, etc., have also been put in. The statement of arrears shows that the balance outstanding at the end of 1357 Fasli was in the neighbourhood of thirty lakhs. It is stated that even deducting fifty per cent the State Government will get from arrears of rent more than what it will have to pay as compensation in other words, half the arrears of rent are made to pay for all the estates & tenures of the Maharajadhiraj Bahadur. In Misc. Judicial Case No. 239 of 1950 of which the petnr. is Raja Prithichand Lal Chaudhury, an affidavit discloses that the gross assets amount to Rs. 10 lakhs & odd, whereas the deductions as per the impugned Act will exceed the gross assets. These statements have not been controverted, & Mr. Das contends that they show how section 3 will operate in practice. He states that the State Govt. will take, at the beginning, the estates & tenures of such landlords only to whom very little compensation is to be made or to whom the payment can be made from the arrears of rent or other accumulated resources; thus, the estates of these big landlords will be made to pay for other smaller estates where the scale of compensation payable is higher & there are no arrears of rent or other resources. The contention of Mr. Das is that the effect of S. 3 has to be considered in the light of these facts & circumstances & if so considered, the effect is to give arbitrary power to the State Govt., to pick & choose a power which is not a reasonable discretion, but which clearly contravenes the equality provision of the Indian Constitution. Mr. Das placed strong reliance on the decision in 'Yick Wo v. Peter Hopkins', (1886) 118 U S 356: 30 Law Ed 220), where the pltf. in error was a native of China who had been found guilty of a violation of certain ordinances, which made it unlawful for any person or persons to establish, maintain or carry on a laundry within the corporate limits of the City & County of San Francisco without having first obtained the consent of a board of supervisors, except the same be located in a building constructed either of brick or stone, etc. The S. C. of California considered the ordinance as vesting in the board of supervisors a not unusual discretion in granting or withholding their assent to the use of wooden buildings as laundries, to be exercised in reference to the circumstances of each case, with a view to the protection of the public against the dangers of fire. The S. C. of America held otherwise, & Matthews, J. who delivered the opinion of the Ct., said as follows:

"We are not able to concur in that interpretation of the power conferred upon the supervisors. There is nothing in the ordinances which points to such a regulation of the business of keeping & conducting laundries. They seem intended to confer, & actually do confer, not a discretion to be exercised upon a consideration of the circumstances of each case, but a naked & arbitrary power to give or withhold consent, not only as to places, but as to persons."

(100) The learned Attorney-General sought to distinguish this decision on the footing that Matthews, J. based his decision not on the invalidity of the ordinances, but on the ground of discrimination in actual operation of the ordinances. It is true that Matthews, J. said:

"In the present case, we are not obliged to reason from the probable to the actual & pass upon the validity of the ordinances complained of, as tried merely by the opportunities which their terms afford of unequal & unjust discrimination in their administration. For the cases present the ordinances in actual operation, & the facts shown establish an administration directed so exclusively against a particular class of persons as to warrant & require the conclusion that whatever may have been the intent of the ordinances as adopted, they are applied by the public authorities charged with their administration, & thus representing the State itself, with a mind so unequal & oppressive as to amount to a practical denial by the State of that equal protection of the laws which is secured to the petnrs., as to all other persons, by the broad & benign provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Though the law itself be fair on its face & impartial in appearance, yet, if it is applied & administered by public authority with an evil eye & an unequal hand, so as practically to make unjust & illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the Constitution."

But if the judgment is read as a whole, it would appear that the ordinances themselves were held to be invalid, & Matthews, J. refd. with approval to the decision in 'Baltimore v. Redecke', (49 Md 217), which held that where the legislature commits to the unrestrained will of a single public officer the power to notify every person who employs a steam engine in the prosecution of any business in the City of Baltimore, to cease to do so, & by providing compulsory fines for every day's disobedience of such notice & order of removal, renders his power over the use of steam in that city practically absolute, so that he may prohibit its use altogether, the legislature practically gives a single individual uncontrolled power, & thus violates the principle that equal protection of the laws is a pledge of the protection of equal laws. The decision was so understood by the S. C. itself in 'Homer Adolph Plessy v. John H. Furguson', (1896) 163 U S 538: (41 Law Ed 256), where it was observed:

"Thus in 'Yick Wo v. Hopkins', (1886) 118 U S 256: (30 Law Ed 220), it was held by this Ct. that a municipal ordinance of the City of San Francisco to regulate the carrying on of public laundries within the limits of the municipality violated the provisions of the Constitution if it conferred upon the municipal authorities arbitrary power, at their own will & without regard to discretion, in the legal sense of the term, to give or withhold consent as to persons or places without regard to the competency of persons applying, or propriety of the places selected for the carrying on of the business."

(101) The learned Attorney-General has sought to justify S. 3 on the ground of administrative convenience, & has relied on the decision 'in people of the State of New York ex rel. Simon Lieberman v. John E. Van De Carr, Warden', (1905) 199 U S 552: (50 Law Ed 305). I do not think that that decision really helps the learned Attorney-General. The question in that case was the validity of S. 66, Sanitary Code of New York. The section was as follows:

"S. 66. No milk shall be received, held, kept, either for sale or delivered in the city of New York, without a permit in writing from the board of health, & subject to the conditions thereof."

The conteniton of Counsel for the pltf. in error was not that a business so directly affecting the health of the inhabitants of the city as the furnishing of milk might not be the subject of regulation under the authority of the state, but that the Ct. of appeals of New York had sustained this right of regulation to the extent of authorizing the board of health to exercise arbitrary power in the selection of those it might see fit to permit to sell milk under the section quoted; &, thus construed, it worked the depriviation of the pltf. in error's liberty & property without due process of law. This contention was repelled, & Day, J. who delivered the opinion of the Ct. said:

"We do not so understand the decision of the highest Ct. of New York. As we read it, the authority sustained is the grant of power to issue or withhold permits in the honest exercise of a reasonable discretion. In the opinion of the appellate division, whose judgment was affirmed in the Ct. of appeals, it was said: "such regulations, however, should be uniform, & the board should not act arbitrarily; & if this section of the sanitary code vested in them arbitrary power to license one dealer (in a lawful commodity) & refuse a license to another similarly situated, undoubtedly it would be invalid ('Yick Wo v. Hopkins', (1886) 118 U S 356: 30 Law Ed 220); but such was not its purpose, nor is that its fair construction."

It appears to me that there is no real conflict between the decision in 'Yick Wo's case', (1886) 118 U S 356: (30 Law Ed 220), & the decisioin which Day, J. gave in 'People of the State of New York Ex rel. Simon Lieberman's case', (1905) 199 U S 552: (50 Law Ed 305). The question was really one of construction of S. 66 of the Sanitary Code of the City of New York, & it was held that all that S. 66 did was to authorise the exercise of a reasonable discretion.

(102) In the case before us, the positon is different. I agree that with the best of intentions, it would be impossible for the State Govt. to take over all the estates & tenures at the same time, nor do they propose to do so. The process of taking over will undoubtedly spread over a number of years. In the meantime there is bound to be unequal treatment. The impugned Act does not prescribe any safeguards or rules, nor does it lay down any stages, indicative of how the process is to be worked out. On the contrary, it leaves the whole matter to the unfettered discretion of the State Govt. Even in respect of the same estate or tenure, the operation of S. 3 will result in an invidious distinction; the interest of one co-sharer will be taken while the interest of other co-sharers will remain intact, because the scheme of S. 3 is to take not estate by estate but proprietor by proprietor. On what reasonable basis can such a distinction be supported? I can find none. In the estates & tenures of the pltf. Maharajadhiraj, there are, it is stated, several co-sharers who have been left unaffected. The affidavits of thirteen such co-sharers have been filed before us. I should have thought that, administratively, it would be more convenient to acquire the entire interests in one estate before proceeding to take another. It should be made clear that some of these co-sharers are co-sharers in the parent estate of tenure & not in subordinate tenures, so that the argument that unless the parent estate is taken subordinate tenure cannot be taken will not hold water. If there were anything in the impugned Act to show that S. 3 was meant to get over or adjust administrative inconvenience or that in actual operation it would have that effect, one might hold that the discretion given by S. 3 was a reasonable discretion. I am aware that every fact which it is possible for us to assume, must be assumed in favour of the constitutionality of an enactment; but giving my best consideration to all the facts & circumstances, I am of the view that it is not possible to sustain S. 3 on the ground that it gives a reasonable discretion to the State Govt. On the contrary, it seems to me that, having regard to the scheme of operation of S. 3, it gives such an unrestrained power that it is bound to result in discrimination between members of the same class standing in like circumstances & condition; in other words, it denies the protection of equal laws.

(103) The other ground of inequality which Mr. P. R. Das has urged, relates primarily to the three slab systems in Ss. 23 & 24 of the impugned Act. That ground has been so fully covered by my learned brother Reuben, J. that I shall not be justified in repeating all that he has said, except to state that I respectfully agree with him on this point & make a few additional observations. The three slabs work unequally in various ways, & it is difficult to justify them on the principle of reasonable classification, as was sought to be done by the learned Attorney-General. Take, for example, the deduction in clause (f) of S. 23, viz. "cost of works of benefit to the raiyats of the estate or tenure". The impugned Act does not contain any provision for spending any amount for the benefit of the raiyats, & it is difficult to avoid the inference, contended for by Mr. Das, that the deduction is an arbitrary one made solely for the purpose of artificially reducing the amount of compensation. There are some big estates in Bihar where a substantial part of the value or wealth of the estate lies in unworked mineral deposits or in forests consisting of standing timber from which there is very little present income. Two such estates are the estates of the Maharaja of Chotanagpur & the Raja of Ramgarh. Affidavits have been filed on behalf of one of these estates to show the value of its unworked mineral deposits. It is well known that there are very few raiyats in forest lands or on land under which there are mineral deposits; yet these proprietors will have to submit to a heavy deduction on account of the "cost of works of benefit to the raiyats", though there may be fewer raiyats in their estates than in other estates of thickly populated areas. I agree that proprietors & tenure-holders may be treated as a class, but within the class itself the impugned Act authorises grossly unequal treatment. It is well settled that the principle of classification must have some reference to the purpose or object of the legislation. The legislature has, indeed, a wide discretion in the matter of distinctions to be made, & the members of legislature know the needs of the public for which the distinctions are to be made. But the legislature is not entitled to make a distinction or classification which is clearly unreasonable & arbitrary. The purpose or object of the slab system, I take it, is to give some equivalent in money (be it adequate or inadequate) for the property which is being acquired; that equivalent, according to the object of the legislation, should bear some relation to the 'value' of the property taken; but it is based on 'income' artificially & arbitrarily arrived at, resulting in unequal treatment of persons standing in like conditions & circumstances except in the matter of largeness or smallness of their interest. One typical example of the inequality is in the deduction of income-tax. All through the impugned Act, the assumption is as if income-tax is a tax on property instead of being a tax on income. In S. 25 (2) the net income from royalties is to be calculated by deducting from gross income (sic) income-tax paid 'thereon', though income-tax is paid on total income & not on income from a particular source only; the result of this Provision will again be unequal treatment.

(104) Therefore, it would be wrong to draw an analogy between the impugned Act & a tax law which imposes a tax on income on a progressive basis. Our attention has been drawn to some of the American decisions on inheritance tax law. In some of which a distinction was made between blood relations & strangers; 'Cornelius K. G. Billings v. People of the State of Illinois', (1903) 188 U S 98: (47 Law Ed 400), 'Jessie Norton Torrence Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Savings Bank', (1898) 170 U S 283: (42 Law Ed 1037). The distinction was upheld on the ground that the tax was not on money, but on the right to inherit, & might be graded according to the value of the inheritance or according to the relation of the person, who was inheriting, to the deceased holder of the property. In effect, it was held that such tax was not property tax at all. There is one other decision which, I think, is important — 'Cumberland Coal Co. v. Board of Revn. of Tax Assessments in Greene Country Pennsylvania', 284 U S 23: (76 Law Ed 146). The decision was given in seven cases which related to assessment for taxation of the coal lands in several townships. It appears that the commissioners assessed all coal in the same township at the same valuation, regardless of the remoteness or accessibility of the said coal to the market, cost of operation, means of transportation, etc., it was held that a system was deliberately adopted which ignored differences in actual values so that property in the same class as that of the complaining tax payer was valued at the same figure as the property of other owners which had an actual value admittedly higher. The decision in 'Carles U. Cotting & Francis Lee Higginson v. A. A. Godard', (1901) 183 U S 79: (46 Law Ed 92), is important in the sense that it affirmed the principle earlier laid down that an arbitrary selection can never be justified by calling it classification. It was observed:

"But while recognising to the full extent the impossibility of an imposition of duties & obligations mathematically equal upon all, & also recognizing the right of classification of industries & occupations, we must nevertheless always remember that the equal protection of the laws is guaranteed, & that such equal protection is denied when upon one of two parties engaged in the same kind of business & under the same conditions burdens are cast which are not cast upon the other. There can be no pretence that a stockyard which receives 99 head of cattle per day a year is not doing precisely the same business as one receiving 101 head of cattle per day each year. It is the same business in all its essential elements, & the only difference is that one does more business than the other. But the receipt of an extra 2 head of cattle per day does not change the character of the business. If once the door is opened to the affirmance of the proposition that a state may regulate one who does much business, while not regulating another who does the same but less business, then all significance in the guaranty of the equal protection of the laws is lost" These observations apply with equal force to the impugned Act.

(105) Apart from the slab systems, there are other instances of unequal treatment in the impugned Act. A proprietor or tenure-holder whose estate consists mostly of undeveloped or unworked mines is treated differently from other proprietors or tenure-holders, because he gets no compensation whatsoever for unworked or undeveloped mines. There is similar inequality of treatment with regard to standing timber. Even in the matter of arrears of rent, the proprietors of larger estates & tenures are put in a different position from the proprietors or tenure-holders of smaller estates. In the same estate or tenure, one co-sharer may be put in a different position from another, at the unrestrained will of the executive. S. 10 (2) authorises the State Govt. to terminate leases, apparently without payment of compensation, when the lessee has not done any prospecting or development work before the date of the commencemnt of the Act. This is, clearly enough, an arbitrary distinction between one set of lessees & another, based on no reasonable classification. Even amongst secured creditors whose claims are to be paid out of compensation money, there is distinction; see Cl. (5) of S. 24

(106) For all these various reasons, I hold that the impugned Act contravenes the provisions of Art. 14, Const. Ind., & is accordingly void. In my opinion, the whole Act is void, because the provisions which contravene the fundamental right guaranteed under Art. 14 cannot be extricated from other provisions of the impugned Act.

(107) I now turn to Cl. (4), Art. 31 of the Constitution to consider the question whether that clause prevents us from calling the impugned Act in question. Cl. (4) reads as follows:

"If any Bill pending at the commencement of this Constitution in the Legislature of a State has, after it has been passed by such Legisature, been reserved for the consideration of the President & has received his assent, then, notwithstanding anything in this constitution, the law so assented to shall not be called in question in any Ct. on the ground that it contravenes the provisions of Cl. (2)."

It is not disputed that the Bihar Land Reforms Bill which ripened into the impugned Act was pending at the commencement of the Constitution in the legislature of Bihar. It is not also disputed that the Bill was reserved for the consideration of the President & received his assent. Mr. Das has urged two points: firstly, he has emphasised the word 'law' occurring in Cl. (4), & has contended that the impugned Act, not being valid law for one reason or another, does not come within the meaning of the expression 'law' occurring in Cl. (4); secondly, he has contended that the only ground on which the impugned Act cannot be called in question under Cl. (4) is that it contravenes the provisions of Cl. (2). According to him, the assent of the President will not save the impugned Act if it contravenes some provisions other than those of Cl. (2), Art. 31. I do not think that his first contention is correct. I have already stated that the word 'law' has been used in different senses in the different clauses of Art. 31, & the context makes that quite clear. The second contention of Mr. Das, however, appears to me to be correct. In express terms, Cl. (4), Art. 31 says that "the law so assented to shall not be called in question in any Ct. on the ground that it contravenes the provisions of Cl. (2)". If the intention were that the law so assented to shall not be called in question on any ground whatsoever, the Constituent Assembly could have easily said so. On the contrary, they seemed to have deliberately confined the clause to one & one ground only, viz., that the law contravenes the provisions of Cl. (2). The effect of the assent of the President, therefore, is nothing more than this that the impugned Act cannot be called in question on the ground that it contravenes Cl. (2), Art. 31, if, however, the impugned Act contravenes, as I have found that it does, the provisions of Art. 14 of the Constitution, the assent of the President does not prohibit us from calling the impugned Act in question on that ground. It has been contended before us on behalf of the State of Bihar that the inequality, if any, relates to the matter of compensation only, & if Constituent Assembly intended to save the impugned Act from being called in question on the ground of inadequacy of compensation it must follow, by necessary implication, that the Constituent Assembly intended to save the impugned Act from any inequality in the matter of compensation. In my view, which I have already explained, the inequality is not confined to the matter of compensation only. Even if I were to hold that the inequality relates only to the matter of compensation, I do not think that that would prevent us from calling the impugned Act in question on the ground that it contravenes the fundamental right guaranteed by the provisions of Art. 14. Cl. (4)., Art. 31 seeks to [redacted] a fundamental right & must, in my opinion, be construed strictly. The learned Advocate General of Bihar, who followed the learned Attorney-General, for the State of Bihar, drew our attention to the word "notwithstanding anything in this Constitution" occurring in Cl. (4), Art. 31, but which did not occur in Cl. (6), & contended that those words enlarged the effect of the operative portion of the clause. He contended that the meaning of those words was that notwithstanding the provisions of Art. 14, the law assented to by the President could not be called in question. I am not prepared to accept this argument as correct. The words "notwithstanding anything in this Constitution" cannot have the effect of enlarging the operative portion of the clause which, in clear terms, mentions one & one ground only, namely, the ground arising out of the contravention of the provisions of Cl. (2), Art. 31.

(108) The learned Advocate-General of Bihar also contended that, apart from Cl. (4) altogether, Cl. (2), Art. 31 read with Entry 42 of List III showed that it was open to the legislature to specify whatever principles it chose to specify for determining the compensation; the legislature has, in its wisdom, chosen to fix certain principles, & it is not open to the Ct. to sit in judgment over the legislature. He states that in the matter of compensation, there is a difference between the American Constitution & the Indian Constitution, & except on the ground of fraud, it is not open to the Ct. to adjudicate on the reasonableness or otherwise of the principles specified for compensation. There is some difference in the wording of Entry 42 of List III & that of Cl. (2), Art. 31, which is not material for the purpose of this argument. But I think that there are two good reasons why the contention of the learned Advocate-General of Bihar cannot be accepted. Firstly, the word 'compensation' has a legal significance which cannot be ignored. It is to be remembered that Art. 31 (2) is a guaranteed fundamental right for the enforcement of which a remedy is provided. It can hardly have been the intention of the Constituent Assembly that a fundamental right guaranteed by the Constitution shall not be justiciable. (For this part of the argument I am ignoring Cl. (4), which does make one ground of contravention non-justiciable). Secondly, it is, no doubt, correct to say that the legislature can specify the principles on which compensation is to be given, but in specifying those principles, the legislature must obey the other provisions in Part III of the Constitution. It is not open to the legislature to say that I have been given the right to specify the principles, & therefore, it is open to me to fix principles in contravention of Art. 14 of the Constitution. If that were the view to be accepted, then the fundamental rights guaranteed by the provisions in Part III of the Constitution would be utterly meaningless. As stated in Art. 245 of the Constitution, which I have earlier quoted, the power to make laws by the legislature of a State is "subject to the provisions of this Constitution". It is, I think, correct that Cl. (4), Art. 31 was enacted to save certain Bills relating to compulsory acquisition of property as part of a general scheme of land reform, from being later called in question on the ground of inadequacy of compensation. But I do not think that there was any intention to save such Bills from contraventions other than the particular contravention refd. to in the operative portion of Cl. (4). In any view, the intention as expressed in the words used in Cl. (4), is clear enough. It prevents the Ct. from calling in question the impugned Act on the ground that it contravenes the provisions of Cl. (2), Art. 31, it does not prevent the Ct. from calling in question the impugned Act on any other ground. Therefore, my view is that Cl. (4), Art. 31 does not save the impugned Act.

(109) Delegated Legislation: Mr. Das has raised the further contention that the impugned Act is bad by reason of a delegation of legislative power. He has refd. particularly to S. 32 (2) & Cl. (p), Sub-s. (2), S. 43, Impugned Act. His contention may be briefly summarised thus: under Entry 42 of List III, the State Legislature can make a law with respect to, 'inter alia', "the form & the manner" in which compensation for property acquired for the purpose of a State is to be given; in the Impugned Act, particularly in the sections refd. to above, the State Legislature has not itself made a law with respect to "the form & the manner" in which compensation is to be given, but has left the law making entirely, or in substance, to the State Govt. It is contended that this is delegation of legislative power. It must be made clear here that the argument of Mr. Das on this point has no reference to Cl. (2), Art. 31 which requires, 'inter alia', that the 'law must provide' the manner in which compensation is to be given. It is one thing to say that the Impugned Act contravenes Cl. (2), Art. 31; but it is quite a different thing to say that the Impugned Act is bad by reason of a delegation of legislative power. Therefore, we have to consider this question of delegation of legislative power, irrespective of Cl. (2), Art. 31.

(110) This question of delegated legislation is a question of some complexity, & not always easy to answer. I am constrained to admit that I have veered from one point of view to another on this question, & have made up mind after a good deal of hesitation. If I had felt that our decision in these cases was final, I would have been content to rest my decision on the other findings which I have given; but as our decision is subject to appeal, it is desirable that I should record my finding on this question as well.

(111) For facility of understanding, I am placing below, side by side under two heads, what the legislature has itself determined & what it has left to the State Govt. in the matter of "the form & manner" of the compensation to be given under the Impugned Act:

"What the Legislature has itself determined.

1. The amount of compensation shall be paid in one of three alternatives forms:
(a) in cash, or
(b) in bonds, or
(c) partly in cash and partly in bonds.
2. The bonds shall be either negotiable, or non-negotiable & non-transferable.
3. The bonds shall be payable in forty equal instalments.
4. The bonds shall carry interest at 2½ per centum per annum.

What the Legislature has left to the Executive.

1. The State Govt. is to decide which of the three alternative forms to adopt, & if alternative (c) is adopted, to determine the proportion.
2. The State Govt. is to decide which of the two alternatives (as to the nature of the bonds) to adopt.
3. The State Govt. is to fix the period of the instalments.
4. The state Govt. is to determine at what periods the payment of interest will be made."

It would, I think, be wrong to say that the legislature has not, at all, applied its mind or has left the exercise of the legislative power entirely to the executive. It has given the executive (meaning the State Govt.) a somewhat unusual & wide discretion; but wide though the discretion is, it still has limits which have been fixed by the legislature, & those limits cannot be transgressed by the State Govt. In other words, the discretion or power given to the State Govt. is not an unlimited discretion or power. It may well be that the legislature thought fit to leave that discretion to the State Govt., because the State Govt. would be in the best position to know in what shape & to what extent the financial resources of the State would be able to bear the burden of compensation ,if & when it falls on the State Govt. to bear that burden.

(112) This question of delegated legislation has been the subject of many judicial decisions, which were considered by a S. B. of this Ct. in 'Kishorilal v. Debi Prasad', 29 Pat 71: (A I R (37) 1950 Pat 50). I do not propose to refer them all. I shall refer to only two decisions; one is the decision of the S. C. of India in the 'State of Bombay v. Narottamdas Jethabhai', Case No. 10 of 1950, D/- 20-12-1950: (A I R (38) 1951 S C 69), in which their Lordships distinguished the earlier decision of the F. C. in 'Jatindra Nath v. Province of Bihar', A I R (36) 1949 F C 175: (50 Cr L J 897), & reaffirmed the principles laid down in 'Empress v. Baruah', 5 I A 178: (4 Cal 172 P C). The other decision is the Australian case of 'Victorian Stevedoring & General Contracting Co. Proprietary Ltd. v. Dignan', (46 C L R 73), which was relied on in the F. B. decision refd. to above. If I may say so with respect, a very lucid exposition of the doctrine of delegated legislation will be found in the judgment of Dixon, J. in the Australian case refd. to above. Dixon, J. traced the origin of the doctrine from (a) the theory of 'separation of powers' in a written constitution, & (b) the well-known maxim 'delegata potestas non potest delegari'. I think that it is well-settled that the maxim refd. to above has no application to sovereign legislative bodies under the Indian Constitution. The P. C. has said in a number of cases that within the limits of their jurisdictions, the State (previously provincial) legislatures have plenary power. This view was expressed in 'Burah's case', 5 I A 178: (4 Cal 172 P C), as far back as 1878, & has now been re-affirmed by the S. C. of India. With regard to the doctrine of "the separation of powers', it has always been a difficult task to make a distinction between a law requiring compliance with directions upon some specified subject which the administration thinks proper to give, & a law investing the administration with authority, to legislate upon the same subject. In 'Field & Co. v. Clark', (1891) 143 U S 649: (36 Law Ed 294), Judge Ranney was quoted as stating the distinction thus:

"The true distinction is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, & conferring an authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under & in pursuance of the law. The first cannot be done; to the latter no valid objection be made."

The matter has been put somewhat differently in English decisions where it has been held that

"a general power of legislation belonging to a legislature constituted under a rigid constitution does not enable it by any form of enactment to create & arm with 'general' legislative authority a new legislative power not created or authorised by the instrument by which it is established." (See R. v. Burah, 5 Indian Appeals 178, at p. 194; &

In re, The Initiative & Referendum Act—(1919) A C 935 at p. 945).

Perhaps, the truth of the matter is that the doctrine of the separation of powers & its logical consequences were not accepted in the British Colonial legislative theory & practice to the extent to which they were accepted in America, even though some of the colonies (or dominions) had written constitutions with a separation of powers. In the Australian decision refd. to above, Dixon, J. said:

"I, therefore, retain the opinion which I expressed in the earlier case (Huddart Parkar Ltd., 44 C L R 492) that 'Roche v. Kronheimer', (29 C L R 329), did decide that a statute conferring upon the Executive a power to legislate upon some matters contained within one of the subjects of the legislative power of the Parliament is a law with respect to that subject, & that the distribution of legislative, executive & judicial powers in the Constitution does not operate to restrain the power of the Parliament to make such a law. This does not mean that a law confiding authority to the Executive will be valid, however extensive or vague the subject-matter may be, if it does not fall outside the boundaries of Federal power. There may be such a width or such an uncertainty of the subject matter to be handed over that the enactment attempting it is not a law with respect to any particular head or heads of legislative power."

Evatt, J. put the matter still more succinctly in the following observations:

"On final analysis, therefore, the Parliament of the Commonwealth is not competent to 'abdicate' its powers of legislation. This is not because Parliament is bound to perform any or all of its legislative powers or functions, for it may elect not to do so; & not because the doctrine of separation of powers prevents Parliament from granting authority to other bodies to make laws or by-laws & thereby exercise legislative power, for it does so in almost every statute; but because each & every one of the laws passed by Parliament must answer the description of a law upon one or more of the subject-matters stated in the Constitution. A law by which Parliament gave all its law-making authority to another body would be bad merely because it would fail to pass the test last mentioned."

In the case of our S. C. refd. to above ('The State of Bombay v. Narottamdas', (A I R (38) 1951 S C 69), the broad question whether it is permissible for the Legislatures, Central or Provincial, while acting within their legislative fields, to delegate their legislative powers was raised but not decided. It is, therefore, still an open question if we can go as far as Dixon & Evatt JJ. went in the Australian case. But it is clear that our S. C. re-affirmed the principles of 'Burah's case', 5 I A 178: (4 Cal 172 P C). His Lordship Das, J. analysed the principles in 'Burha's case', (5 I A 178: 4 Cal 172 P C) with reference to the various Ss. of Act XXII of 1869. Ss. 1 & 8 came under one head; S. 9 said:

"The said Lieutenant-Governor may from time to time, by notfn. in the Calcutta Gazette, extend 'mutatis mutandis' all or any of the provisions contained in the other sections of this Act to the Jaintia Hills, the Naga Hills, & to such portion of the Khasi Hills as for the time being forms part of British India. Every such notfn. shall specify the boundaries of the territories to which it applies."

Referring to this section, Lord Selborne observed:

"The legislature decided that it was fit & proper that the adjoining district of the Khasi & Jaintia Hills should also be removed from the jurisdiction of the existing Cts., & brought under the same provisions with the Garo Hills, not necessarily & at all events, but if & when the Lieutenant-Governor should think it desirable to do so; & that it was also possible that it might be expedient that not all, but some only, of those provisions should be applied to that adjoining district. And accordingly the Legislature entrusted, for these purposes also, a discretionary power to the Lieutenant-Governor."

If it was open to the legislature to entrust a discretionary power to the Lieutenant-Governor in such wide terms as to extend 'mutatis mutandis' all or any of the provisions contained in other sections of the Act to certain areas, I do not see why such discretionary power as has been left by the impugned Act to the State Govt. should be held bad on the ground of delegated legislation. Other instances of a still wider discretion left to the executive can be given, but I do not think it necessary to multiply instances (see 'Powell v. Apollo Candle Co. Ltd.', (1885) 10 A C 282; (54 L J P C 7); 'Archibald G. Hodge v. The Queen', (1883) 9 A C 117.

(113) Applying the principles laid down in these decisions, I would hold that the impugned Act, though it leaves a fairly wide discretionary power to the State Govt. in the matter of the form & manner of compensation, settles the legislative policy, lays down the limits of the discretion but confides to the State Govt. certain powers to carry out the details of the objects of the enactment; therefore, it is not invalid on the ground of delegated legislation. I must, however, express my feeling that if the principle of the doctrine of separation of powers as explained & accepted in some of the American decisions were to be applied with all its logical rigour to the legislatures under the Indian Constitution, it would be difficult to uphold the impugned legislation or other legislation of a similar nature.

(114) Mr. Das has commented that some of the provisions are so drafted that they are unworkable, & has particularly refd. to sub-s. (2), S. 32 which does not fix the intervals at which the forty equal instalments become payable. It appears that the matter has been left to the rule-making power of the State Govt. the validity of which has already been discussed on the question of delegated legislation. There are probably other drafting defects; but the question which we are now considering is whether the impugned Act is unconstitutional, & the criticism that a particular provision may be unworkable has no direct bearing on the constitutionality of the enactment.

(115) Fraud on the Constitution: Lastly, it was contended that the Impugned Act & the assent of the President were a fraud on the Constitution. This point has been effectively dealt with by my learned brother Reuben, J. & I have nothing further to add.

(116) Conclusion: For the reasons given above, I have arrived at the same conclusion as my learned brethren that the Bihar Land Reforms Act, 1950 (Bihar Act XXX (30) of 1950) is unconstitutional, though not for identical reasons. I have attempted to set out above the reasons which have led me to the conclusion at which I have arrived, & also answered the issues raised in these cases. Accordingly, I agree to the orders proposed by my learned brother Shearer, J.

Reuben J.—The case has been refd. to a Special Bench for a decision as to when an order under O. 41, R. 5, Civil P. C. passed by an appellate Ct. becomes operative, whether it operates from the moment when it is passed or only after communication to the Subordinate Ct.

[2] This appeal, which is directed against a decree for the recovery of possession of certain property, was filed on 13-4 1950. On the 14th of April by an order under O. 41, R. 5, an order for ad interim stay of delivery of possession was passed. The necessary requisites were filed on the 17th of April & the order was issued for communication to the subordinate Ct. By some mischance the applt. made an error in naming the subordinate Ct. & the communication was addressed to the Permanent Munsif of Araria instead of the Addl. Munsif of Araria. It reached the Permanent Munsif on the 25th of April & was given effect to in execution case No. 8 of 1949 of his Ct. instead of being given effect to in the execution case of the same number in the Ct. of the Addl. Munsif in which the decree under appeal was being executed. In consequence, the Addl. Munsif delivered possession of the property in suit to the D. H. in June 1950.

[3] The question at issue has come under the consideration of the Cts. in several reported decisions. The earliest of these is Bessesswari v. Horro Sundar, 1 C. W. N. 226, in which property was sold in execution of a decree & purchased by a third party subsequent to a stay order u/s- 545, Civil P. C. of 1882. Their Lordships held that the stay order was in the nature of a prohibition to the executing Ct. & would, therefore, take effect only when communicated. The executing Ct. therefore, had jurisdiction to sell the property & the sale was a valid one. Exactly the opposite view was taken by Woodroffe & Mookerjee JJ. in Hukum Chand v. Kamalanand, 33 Cal. 927 : (3 C. L. J. 67), in which the decree, as here, was for recovery of possession. While distinguishing the case of Bessesswari, (1 C. W. N. 226), on that ground that the question arose between the J. D. & a third party purchaser, their Lordships went on expressly to dissent from the decision in that case. They agreed that a prohibitory order, for instance an injunction, will operate as a prohibition only from the moment of communication but took the view that an order of stay is not such an order &, from the moment when it is made, suspends the power of the subordinate Ct. to carry on further execution proceedings. In Muthukumarasami v. Kuppusami, 33 Mad. 74 : (3 I. C. 82), a case of an execution sale, their Lordships folld. the case of Bessesswari, (1. C.W.N. 226), in preference to that of Hukum Chand v. Kamalanand, (33 Cal. 927 : 3 C. L. J. 67), but without any discussion. In Ramanathan v. Arunachellam, 38 Mad. 766 : (A. I. R. (1) 1914 Mad. 261), another case of execution sale, Sadasiva Ayyar J. expressly differed from the decision in Muthukumarsami Rowther's case, (33 Mad. 74 : 3 I. C. 82), and expressed the view that unless otherwise provided in the order itself the order operates immediately & suspends from that moment the jurisdiction of the Subordinate Ct. to proceed with the execution of the decree under appeal. The facts of the case were that a telegram was sent to the Vakil at Madura informing him of the order of stay & the Subordinate Ct. of Ramnad was moved by a petn. accompanied by an affidavit to stay the sale but it refused to act on the telegram in the absence of an official communication. Spencer J. made this a ground for distinguishing the case of Muthukumarsami Rowther, (33 Mad. 74 : 3 I. C 82). In his opinion, the Subordinate Ct. acted injudiciously in not postponing the sale in order to ascertain the truth of the information received & he treated this as a reason for setting aside the sale. At the same time he observed that there was much force in the observation of Woodroffe J. in Hukum Chand v. Kamalanand, (33 Cal. 927 : 3 C. L. J. 67) :

> "That there is no reason why the operation of an order of the H. C. should be made contingent, say, upon the due performance of the duties of the post office."

The matter next came before a F. B. in K. Venkatachalapati v Kameswaramma, 41 Mad. 151 : (A. I. R. (5) 1918 Mad. 391 F.B.), in respect of an attachment in execution of a decree made after the passing of an order of stay. Their Lordships accepted the view in Bessesswari's case, 1 C.W.N. 226. According to Ayling J., the order of the appellate Ct. is in the nature of a prohibition & therefore, operates only from communication. Seshagiri J. refd. to the provisions of O. 41, R. 5 & argued that the Ct. of first instance retains jurisdiction to execute a decree in spite of the filing of an appeal & therefore, the power can only be taken away by communication made to it.

[4] The view in Bessesswari's case, (1 C. W. N. 226), was next taken by a F. B. of the Allahabad H. C. in Parsotam v. Barhma Nand, 50 ALL 41: (A. I. R. (14) 1927 ALL 401 F B.). Mukerji J , who delivered the leading judgment, regarded the order of stay as a "direction to somebody" & therefore, dependent on communication. He took the analogy of a principal directing his agent to purchase a ton of wheat & then countermanding his order by a direction received by his agent only after the completion of the purchase. He pointed out that by the sale proclamation the public are invited by the Ct. to come & bid for the property & asked whether there would be any moral justification for subsequently informing an innocent third party purchaser that the sale was void by reason of an uncommunicated order of stay. With respect, I would submit that analogy is not a safe guide & that moral considerations are irrelevant in a matter of interpretation. The case before their Lordships was one of a stranger purchaser & his Lordship held that the sale was a valid sale. He drew a distinction between such a case & that of a D. H. purchaser, observing :

"The D. H. cannot shake off his character as such merely by reason of his auction-purchase, & he is bound by all orders passed in the case. A stay order, therefore, will operate against him & it may be that a purchase by a D. H. will be set aside on the mere ground of the passing of a stay order."

The point was next consd. but not decided in Jatis Chandra v. Kshirode Kumar, A. I. R. (30) 1943 Cal. 319 : (I. L. R. (1943) 1 Cal. 274). Premising that Hukum Chand Boid's case, (33 Cal. 927 : 3 C. L. J. 67) merely disapproved the reasoning in the case of Bessesswari, (1 C. W. N. 226) & not the decision therein, their Lordships proceeded on the assumption that a stay order made by the appellate Ct. operates from the time when it is passed. They took the view that the Subordinate Ct. nevertheless did not lose jurisdiction over the execution proceedings & the order passed by it in contravention of the stay order might be irregular or even illegal but was still an act done in exercise of jurisdiction, to be set aside by appropriate proceedings. They observed :

"The Ct. which passed the order or did the act may itself recall it, & ought to do so, when it is later on apprised of the stay order."

Apparently, they contemplated that on the attention of the executing Ct. being drawn to the existence of the stay order the executing Ct. will automatically restore the status quo ante the passing of the order of stay. The reason for this view is explained immediately after, namely that, if the action taken contrary to the stay order be regarded as without jurisdiction the discovery that this was so might be made so late that injustice might result to an innocent party. Finally, the question came before a F. B. of the Lahore H. C. in Karam Ali v. Raja, A. I. R. (36) 1949 Lah. 108 : (Pak. L. R. 1949 Lah. 83 F.B.). The F. B. on a detailed discussion of the authorities came to the conclusion that the order of stay operates from the moment when it is passed & has the effect from that moment of depriving the subordinate Ct. of its jurisdiction to execute the decree. Munir, Ag. C. J., who delivered the leading judgment, proceeded on an interpretation of O. 41, R. 5 & observed that any consideration of inconvenience or hardship is irrelevant, as, in his opinion, the meaning of the rule is plain, an opinion with which I respectfully agree.

[5] The provision which we have to interpret is:

"An appeal shall not operate as a stay of proceedings under a decree or order appealed from except so far as the Appellate Ct. may order, nor shall execution of a decree be stayed by reason only of an appeal having been preferred from the decree; but the Appellate Ct may for sufficient cause order stay of execution of such decree."

It is noticeable that this rule does not provide for an order directed to anybody. It empowers the appellate Ct in absolute terms to stay execution. It does not specify any person or Ct. to whom the order is to be communicated. In the absence of any provision or direction to the contrary an order of a Ct. must be taken to operate from the moment when it is made :

"The theory of judicial procedure is that the cogent & binding effect of the order begins immediately from the time when the order is pronounced by the lips of the Judge, & if that could be done physically which legally is supposed to be done, & which one would desire to be done if it were possible, every order would be completed on the spot, written out by the judicial officer & in curia before the Ct. rises, & delivered to the parties." [Lord Westbury, L. C. in Ex parte Hookey, (1862) 45 E R 1261 : (4 De G. F. & J. 456). Vide, also Jones v. Roberts, (1825) 148 E R 538 : (M'Cl & Yo 567) and Verlander v. Codd, (1822) 57 E R 37 : (1 Sim. & St. 93)].

On its terms, the rule directs that proceedings in execution may not be taken contrary to an order of stay passed by the appellate Ct. It follows that from the moment the stay order is passed the executing Ct. is deprived of the power of executing the decree & any action taken by it in execution of the decree would be without jurisdiction.

[6] An interpretation which makes the operation of the order depend upon communication is open to the objection that it introduces into the rule something which is not to be found there. Also, far from making for certainty such a rule would make for uncertainty. It raises at once the question as to what is to be consd. as communication. Will a statement from the Bar made to the executing Ct. or an affidavit from a party informing the Ct. of the passing of such an order be "communication" ? Or, supposing that the copy of the order issued by the Ct. is received in the executing Ct. but owing to some cause is not brought to the notice of the presiding officer, is it to be taken that there is "communication" ? Or, if the decree has been transferred to another Ct. for execution, will "communication" to the Ct. which passed the decree be sufficient ? It also makes the date of the operation of the order depend on the efficiency & honesty of the officers responsible for transmitting the order & on possible sharp practice on the part of persons interested in delaying it. The importance that there should be certainty as to the date from which an order of a Ct. operates is well expressed by Lord Westbury L. C. (ibid) in words which will bear repetition :

"The greatest possible confusion would arise were it otherwise. In fact, all persons dating their rights from the time of the order being pronounced would be thrown into a state of most inconvenient uncertainty, if they could not exhibit to another Ct. or produce for the purpose of any legal inquiry the order containing the directions of the Ct. with the date, in the certainty that that date will be accepted as the time when the order is made. There would be no possible mode by which the application of Acts of Parliament & the limitation of time could be regulated, unless the Ct. abides by a general principle of interpretation".

On the score of injustice also, I do not agree that the balance is in favour of the view take in Bessesswari's case, (1 C. W. N. 226). If a Ct. has acted without jurisdiction & a person has entered into possession of property to which he is not entitled in law, he cannot complain if the person entitled thereto gets the property back. I have no doubt that the hands of the Cts. however, are sufficiently long to enable the person thus dispossessed to get any equitable relief to which he may be justly entitled.

[7] For these reasons, I hold that the delivery of possession in this case was without jurisdiction. In the circumstances of the case, however, I do not think it is necessary to direct a restitution of possession. The property is a small area of Parti land on which some huts stood & have been removed. The valuation as given in suit is only Rs. 45. I propose to follow the course adopted in Hukum Chand Boid's case, 33 Cal. 927 : (3 C.L.J. 67) namely that the resps. will remain in possession of the property subject to making a deposit of Rs. 400 as security for costs & compensation recoverable by the appellant in the case of his success in this appeal The deposit should be made in the Ct. below within one month from today. On the making of the deposit, the ad interim stay order will stand discharged. Failing compliance, the ad interim stay order will be made absolute & the executing Ct. will restore possession to the applt. As the applt's own mistake led to this confusion it is fair that the parties should bear their own costs:

[8] Imam J — This is an appln. by the deft. J. D. under O. 41, R. 5, Civil P. C. for stay of execution proceedings in the Ct. below pending the hearing of the second appeal in this Ct. The pltfs. had instituted a suit for declaration of their title over & for recovery of possession of a very small piece of land upon which the appct. had wrongly erected a structure. The whole suit was valued at Rs 45. The Ct. of first instance & the lower appellate Ct had decreed the pltfs' suit. A second appeal was filed by the appct. in this Ct. on 13-4-1950. On 14-4-1950, the Registrar of this Ct. ordered ad interim stay while admitting the appln. under O. 41, R. 5 of the Code. The Second Appeal was admitted on 25 7 1950. An appln. for delivery of possession was filed by the pltfs. D Hs on 31-5 1950, in the Ct. of the Addl. Munsif of Araria. In June 1950, delivery of possession was made by the said Ct. to the D. Hs. Owing to the appct. wrongly stating that the execution proceedings were pending in the Ct. of the Munsif at Araria, the order of ad interim stay of this Ct. was communicated to that Ct. & not to the Ct. of the Addl. Munsif of Araria, on 25-4 1950. Later on the mistake was discovered, but delivery of possession had already taken place.

[9] The report of the Nazir dated 4-6-1950, shows that delivery of possession was made that day & the two thatched houses on the land in dispute were demolished. It may be mentioned that the decree had directed the appct. to remove the houses within one month from the date of the judgment of the Ct. of first instance, otherwise the pltfs. would be entitled to get it done through the Ct.

[10] The real question before this Ct. is whether the rule obtained in the appln. under O. 41, R. 5 of the Code should be made absolute or discharged, that is to say, whether the appln. under O. 41, R. 5 of the Code should be dismissed or allowed & the execution proceedings in the Ct. below should be stayed until the second appeal in this Ct. filed by the appct. is disposed of. O. 41, R. 5 of the Code expressly prohibits the stay of execution unless the appellate Ct. is satisfied (a) that substantial loss may result to the party applying for stay of execution unless the order is made (b) that the appln. has been made without unreasonable delay & (c) that security has been given by the appct. for the due performance of such decree or order as may ultimately be binding on him. In the present case, the land in dispute is of a very small area & the whole appeal has been valued at Rs. 45 only. The thatched houses erected by the appct. on the land have already been demolished on 4-6 1950, when delivery of possession was made to the D. H. In my opinion, having regard to all the circumstances this is not a case where substantial loss will be suffered by the appct. if stay of execution proceedings is not ordered. The houses having been demolished, there is nothing more for the appct. to suffer, & the land is parti land, not culturable. If the appct. succeeds in his appeal & the decree of the Cts. below is reversed, he can always apply for restitution u/s. 144 of the Code. The Ct. has ample powers under the said section to order mesne profits, damages & compensation. In my opinion, the appln. under O. 41, R. 5 of the Code filed by the appct. must be dismissed, & the ad interim order of stay must be vacated.

[11] I have had the advantage of perusing the judgment of my learned brother, Reuben J. Having regard to the view I take on the merits of the appln. under O. 41, R. 5 of the Code, I am of the opinion that it is not really necessary to decide in this case which view is the more correct one, that taken by the learned Judges of the Calcutta H. C. in Hukum Chand v. Kamalanand, 33 Cal. 927: (3 C. L. J. 67) or the view taken by the learned Judges of the Madras H. C. in Venkatachalapati v. Kameswaramma, 41 Mad 151: (A I.R. (5) 1918 Mad. 391 F. B.) As my learned brother, however, has taken, the view that the decision of the learned Judges of the Calcutta H. C. in Hukum Chand Boid's case, (33 Cal. 927 : 3 C.L.J. 67) is the correct view, I must express my own opinion. In my opinion, the decision of the learned Judges of the Madras H. C. in Venkatachalapati Rao's case, 41 Mad. 151: (A. I. R. (5) 1918 Mad. 391 F. B.) is more acceptable to me than the view of the learned Judges of the Calcutta H. C. in Hukum Chand Boid's case: (33 Cal 927 : 3 C. L. J 67). O. XLI, R. 5 of the Code expressly states that an appeal shall not operate as a stay of proceedings except so far as the appellate Ct. may order, nor shall execution of a decree be stayed by reason only of an appeal having been preferred from the decree, but the appellate Ct. may, for sufficient cause, order stay of execution of such decree; that is to say, if an execution proceeding is pending in the executing Ct such proceeding shall continue although an appeal has been filed against the decree, unless the appellate Ct. orders stay of execution of the decree. When an appellate Ct. orders stay of execution of the decree, such an order must be regarded as one which prohibits the executing Ct. to proceed with the execution of the decree. The order being in the nature of a prohibitory order must be communicated to the executing Ct. which will then cease to proceed with the execution of the decree. Although R. 5 of O. XLI of the Code does not speak of the stay order of the appellate Ct. being communicated to the executing Ct. I think a reasonable reading of the rule indicates that where an appellate Ct. has ordered stay of execution of the decree, such an order must be communicated to the executing Ct. otherwise the executing Ct. being ignorant of the order of stay, would be justified in proceeding with the execution proceedings. I do not think that any real practical difficulty can arise in interpreting R. 5 of O XLI in the way the learned Judges of the Madras H. C. have done in Venkatachalapati Rao's case, (41 Mad, 151: A. I. R. (5) 1918 Mad. 391 F. B.). To hold that every thing done by the executing Ct. after the date of the order of stay of the appellate Ct., & in ignorance of it, is without jurisdiction, would, in my opinion, raise many practical difficulties I think, it would be more reasonable to say that such acts of the executing Cts. though done with jurisdiction, are voidable but not void. I think the provisions of S. 151 of the Code are sufficiently wide to cover a case where the executing Ct. has done certain things, in ignorance of the stay order of the appellate Ct. & such acts cannot be allowed to stand for the ends of justice, or to prevent abuse of process of the Ct. The observations of Lord Westbury in Ex parte Hookey, (1862) 45 E. R 1261: (4 De G. F. & J. 456) must be read in connection with the facts of that case. The point which his Lordship was determining was as to what is the date from which limitation should be calculated under the provisions of a certain statute & he was of the opinion that the date from which such calculation should be made is the date on which the order is pronounced & not the date on which the order is drawn up. I think, there can be little room for doubt that the date of the order of a Ct. is the date on which it is pronounced. It is, however, quite a different matter as to whether the stay order of an appellate Ct. given on a particular date makes all proceedings before the executing Ct. without jurisdiction when that Ct. was ignorant of the order of the appellate Ct. I have merely in a short compass expressed my agreement with the view taken by the learned Judges of the Madras H C. in Venkatachalapati Rao's case, (41 Mad. 151: A.I.R. (5) 1918 Mad. 391 F.B.) out of deference to the view of my learned brother, Reuben J. although I think in this case it is not necessary to decide the point at all as the circumstances in the present case do not establish grounds for allowing the appln. under O. XLI, R. 5 of the Code.

[12] I would accordingly dismiss this appln. with costs. Hearing fee, one gold mohur.

[13] Ramaswami J.—The terms of the statutory rule—O. 41, R 5 are absolute, & as a matter of construction I hold that the jurisdiction of the Ct. executing the decree is superseded from the moment the stay order is passed by the appellate Ct. I can see no reason in principle why the operation of the order of the appellate Ct. should be made conditional on its being communicated to the executing Ct. It is no doubt true that if proceedings have to be taken against a person for contempt of the authority of the Ct. in proceeding with execution after the order of stay has been made, it is essential to prove that such person has disobeyed or acted in contravention of the order with knowledge that it had been made; but the operation of the order is not postponed till it has been communicated to the subordinate Ct. or the party intended to be affected by it. The reason is that the order of the appellate Ct. for stay has direct effect upon the execution proceeding itself, although if the proceedings are taken to punish the person who has carried on the execution after it had been stayed, it is necessary to show that he had notice of the order because it is only after such notice & his act would be in defiance of law & in contempt of Ct. In Buffandeau v. Edmondson, (17 California 436), an American case, it was pointed out by the S. C. that injunction by an appellate Court for stay of execution operates as a supersedeas to the execution as soon as it is made.

The legal authority to proceed with the execution is withdrawn by the act of a competent Ct. & there is no more legal justification for the execution after the order for stay than there would be for execution after the proceedings have been quashed. In this context the observations of Lord Westbury In re The Risca Coal & Iron Co. (1862) 31 L. J. Ch. 429: (45 E. R. 1261) are important. The question in that case was whether u/s. 33 of the statute, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 108, which provided "that no notice of motion for a rehearing before the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain or Ireland respectively, of any order of the Master of the Rolls in England or Ireland, or of any of the Vice-Chancellors in England under the said Act or in this Act, shall be given after the expiration of three weeks after the order complained of shall have been made"

Time for the notice began to run from the date the order was pronounced or from the date when the order was drawn up. Dealing with the question of inconvenience that would arise if time began to run only from the date the order was drawn up, the Lord Chancellor observed:

"I think, therefore, I shall abide by a rule of convenience: certainty in the matter is convenience, certainty you attain by abiding by the date of the order; uncertainty you introduce when you depart from that date. A variation from the common rule of abiding by the record is introduced by a departure from that date. Great laxity of practice would be introduced & encouraged by a departure from that date."

To the same effect is Holtby v. Hodgson, (1890) 24 Q B. D. 103: (59 L J. Q. B. 46) in which judgment having been signed in an action against a married woman, execution upon which was limited to her separate estate not subject to any restraint upon anticipation, it was sought to attach in execution a sum of money recovered by her as damages in an action against the garnishee, & for which the Judge at the trial had directed judgment to be entered for her. It was held by the Ct. of Appeal that the money could be attached & further that the fact that judgment in the action against the garnishee was not in fact entered until after the commencement of the garnishee proceedings did not affect the right of the pltf. to garnishee order.

[14] For these reasons, I hold that delivery of possession made to the respondent in this case was without jurisdiction & I agree to the order which my learned brother Reuben has proposed,

V.S.B. Order accordingly.

Misrilal & others — Petnrs. v. The State.

Cr. Misc. Nos. 581, 614 & 619 of 1950, D/- 9-4-1951.

(a) Public Safety—Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3 (1) (a) (iii)—"Maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community" —Adulteration of foodstuffs.

The plain duty of the Ct is to consider the words in the Act as they stand & give to them their ordinary meaning. The words "maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community" themselves have to be construed independently of what is stated in items 3 & 18 in the Concurrent List of Sch. VII of the Constitution & what is contained in R. 81 of the Defence of India Rules. The words cannot reasonably carry the meaning that any one who adulterated foodstuffs would be acting in a manner prejudicial to the maintenance of supplies or the continuity of supplies.

Where the facts stated in the orders of detention were that one R manufactured flour in a Mill, one B stored stone powder & mixing was done at the house of one M & that these persons entered into a conspiracy to profiteer by sale of flour at the expense of the health of the community:

Held that the conduct of the persons did not come within the meaning of the words in S. 3 (1) (a) (iii), & the detention must be held to be illegal. [Paras 7, 9, 10]

(b) Public Safety—Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3—Power of Ct. to question facts.

It is not open to the H. C. to question the facts stated in the grounds of detention, or whether those facts were sufficient to satisfy the detaining authority to order the detention of the detenu. [Para 4]

Gopal Prasad & Gokulnand Prasad (in No. 581), Baldeo Sahai, Kailash Rai, B. K. Sharma & K. Dayal (in No. 614) & Ram Jatan Singh & Kanhaiyaji (in No. 619)—for Petnrs.; Govt. Advocate — for the State.

Case referred to:

('50) A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 27 : (51 Cr. L. J. 1383).

Imam J.—These three cases have been refd. to us under Cl. 28, Letters Patent of this Ct. on a difference of opinion between my brethren Das & Narayan JJ. The point refd. to us for our consideration has been stated by them as follows :

"The point is if on the grounds of detention stated by the State Govt. to pass (sic) the orders of detention against the three petnrs. under Cl. (iii) of sub s. 1 (a) of S. 3, Preventive Detention Act, (Act IV [4] of 1950). One of us held that on his interpretation of the expression 'maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community', occurring in the said clause, the orders of detention were legal; another of us held that on his interpretation of the said expression, the orders of detention were not legal. This is the point on which we differed. The reasons for the different views on the point formulated above were fully stated by us previously. To those views we still adhere."

[2] The three persons concerned in these applns. are Raghunandan Prasad in Cr. Misc. No. 614 of 1950, Biswanath Prasad in Cr. Misc. No. 619 of 1950, & Misri Lal, Tailor, in Cr. Misc. No. 581 of 1950. The grounds of detention served upon Raghunandan Prasad state the following facts. Raghunandan Prasad of Shankar Flour Mills & Biswanath Prasad, cycle-repairer, have their shops adjacent to each other. Misri Lal, Tailor, lives at the back of this block of shops. A back door of the shop of Bishwanath Prasad opens in the house of Misri Lal. The Sub-divisional Officer of Patna Sadar on receiving information that stone powder was being mixed with Ata (flour), made a surprise raid on 22-9-1950, in the aforesaid three buildings. Thirty-five bags of stone powder were found in the premises occupied by Bishwanath Prasad. A trail of stone powder was noticed going in the direction of the house of Misri Lal, & in that house one bag of stone powder was recovered. Some adulterated Ata was also recovered, & the sample on examination by public analyst was found to be highly adulterated. The aforementioned three persons were apparently in conspiracy of profiteering in sale of flour at the expense of the health of the community. Raghunandan Prasad manufactured the flour, Bishwanath Prasad stored the powder, & the mixing was done in the house of Misri Lal. The grounds of detention of Bishwanath Prasad & Misri Lal state the same facts. In the opinion of the detaining authority, the above mentioned circumstances satisfied the State Govt. that if these persons were allowed to remain at large, they would indulge in activities to the prejudice of the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community. For prevention of such activities, the State Govt. consd. their detention necessary. The grounds of detention at the commencement refer to the deficit of food grains in the State of Bihar owing to various causes, such as the failure of the autumn crop caused by drought & excessive rain & floods, subsequent drought in October causing enormous damage to the winter crop. It then refers to the way the price of rice has shot up between the periods 7-6-1950 to 18-10-1950, & that blackmarketing & hoarding by anti-social elements contributed to a great extent in this acute & sudden rise in the prices of food grains which, if unchecked, might even bring about famine conditions. Taking advantage of the food shortage, unscrupulous dealers have started adulterating food stuffs which would bring them ill-gotten gains at the risk of even causing epidemic among the consumers. Unwholesome food "thrown into the rationing system is likely to cause serious difficulties in the distribution of food stuff," is also stated at the commencement of the grounds of detention. Although the paper book placed before us does not disclose specifically this passage in the grounds of detention of Bishwanath Prasad & Misri Lal, yet I think we may keep in mind that has been stated in the grounds of detention of Raghunandan Prasad when considering the case of all the three persons, particularly when they are accused of having entered into a conspiracy to profiteer by the sale of flour at the expense of the health of the community.

[3] In the case of Misri Lal, the learned Advocate appearing for him wished to show that from the search list it was not apparent that a bag of stone powder was recovered from the house of Misri Lal. On behalf of Bishwanath Prasad it was argued, in addition to the general arguments which were made by Mr. Baldeva Sahay on behalf of Raghunandan Prasad, that para. 7 of the grounds merely stated that these three persons were apparently in conspiracy of profiteering in sale of flour at the expense of the health of the community, which could not be said to be any ground for detention having regard to the provisions of the Preventive Detention Act (Act IV [4] of 1950) herinafter refd. to as the Act.

[4] I do not think that it is possible to accede to the argument on behalf of Misri Lal that in fact a bag of stone powder was not recovered from his house, for the reference made to us is on the grounds of detention stated by the State Govt. It is not open to this Ct. to question the facts stated in the grounds of detention, or whether those facts were sufficient to satisfy the detaining authority to order the detention of the detenu. We must, therefore, proceed on the facts stated in the grounds of detention against Misri Lal & the other two persons & decide whether on the grounds stated, the detention of these persons was legal under cl. (iii) of Sub-S. 1 (a) of S. 3 of the Act.

[5] Before I deal with the contention of Mr. Baldeva Sahay, it is necessary to set out the relevant portions of S. 3 of the Act with which we are concerned in this reference. Sub-cl. (1) of S. 3 of the Act states:

"The Central Govt. or the State Govt. may: (a) if satisfied with respect to any person that with a view to preventing him from acting in any manner prejudicial to—
(iii) the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community, it is necessary so to do, make an order directing that such person be detained."

[6] The Act in its original form was declared intra vires except for S. 14 by the Supreme Ct. in Gopalan v. State of Madras, A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 27. In my opinion, it is these words of the section which have to be construed & not items 3 & 18 in the Concurrent List of Sch. VII, Const. Ind.

[7] Mr. Baldeva Sahay refd. to items 3 & 18 in the Concurrent List of Sch. VII, of the Constitution & pointed out that adulteration of foodstuffs and other goods was a distinct item from the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community as stated in item 3 of the said List. He also refd. to R. 81, Defence of India Rules, where in sub-cl. (2) the expression "for maintaining supplies & services essential to the life of the community" is stated, & yet throughout R. 81, Sub-cl. (2) there was no mention of adulteration of foodstuffs & other goods. He argued from this that the various legislative authorities never contemplated that adulteration of foodstuffs & other goods would come under the expression "maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community" as to be found in S. 3 (1) (a) (iii) of the Act. It seems to me, however, that the plain duty of the Ct. is to consider the words in the Act as they stand & give to them their ordinary meaning. The words themselves have to be construed independently of what is stated in items 3 & 18 in the Concurrent List of Sch. VII of the Constitution & what is contained in R. 81, Defence of India Rules.

[8] The facts stated in the orders of detention may be summed up as follows. The detenu Raghunandan Prasad manufactured flour at Shankar Flour Mills, the detenu Bishwanath Prasad stored stone powder & mixing was done at the house of the detenu Misri Lal, & that these persons entered into a conspiracy to profiteer by sale of flour at the expense of the health of the community.

In a raid upon the premises of these detenus, thirty-five bags of stone powder were found in the premises of Bishwanath Prasad & one bag of stone powder was found in the house of Misri Lal, & some adulterated ata was also recovered, a sample of which on examination by the public analyst was found to be highly adulterated. Do these facts stated in the grounds of detention come within the purview of S. 3 (1) (a) (iii) of the Act is what I have to consider. There can be no question that the conduct of the detenus stated in the grounds of detention was highly reprehensible particularly in these days of food shortage & economic difficulties which the State is facing. I have, however, to consider the case of the detenus not on moral grounds but on legal grounds, & if their conduct comes within the meaning of the words in S. 3 (1) (a) (iii) of the Act, then the detention must be held to be valid. On the other hand, if on a fair & reasonable reading of the words in S. 3 (1) (a) (iii) of the Act, the act of the detenus as stated in the grounds of detention cannot be included within the meaning of those words, then the detention must be held to be illegal, no matter how gross & anti-social the act of the detenus may be.

[9] According to Webster's Dictionary, the word "maintain" has various meanings including "to support, to sustain, to keep up; not to suffer to fail or decline." The word "maintain," & (sic) according to Webster it means "support & up-keep of property, machinery, equipment etc." According to Webster, the word "supply" has amongst various meaning the meaning "to fill the needs of or to furnish with supplies, provisions, equipment or the like, as well as filling a want, a need." The word "supplies" therefore, carries with it, to my mind, the meaning to fill the needs of or to supply provisions to a community. The meaning of the words "the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community," therefore, must be up-keep of the needs & the provisions essential to the community. These may be of various kinds impossible to define, but so long as they are essential to the community, their up-keep would be essential for the purpose of the Act. As I read these words, I think the true meaning to be given to them is to prevent any person from doing an act in any manner prejudicial to the up-keep of the needs, the provisions & the services essential to the community, that is to say, the flow of supplies & services essential to the community must be continued to be maintained in the interest of the community & any one who did any act to prejudice it was liable to be detained by the detaining authority under the Act. I do not think that the words "maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community" could reasonably carry the meaning that any one who adulterated foodstuffs would be acting in a manner prejudicial to the maintenance of supplies or the continuity of supplies. It is true that adulterated foodstuff supplied to the community may be harmful to its health, but supplying such adulterated foodstuff would not be prejudicing the maintenance of supplies. The Act does not speak of profiteering, much less profiteering at the expense of the health of the community. I think it would be straining the language of S. 3 (1) (a) (iii) of the Act to apply it to acts such as are stated in the grounds of detention served on the petnrs. in these cases. I can quite conceive of the position where hoarding done on a large scale affects the flow, continuity & the up-keep of supplies essential to the community, attracting the provisions of the Act. I can also conceive of the position where by acts of sabotage production of supplies essential to the community is disturbed & enough supplies are not manufactured or produced to meet the needs of the community coming within the purview of the Act. Conceivably where certain persons persuade the cultivators not to grow any food or that if they grow any food they should conceal their produce, the act may also come within the purview of the Act because if such instigation was successful, then the produce of the land would not be available for distribution to the community, & thus the up-keep, the continuity, the flow, or the maintenance of supplies essential to the community would be affected. The facts alleged against the detenus in these cases, however, do not disclose any such thing. They merely disclose that these individuals are guilty of a very grave anti-social conduct & that by selling spurious foodstuff they are making a profit & also endangering the health of the community. Such conduct, in my opinion, is not covered by the words of the Act "maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community."

[10] In my opinion, therefore, the detention of the detenus was illegal on the grounds stated in the grounds of detention, & I would answer the point stated by my brethren Das & Narayan JJ. in the negative. The applns. therefore, should be allowed & it must be held that the detention of the detenus is illegal. In my opinion the petnrs. should be released forthwith.

[11] Shearer J.—I entirely agree. The language used in S. 3 (1) (a) (ii) & (iii), Preventive Detention Act, 1950, reproduces the language used in Item 3 of the Concurrent List. In view of this too narrow or forced a construction is not to be put on the words "acting in any manner prejudicial to . . . . . the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community." The expression "maintenance of supplies . . . . . essential to the community" are, in my opinion, to be construed on the ejusdem generis principle along with the expressions "the security of the State" & "the maintenance of public order." In order to justify the making of an order of detention u/s. 3 (1) (a) (iii) it must, in my opinion, be shown that a reasonable apprehension exists that, if the person against whom the order is made, is permitted to remain at large, he will do something which is calculated to reduce the quantity of supplies available to the public residing in some particular locality & so cause harm to the community. It appears to me quite impossible to say that the owner of a mill, such as the mill belonging to one of the petnrs. who undertakes, on payment, to convert ata into flour & misappropriates part of the ata entrusted to him, &, in order to cover up the misappropriation, supplies his customers with adulterated flour, is guilty of conduct of that kind. It is, I think, a pity that, instead of raiding the premises of the petnrs. immediately, the Subdivisional Mag. did not attempt to lay a trap for them. It ought to have been possible to prove that an agent had handed over a quantity of ata & received back a quantity of adulterated flour, & if immediately after the agent had received back the flour, the premises had been raided & a quantity of soap stone had been discovered on them, could not the owner of the mill at least have been prosecuted to conviction? The maxim respondeat superior would, I think have applied. A short period of preventive detention is not suitable in a case of this kind. Owners of mills, who do this sort of thing, ought to be kept in prison for a longer period, & when in prison, ought to be put to hard labour.

[12] Jamuar J.—I have had the advantage of perusing the judgments prepared by my brethren Shearer & Imam JJ. I have also come to the same conclusion as they have.

[13] The three petnrs. are said to have been in conspiracy to adulterate flour. But, in my opinion, their activities cannot be said to come within the purview of acts prejudicial to the "maintenance of supplies & services" essential to the community within the meaning of S. 3, sub-s. (1) (a), cl. (iii), Preventive Detention Act (Act IV [4] of 1950). In these circumstances, the answer to the reference, in my opinion, should be in the negative; & I would allow the applns. holding that the detention of the petnrs. is illegal.

† (a) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 6, R. 2—Variance between pleading & proof.

The pltf. had alleged in his plaint that there was an oral ijara in 1320 fasli by the pltf's. predecessor in favour of the defts., that on 12th Jeth 1348 the pltf. repaid the ijara money & came in possession of the land, that on 20-8-1941 the defts. illegally dispossessed the pltf. The pltf. therefore asked for a declaration that the ijara was redeemed, prayed that a decree for possession & mesne profits should be passed in his favour. The main ground of defence was that the defts. had not taken any oral ijara but they had purchased the land by an unregistered sale deed from the pltf's. predecessor. There was an alternative plea that even if the case of oral ijara was true such oral ijara was void & inoperative & the defts. were in adverse possession for the statutory period & had acquired absolute title to the land.

Held that upon the pleadings of the parties & the issues framed in the case, it was impossible to grant a decree for redemption to the pltf. on the ground that the defts. had prescribed for the limited title of a mtgee by remaining in possession for over 12 years. In view of the findings of fact of the lower Ct. that the pltf. had not repaid the money due on the ijara, that he did not obtain possession after the alleged redemption nor was he dispossessed on the dates alleged the suit must wholly fail. 2 Cal. 418, 8 Cal. 975 and 11 M. Ramaswami J.—The question to be determined in this appeal is whether the pltf. ought to be granted a decree for redemption with respect to an area of 19 bighas & odd located in Mohiudinpore Khasiawan of which the defts. are said to have taken usufructuary mtge.

[2] The pltf. brought the suit on the allegation that in Jeth 1320 Fasli Banke Bihari Singh had given the land by an oral ijara for a sum of Rs. 216 to four sets of defts., viz., defts. 1 to 5, defts. 6 to 10, defts. 11 to 14 & defts. 15 to 21. The pltf. alleged that as successor-in-interest of Banke Bihari Singh he repaid the ijara money to the defts. & after redeeming the mtge. obtained possession of the land. There was a subsequent dispute u/s. 144, Cr. P. C. between the parties & the Subdivisional Mag. issued a warning notice against the pltf. The pltf. asserted that on 20-8-1941 the defts. dispossessed him from the land illegally. The pltf. therefore asked (1) for

"a declaration that the defts. came in possession by virtue of the ijara of Jeth 1320 fasli & the said ijara was redeemed on 12th Jeth 1348 fasli by the pltf. & the possession of defts. thereafter was illegal, (2) that a decree for possession may be passed in favour of the pltf against the defts. (3) that a decree for mesne profits be granted from date of dispossession till the date of the suit & thereafter till the recovery of possession by the pltf."

The main ground of defence was that the defts. had not taken any oral ijara but they had purchased the land by an unregistered sale deed from Banke Bihari Singh. There was an alternative plea that even if the case of oral ijara was true such oral ijara was void & inoperative & the defts. were in adverse possession for the statutory period & had acquired absolute title to the land.

[3] The Subordinate Judge held that the oral ijara was invalid, that the defts. had been in adverse possession of the land for over 12 years & had acquired absolute title. He disbelieved the defts.' case that Rambabu, the maternal uncle of Bankey Bihari Singh had executed any unregistered sale deed in their favour. The Subordinate Judge disbelieved the story of the pltf. that he had repaid the ijara money on 12th Jeth 1348, that he had obtained possession of the land or that the defts. had dispossessed him on 20-8-1941. On these findings, the Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit. The decree of the learned Subordinate Judge has been affirmed by the Dist. J. in appeal.

[4] When the second appeal first came for hearing it was argued by Mr. Lalnarain Sinha on behalf of the pltf. that possession of the defts. as mtgees since 1320 fasli could in no way extinguish the title of the mtgor. when he sued for possession after repayment of the mtge. money. Impressed by this argument, the H. C. remanded the case to the Dist. J. for a finding whether the defts. were in possession of the properties as mtgees or as purchasers. The H. C. ordered that the unregistered sale deed relied upon by the defts. should be taken into evidence for the collateral purpose of showing the nature of the possession asserted.

[5] The Dist. J. thereafter examined the evidence & recorded the finding that the defendants were in possession as mtgees. of the land, that they continued to be in possession as mtgee. from 1320 Fasli till the year 1941 when they asserted for the first time their rights as purchasers of the land.

[6] When the appeal was heard after remand, Sinha & Rai JJ. refd. the whole appeal for decision by a larger bench since they doubted the authority of the ruling in Bhukhan Mian v. Radhika Kumari Debi, 19 P. L. T. 489.

[7] Before the F. B. two questions were mainly argued (1) whether it is open to the pltf. to claim a decree for redemption despite the fact that the plea of adverse possession was not distinctly raised in the plaint & it has not formed the subject-matter of an issue before the Subordinate Judge, & (2) whether the pltf. could be granted such a decree on the ground that the defts. had acquired only the right of mtgee. by adverse possession for more than 12 years.

[8] As regards the first question it is of importance to notice that the pltf. had alleged that there was an oral ijara in 1320 Fasli by Banke Bihari Singh in favour of the defts. that on 12th Jeth 1348 the pltf. repaid the ijara money & came in possession of the land, that on 20-8-1941 the defts. illegally dispossessed the pltf. The pltf. therefore asked for a declaration that the ijara was redeemed, that a decree for possession & mesne profits should be passed in his favour. The lower Cts. have found that the story of payment was not true, that the oral ijara was not redeemed & that the pltfs. did not obtain possession of the land, that he was not dispossessed by the defts. in the manner alleged in the plaint. For the applt. Mr. Lalnarain Sinha pointed out that in Para. 16 of the written statement defts. stated that the oral ijara was inoperative, that the defts. had been in adverse possession of the land & had acquired absolute title. But it is nowhere stated in the pleadings either in the plaint or the written statement that the defts. had asserted only the limited interest of the mtgee. & that they had acquired such limited interest by adverse possession for more than 12 years. In the lower appellate Ct. an argument was addressed on behalf of the pltf. that possession of the defts. was permissive & that they had acquired title of mtgee. The argument was rejected by the lower appellate Ct. on the ground that no case of permissive possession was disclosed in the plaint or in the evidence of the witnesses examined on pltf's. behalf & that pltf. could not be permitted to make out a new case in appeal. The lower appellate Ct. added that the point was not even mentioned in the grounds of appeal. The question was again raised when the appeal was argued in the H. C. before the order of remand was passed. Upon the pleadings of the parties & the issues framed in the present case, it, is, in my opinion, impossible to grant a decree for redemption to the pltf. on the ground that the defts. had prescribed for the limited title of a mortgagee by remaining in possession for over 12 years. If the pltf. had intended to rely upon the plea that the defts. had prescribed only for the limited interest of a mtgee. he should have distinctly stated so in the plaint or raised it in the issue framed by the trial Ct. There is much force in the contention of the learned Advocate-General that the defts. had no proper notice that such a point was going to be raised. In view of the findings of fact, that the pltf. has not repaid the money due on the ijara, that he did not obtain possession after the alleged redemption nor was he dispossessed on the dates alleged, it is manifest that the suit must wholly fail.

[9] This opinion is supported by Shiro Kumari Debi v. Govind Shaw Tanti, 2 Cal. 418 in which the plaint stated that the land in dispute had been purchased by the pltf. from one Lochunkali under a kebala & the pltf. had been in possession of the said land through bhag tenants. One of the issues framed was "Is the disputed land held by the pltf. as alleged by him". The Munsif granted a decree but the lower appellate Ct. was not satisfied that the pltf. had established the precise title which he had set up though it was satisfied that he had been in possession for 12 years & upon that ground he gave the pltf. a decree. In second appeal, the H. C. held that the question of adverse possession had not been properly raised either in the plaint or in the issues in this case & the defts.

had no proper notice that such a point was going to be raised; & that the suit brought by the pltf. should be dismissed.

[10] To the same effect is the decision Joytara Dassee v. Mohamed Mobaruck, 8 Cal. 975 in which Field J. States :

"Then, as to the second point, we think there can be no doubt, & indeed the learned counsel, Mr. Bell, in his argument, very properly admitted, that the plfs. did not make in their plaint any alternative title based upon a twelve years possession. They do, indeed, say that they were in possession of the land, but they do not say that they were in possession for twelve years, or 'from before', or 'for a long time;' nor do they use any of those other general expressions which are to be found in plaints in this country, & which are at times argued to convey to the party, on the other side, the meaning that the pltf. relies upon an undisturbed possession for more than 12 years. This being so, it appears to us that it is impossible to uphold a decree which is based upon a title not stated by the pltfs. in their plaint, & as to which no issue was framed for trial in the Ct. below. Cases must be tried & determined secundum allegate et probata, & it is contrary to this principle, & may be fraught with injustice, to decide a cause upon a point not raised in the pleadings, nor embodied in an issue, & to which in consequence, the attention of the parties was not directed at the trial so as to enabl. them to produce all the evidence relevant thereto which was available to them."

[11] In this context reference should be made to Eshenchunder Singh v. Shamachurn Bhutto, 11 M. I. A. 7 in which Lord Westbury pointed out the absolute necessity that determination of a cause should be founded upon a case either to be found in the pleadings involved or consistent with the case thereby made :

"It is obvious that every one of these propositions of fact is a statement which it was incumbent on the pltf. to have distinctly alleged, in order that it might be the subject of direct testimony. It is impossible to conclude parties by inferences of fact which are not only not consistent with the allegations that are to be found in the plaint, which constitute the case the deft. has to meet, but which are in reality contradictory of the case made by the pltf. It will introduce the greatest amount of uncertainty into judicial proceedings if the final determination of causes is to be founded upon inferences at variance with the case that the pltf. has pleaded, &, by joining issue in the cause, has undertaken to prove."

[12] In view of these authorities, I am of opinion that the pltf. in the present case ought not to be granted a decree for redemption on the ground that the defts. continued in possession of the land asserting themselves to be mtgees. for the period required by the statute. It follows that the decree of the lower Cts. is right & the second appeal must fail.

[13] If this conclusion is correct, it is not necessary to examine the second question whether the defts. had acquired limited title of a mtgee. upon the evidence recorded by the Dist. J. on remand.

[14] In the order of reference the learned Judges state that Bhukan Mian v. Radhika Devi, 19 P. L. T. 489 required reconsideration if that case was an authority for the proposition that the possession of one who came over the property as a mtgee. in possession becomes adverse not only to the extent of the mtgee.'s rights but completely in respect of absolute title. At p. 494 of the report, Wort A. C. J. says :

"I am aware of a number of cases in India which appear to have the effect of holding that a person can prescribe for a limited interest but I must say that I always fail to understand them as both a tenancy & mtge. are creatures of contract, & on fundamental principles I find it difficult to hold the view that a contract can be brought into existence by prescription. The view that I hold of the matter is best expressed by the Allahabad H. C. in Umr-un-nissa v. Muhammad Yar Khan, 3 All. 24. Pearson J. in delivering one of the judgments of the F. B. of that Ct. made this observation : 'In my opinion in order to bar the suit under Art 144 of the Act of 1877 the adverse possession of the defts. must be of the same nature as that sought by the pltf.'"

At p. 498, Manohar Lall J. states :

"In this view I do not think it is necessary to consider whether the deft. can ever be held in law to be able to prescribe against a true owner his rights as a mtge. but if it were necessary to decide this matter I would have respectfully agreed with the observations which have fallen from my Lord the Chief Justice on this point in the judgment just delivered by him."

[16] But it is right to point out that the question whether there could be a prescription of a limited right of mtgee. was not really in issue in that case, & the passages from the judgments of Wort A. C. J., & Manohar Lall J. were mere obiter dicta. It is not necessary to examine the correctness of these dicta in the present appeal. In his concurring judgment, Manohar Lall J. concedes that no question of prescription arose in that case for the deft. never asserted that he had prescribed a mtge. nor did the pltf. make out such a case either in the pleading or in the evidence nor was any issue raised as to when the deft. began to prescribe & further the period of twelve years did not expire from the date of entry in the Record of Rights relied upon by the defence. As no adverse possession was pleaded or established, the remarks of Wort A. C. J. & Manohar Lall J. were not necessary for the decision of the case. As suggested by Vaughan C. J. in Bole v. Horton, vaugh 360, 382 :

"An opinion given in Court, if not necessary to the judgment given of record, but that it might have been as well given if no such, or a contrary opinion, had been broached is no judicial opinion, no more than a gratis dictum."

[17] For the reasons already assigned, I hold that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

[18] Reuben J.—I agree.

[19] Regarding the contention that the defts. by prescription had acquired the title of usufructuary mtgees., it has been contended by Mr. Lal Narain Sinha that all the necessary facts have been pleaded. He points out that the plaint states that the defts. entered in 1320 under an oral mtge. & that the pltfs. redeemed the mtge. in 1348, that is to say, the defts. were in possession as mtgees. for the statutory period of prescription. On these pleadings, however, the acquisition of mtgee.'s rights by prescription was irrelevant. The defts. were being sought to be evicted as trespassers, & were concerned only to prove their case of purchase. Hence, they cannot be treated as having had sufficient notice of a plea of title by adverse possession.

[20] Imam J.—I agree that the appeal be dismissed.

[21] The pltf.'s suit was in ejectment. On the allegations in the plaint, there can be no question that the suit was for recovery of possession from the defts. who had dispossessed the pltf. without any title or right on a particular date. In a suit for ejectment, the pltf. has to prove not only his title but also his possession within twelve years of the suit. The finding is that the story of the pltf. that he was dispossessed on a particular date after he had come into possession on redeeming the ijara was found to be false. On the contrary, it was found that the defts. were in possession since the year 1320 Fasli. On these findings, there could be no other course for a Ct. of law to take than to dismiss the pltf.'s suit.

[22] The argument now made that the defts. had acquired a limited interest by prescription cannot be entertained in the present suit. No such plea had been taken in the plaint, nor was there any issue framed in this respect. No such thing was argued before the trial Ct. or before the appellate Ct. what had been argued was that even if there could be no legal mtge. by way of an oral ijara, the defts'. possession would not be that of trespassers, but they must be deemed to have been in possession on pltf.'s behalf & such possession was permissive possession.

[23] In my opinion, it becomes quite unnecessary in the present case to discuss the case of Bhukan Mian v. Radhika Devi, 19 P. L. T. 489 or to say one word whether that decision was or was not rightly decided.

† (a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 115—Prescribed Authority under Payment of Wages Act, 1936—Whether Court subordinate to High Court—Revision lies against his order.

A review of the provisions of the Payment of Wages Act, 1936, very clearly establishes that the Authority under S. 15 of the Act acts as a Court. He is bound to decide judicially the matter in dispute before him. He has to give his decision or 'direction' as it is called after hearing the parties, & on the evidence or materials produced before him, according to certain definite & specified rules of procedure laid down under the Act as also supplemented by statutory rules framed thereunder for his guidance, & his decision, is, subject to appeal to the District Court binding on the parties. He is thus a civil Court subordinate to the High Court & revision lies against his Order under S. 115, Civil P. C. : A. I. R. (28) 1941 Pat. 65 (F B) & A. I. R. (b) Payment of Wages Act (1936), S. 15—Application under—Manager whether necessary party.

S. 15 does not speak of the manager being a necessary party to such an application. Therefore, it cannot be assumed that failure to implead him would result in the dismissal of the application & make the application inherently defective. No doubt the 'direction mentioned in the S. 15 should, in the first instance, be made against the manager if he is found to have made the illegal deductions & the payment should be sought to be recovered from him, & it is only where it cannot be so recovered that it should be recovered from the employer. This follows from a perusal of the provisions of S. 3 & S. 19 of the Act. But it does not follow that the application also in the first instance or rather primarily should be made against the manager, & that if it is not so made the application should be held to be untenable so as to give no jurisdiction to the Authority to act upon it : A. Sarjoo Prosad J.—This petition in revision has been presented by one A. Hasan, proprietor & director of the Sasamoosa Sugar Works Limited. It arises out of a proceeding under the Payment of Wages Act (IV [4] of 1936). The opposite party to the petition are the General Secretary of the Sasamoosa Workers' Union representing the daily coolies of the Sugar Works Limited and one Dhunmun.

[2] The facts are briefly these : On the 12th of April, 1950, a number of workers of the Sugar Works presented several petitions before the District Magistrate of Saran, who is the prescribed Authority within the meaning of the Act claiming that a deduction of wages had been made without any legal justification during specified periods for which they had been working, and that accordingly these amounts which were justly due to them should be realised from the Sugar Works concerned. Another such petition was also presented to the same Authority on the 25th of August, 1950, by another set of workers. The Authority concerned admitted the applications and issued notice against the petitioner and one S. M. Zaki, described at one place in the petition as the General Secretary and at another place as the General Manager of the Sasamoosa Sugar Works Limited. When the case was taken up on the 6th of October, 1950, the petitioner who appeared on the date seems to have raised preliminary objections that the application under the Act (section 15) was not maintainable as proper persons were not parties to the applications and further that the application was time-barred. The Prescribed Authority aforesaid disallowed these objections. The petitioner then wanted time to examine accounts and to produce witnesses, and the said Authority adjourned the case to be put up on the 2nd of November, 1950. It may be observed that the two objections on the date in question were raised orally without any regular petition stating all the material facts bearing on them. The applicants, who are opposite party here, filed in reply a petition praying that Mohammad Qasim Lari may be made a party to the applications to avoid any technical objection. Later, on 12-10-1950, after the above order had been passed, a written petition was actually filed before the Authority mentioning the particulars on which the preliminary objections were based. The allegation in this petition is that one Mohammad Qasim Lari had been named as the manager of the factory under Cl. (c) of sub-s. (1) of S. 9, Factories Act (XXV [25] of 1935) corresponding to S. 7 of the Act of 1948, & that the said Qasim Lari, was responsible for payment of wages to the persons employed in the factory. Therefore, it stated that the said Qasim Lari should have been made a party to the applications filed by the workers, & he being not a party, the applications could not be entertained. It was also alleged that the applications were barred by limitation within the proviso to sub-s. (2) of S. 15, Payment of Wages Act. This petition the Authority directed to be put up for hearing in the presence of the parties on the date fixed, that is, 2-11-1950, & the application has not yet been disposed of. Before the application could be taken up, on 1-11-1950, the petitioner moved this Court & obtained a rule as also an order for stay of further proceedings.

[3] It would thus appear from the facts stated above that the petition filed on 12-10-1950, containing the preliminary objections is still pending, & it was, therefore, premature on the part of the petitioner to rush up to this Court & obtain a rule as also a stay of further proceedings without disclosing the fact that a regular petition containing the objections aforesaid was still pending consideration by the Authority competent to hear & decide the matter. It is pointed out that under S. 15, sub-s. (3), Payment of Wages Act, it is not necessary that the objections should be raised in the form of a regular petition & the preliminary objections having been raised & disallowed by the order, dated 6-10-1950, the petitioner was entitled to move this Court against the aforesaid order. It is true that a petition in writing is not necessarily required under the Act in order to raise such objections but the order complained against does not indicate what the two preliminary objections were; & at any rate, unless the full particulars had been given, this Court was not in a position to know what were the actual arguments advanced before the said Authority, & whether or not all the relevant materials were placed before him. The fact that subsequently such a regular petition was filed containing the particulars indicates that at the earliest stage the Authority was not presumably apprised of the details & the matter is still pending consideration by him. The grounds of objection may be tenable or untenable ; it is for the Authority to pronounce upon the validity of those grounds. But before the Authority does so, it must have all the facts on which the objections are founded. In the absence of those facts, it was impossible for the Authority to entertain the objections. It appears to me, therefore, that the present application filed by the petitioner is premature & the proper course for the petitioner was to wait until the petitition filed by him on the 12th of October last had been heard & disposed of on the date fixed by the Authority.

[4] It has, however, been urged on behalf of the petitioner that now that the matter has attracted the attention of this Court, & the questions involved being purely questions of law affecting the jurisdiction of the Authority to entertain the applications filed by the workers, this Court should finally decide the matter & give appropriate directions to the Authority concerned. This undoubtedly opens out a wide vista of controversial questions which arise for our determination. The case, therefore, had to be heard on various dates & we had to devote much more time & attention to the matter than what the merit of the case actually demanded. Before I take up the question whether applications were not maintainable on account of the alleged absence of a necessary party, there are various preliminary questions which have to be met & answered. The questions are : (1) whether the Authority competent to hear & decide all claims under the Payment of Wages Act is a 'Court' with the meaning of S. 115, Civil P. C. In this connection an incidental question has also been raised, namely, whether it is a 'Civil Court' ; (2) whether if it is a 'Court', it is Subordinate to the High Court, & (3) whether, if it is a Court subordinate to the High Court, its order is revisable by this Court when under the provisions of the said statute the directions given by the Authority are final subject to appeal as specified therein. These questions, in my opinion, have been more than adequately considered in several important decisions of this Court as also of other High Courts.

[5] The word 'Court' has not been defined & the definition given to it in the Indian Evidence Act is obviously not exhaustive. We have, however, to find out the salient attributes or characteristics of a 'Court' which means a place where justice is administered or a person who administers justice. In Mt. Dirji v. Goalin, 20 Pat. 373 which is a Special Bench decision of this Court, Fazl Ali, J. (as he then was) laid down certain tests for determining whether a certain person or authority is a 'Court'.

[6] He points out that

"in order to be a Court the person or persons who may be said to constitute it must be entrusted with judicial functions. Judicial function means the function of 'deciding litigated questions according to law' deciding them not arbitrarily but on evidence & according to certain rules of procedure which ensure that the person, who is called upon to decide them, acts with fairness & impartiality."

[7] This evidently implies that the judicial function of a Court comprehends three factors (i) the presence of litigated questions (ii) the decision of those questions according to law, that is, not arbitrarily but on evidence, (iii) the observance of certain rules of procedure so as to ensure fairness & impartiality in giving those decisions.

[8] The other attribute which the learned Judge postulates is that a 'Court' must have not only judicial functions but it should possess 'judicial powers';

"such as the power to receive evidence bearing on the matter which it is called upon to decide, the power to enforce the attendance of witnesses & the production of documents & material objects before it & the power to pronounce judgment & carry it into effect between the person & parties who bring a case before it for decision."

[9] The third important feature to which the learned Judge refers is that a 'Court' exercises jurisdiction over persons by reason of the sanction of the law & not merely by reason of voluntary submission to such jurisdiction & that the proceedings before it are public.

[10] His Lordship also deals with the meaning of the expression 'persons designata' used with reference to certain persons or officials discharging certain duties under particular statutes, & he observes:

"there is no real antithesis between the expressions 'persona designata' & 'Court' or in other words, given a persona designata may be a Court. Whether he is a Court or not depends upon his powers & the functions which he has to discharge. It is not inconceivable that in some cases when an officer of the Court, say the District Judge, is called upon to decide a certain matter not as a District Judge, but as a persona designata, he may still be a Court by reason of some special provision in the Statute which authorises him to decide the matter. The Statute may expressly say that he will be deemed to be a Court or that his decision will be subject to appeal or revision by a superior Court."

The real question which is to be enquired into in such cases is whether the person so designated has been invested with the powers of a Court. If he is so invested with the powers of a Court, the necessary implication in such a case would be that the jurisdiction of the Court is enlarged, & its decision is subject to all the incidents of such jurisdiction.

[11] In the case in question the learned Judges were dealing with the position of the Commissioner appointed under the Workmen's Compensation Act, & the question which they had to answer was whether such a person answered the description of a 'Court'. They found upon a review of the various provisions of the Act that the function of the Commissioner under the Act was not merely to enquire & advise but to judge & decide the matters before him, & in doing so, had to proceed judicially & not arbitrarily. They, therefore, held that having regard to the tests laid down by them the Commissioner satisfied the requirements of a 'Court'. The Special Bench of course left the question open as to whether the Commissioner was a 'Court subordinate to the High Court' in the sense in which the expression is used in S. 115, Civil P. C. But when the matter went back to the Division Bench after the point had been answered by the Special Bench, namely, that the Commissioner under the Workmen's Compensation Act was a 'Court', the Division Bench found that the Commissioner was a Court subordinate to the High Court within the meaning of S. 115 of the Code, & as such, the order of the Commissioner could be revised. The reason which has been given for coming to the conclusion that the Commissioner was a Court subordinate to the High Court is that the Act provided for an appeal to the High Court from the order of the Commissioner where the amount in dispute was over Rs. 300. The Commissioner was, therefore, held subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the Court, & as such, a Court subordinate to the High Court: (vide Mt. Dirji v. Sm. Goalin, 21 Pat. 173).

[12] If the provisions of the Payment of Wages Act are examined in the light of the tests formulated above, I feel no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the Authority acting under S. 15 of this Act acts as a Court.

[13] Section 15 enacts that the Provincial Govt. may, by notification appoint any Commissioner for Workmen's Compensation or other officer with experience as a Judge of a Civil Court or as a stipendiary Magistrate to be the authority to hear & decide for any specified area all claims arising out of deductions from the wages, or delay in payment of the wages of persons employed or paid in that area. Sub-s. (2) of the same sections says:

"Where contrary to the provisions of this Act any deduction has been made from the wages of an employed person, or any payment of wages has been delayed, such person himself, or any legal practitioner or any official of a registered trade union authorized in writing to act on his behalf, ... or any other person acting with the permission of the authority appointed under Sub-s. (1), may apply to such authority for a direction under Sub-s. (3)".

Then comes a proviso to sub-s. (2) & this proviso embodies a period of limitation for presenting such applications which period is six months from the date on which the deduction from the wages was made or from the date on which the payment of the wages was due to be made, as the case may be; & it further provides that any application may be admitted after the said period of six months when the applicant satisfies the authority that he had sufficient cause for not making the application within such period. Then follows the other significant provision of S. 15, namely, sub-s. (3) of that section. It lays down the broad heads of the procedure which is to be followed by the authority when an application has been presented & entertained. It provides that the authority shall hear the applicant & the employer or other person responsible for the payment of wages under S. 3, or give them an opportunity of being heard, & after such further inquiry (if any) as may be necessary, may, direct the refund to the employee of the amount deducted, or the payment of the delayed wages together with such compensation as the authority may deem fit & exceeding a certain amount.

[14] It follows from the above that the authority has to decide certain litigated questions according to law. The question in dispute relates to unauthorised deduction in wages or delay in payment of wages. The petition before him has to be filed within a period of limitation & if not so filed, it is for him to condon the delay & entertain the application on sufficient cause shown. After he has entertained the application, he must hear the applicant & the employer or any other person responsible for the payment of wages, & after such further enquiry give a direction for refunding the amount to the employee-applicant together with appropriate compensation.

[15] The authority may under sub-s. (4) of the same section in case it finds that the application was malicious or vexatious, impose a penalty on the employee to be paid to the employer or other persons responsible for the payment of wages, & these refunds, compensation or penalty are liable to be recovered as fines imposed by a Magistrate under sub-s. (5) of the same section.

[16] S. 16 of the Act then lays down a procedure for filing a single application in respect of claims of a person or persons belonging to the same unpaid group under given circumstances. Then there is another important provision in S. 17 of the Act which enacts that an appeal against a direction made under sub-s. (3) or sub-s. (4) of S. 15 may be preferred, within thirty days of the date on which the direction was made, in a Presidency-town before the Court of Small Causes & elsewhere before the District Court by the person aggrieved under the direction given by the authority whether it is a case of refund or a case of penalty; & sub-s. (2) of S. 17 postulates that subject to the above right of appeal any direction given by the authority under S. 15 shall be final. The decision of the authority, evidently, therefore, cannot be an arbitrary decision but has to be based on evidence & appropriate materials because the party aggrieved by his direction has been given a right of appeal under the Act.

[17] In exercising his judicial functions he is also given certain judicial rights ; for instance, under S. 18 of the Act it is provided that the authority appointed under sub-s. (1) of S. 15 shall have all the powers of a civil Court under Civil P C., 1908, for the purpose of taking evidence & of enforcing the attendance of witnesses & compelling the production of documents, & every such authority shall be deemed to be a civil Court for all the purposes of S. 195 of Chap. XXXV, Criminal P. C., 1898.

[18] The authority can also enforce the directions given by him as provided by S. 19 of the Act which says that in case the authority or the Court referred to in S. 17 is unable to recover from any person responsible under S. 3 for the payment of wages any amount directed by such authority under S. 15 or S. 17 to be paid by such person, the authority shall recover the amount from the employer of the employed person concerned. The orders of the authority are thus ex-proprio vigore binding on the parties & determine their rights & obligations.

[19] I need not refer to some of the other provisions of the enactment expect Ss. 22 & 26. Section 22 provides for a bar to the entertainment of any suit for recovery of wages or of any deduction from wages in so far as the sum so claimed forms the subject of an application under S. 15 which has been presented by the pltf. & which is pending before the authority appointed under the section or an appeal under S. 17 or has formed the subject of a direction under S. 15 in favour of the pltf. or has been adjudged, in any proceeding under S. 15. Then S. 26 provides for certain rule-making powers. Under the section the Governor-General was empowered to make rules to regulate the procedure to be followed by the authorities & Courts referred to in Ss. 15 & 17, but by the Adaptation of Indian Laws Order, 1937, the Provincial Govt. has since been authorised to make such rules in order to give effect to the provisions of this Act. The section further shows that the rules so framed may relate to various matters, namely, the maintenance of records, registers, returns & notices; the display in a conspicuous place & premises of notices sent; the imposition of fines; the scales of costs allowed & various other matters relating to such proceedings. In the rules framed under the authority of this section it appears that the rules lay down almost a complete & self-contained set of procedure & do not leave it to the discretion of the authority to evolve a procedure of his own. The rules, for instance, provide for the form of the application, the nature of the authority for representation; the presentation of documents; the refusal to entertain applications under certain circumstances; & then most important of all is R. 8 relating to appearance of parties. This rule I am referring to in particular because it proves that if the application is entertained the Authority shall call upon the employer by a notice in form E to appear before him on a specified date together with all relevant documents & witnesses & shall inform the applicant of the date so specified & if the employer or his representative fails to appear on the specified date, the Authority shall proceed to hear & determine the application ex parte. Similarly, if the applicant fails to appear on that date the authority may dismiss the application, & the authority may in certain cases set aside these orders & re-hear the matter on good cause being shown within one month from the date of the order. Then another important rule is R. 9. Under this rule, the authority shall in all cases enter the particulars indicated in Form F & at the time of passing orders shall sign & date the Form. In case where no appeal lies, no further record shall be necessary. In a case where an appeal lies, the authority shall record the substance of the evidence & shall append it under his signature to the record of direction in Form F. Then R. 12 provides for the manner in which the appeal is to be preferred.

[20] A review of these provisions very clearly establishes that the authority acting under S. 15 of the Act acts as a Court. He is bound to decide judicially the matter in dispute before him. He has to give his decision or 'direction' as it is called after hearing the parties, & on the evidence or materials produced before him, according to certain definite & specified rules of procedure laid down under the Act as also supplemented by statutory rules framed thereunder for his guidance, & his decision is, subject to appeal to the District Court, binding on the parties. It is true that at places in the Act a distinction has been made between the authority & the Court but that distinction is really without any difference because in the context the word 'Court' has been used to denote the Court to which an appeal lies against the directions or the orders passed by the authority. The real point is to see whether the authority is acting as a Court, & I have already indicated that keeping in view the important tests laid down in the decision of Mt. Dhirji v. Sm. Goalin, mentioned above, there seems to be little doubt that the authority is acting as a Court.

[21] The above tests were applied & followed in another Full Bench case of this Court in Arjun v. Krishna Chandra, 21 Pat. 1 which arose under the Orissa Tenancy Act, 1913 (B. & O. Act II (2) of 1913). The questions in that case were whether the Court of the Collector acting under the provisions of the Act was of a grade inferior to that of a District Court, there being definite provisions providing for an appeal from the decision of the Collector to the District Judge, & also whether the orders of the Collector passed under the Act, though final in such cases, could be revisable by the High Court under S. 115, Civil P. C. The majority Judges were of the opinion that the Court of the Collector being subordinate to the appellate jurisdiction of the District Court (which, in other words, mean the Court of the District Judge which is the principal Civil Court of the district) the former was obviously inferior to the latter, & this inferiority would continue to subsist even in case of such orders of the Collector as were not by reason of their pettiness appealable to the District Judge. It was accordingly held that although in certain cases there may be a finality to the order of the Collector, still the Court of the Collector was a Court subordinate to this Court within the meaning of S. 115, Civil P. C. inasmuch as the section confers the power of revision, precisely in those cases decided by a subordinate Court in which no appeal lies to the High Court. The power of revision is, therefore, not excluded merely because the subordinate Court is empowered to pass an original order which is declared final, or an appellate order from which there is no appeal to the High Court. The separate judgments delivered in the case by the three learned Judges constituting the Bench are very comprehensive & furnish a very interesting reading for their wealth of details in tracing the development of the revisional powers of the High Court. Meredith J., after an exhaustive review of the decisions of various High Courts bearing on the point, summed up as follows :

"Having examined the views of the various High Courts in so far as they have been expressed in reported decisions, let us now turn to an examination of the question itself. It is unnecessary in the present case finally to decide whether the Court of the Collector is subordinate to the High Court within the meaning of S. 115, Civil P. C. in a case where an appeal lies under the statute to the Commissioner. I will only say, first, that, in my view, it would be an anomaly for subordination to depend upon a mere question of valuation; the Collector's Court to be subordinate when dealing with a case valued at over Rs. 100, but to escape that subordination merely because the case of a lower valuation. The pettiness of a case may be a good reason for providing that there shall be no appeal; it can surely be no reason for providing that the Court shall escape subordination & be free from all supervision in regard to questions of jurisdiction, so as to be able to act without jurisdiction, or to refuse to exercise jurisdiction. It is difficult to imagine that the legislature could ever have intended that....."

[22] He thereafter considers the argument that a Revenue Court cannot at the same time be a Civil Court as if the two are mutually exclusive. He observes that the assumption is quite a wrong assumption, & he holds that where the Revenue Courts exercise judicial functions & decide ordinary civil disputes which have been specially assigned to them, they are nonetheless civil suits & the Courts that decide them are, therefore, Civil Courts. These Revenue Courts in such cases are merely one species of the genus Civil Court. They are a subdivision of Civil Courts in the general sense & the fact that there are special provisions regarding these Revenue Courts, as in S. 5, Civil P. C. & that they are specially defined in particular statutes & special legislations did not legally affect the position because to define the species did not exclude it from the genus. The learned Judge also held :

"Where one Court is made subject to the appellate jurisdiction of another, the former is obviously thereby made inferior to the latter, & plainly that inferiority must still subsist where by reason of the pettiness of the cause no appeal is provided for. Otherwise the absurd result would follow that the Court rises in grade in inverse ratio to the importance of the case."

[23] It is of importance to mention in this context that Meredith J. in his decision refers to a Full Bench decision of the Calcutta High Court of five Judges in Emperor v. Har Prasad Das, 40 Cal. 477, in which it was held that in the case of an order passed by a civil Court or Revenue Court under S. 476, Criminal P. C., S. 439 of the Code had no application, but the High Court could exercise the powers vested in it by S. 115, Civil P. C. or S. 15, High Courts Act. This was equally applicable to a case where action is taken by a Revenue Court under S. 476, the proceeding before it being not a proceeding before an inferior criminal Court, the order in the proceeding was revisable under S. 115, being made by a Revenue-authority as a Court in course of a judicial proceeding before it, & with reference to such judicial proceedings the Revenue Court being a Court subordinate to the High Court within the meaning of S. 115, as being a Court subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court. He also relied upon a decision of the Privy Council in Rajah Nilmoni Singh v. Taranath, 9 I. A. 17. It was held by the Privy Council in that case that the Rent Courts established by Act X [10] of 1859 were civil Courts within the meaning of Act VIII [8] of 1859, the Code of Civil Procedure as it then was, in other words, in the case of Revenue Courts in regard to which the provisions were even more special & exclusive than in the case of Revenue Courts under the Orissa Tenancy Act, his Lordship observed that the Privy Council held them to be civil Courts within the meaning of the Code of Civil Procedure, so as to make S. 284 of the old Code, relating to transfer of decree for execution to another district applicable to those Courts, & he argued that "if S. 284, then why not S. 115 & S. 3 of the present corresponding Act." Meredith J. was then confronted with the observations of Rankin J. (as he then was) in Allen Brothers & Co. v. Bando & Co., 49 Cal. 931. Rankin J. in that case is reported to have observed that the expression "civil Court" as used in the Code of Civil Procedure containing the new provisions of Ss. 3, 4 & 5 which were not in the earlier Code of 1859 was not used in the general sense to connote the genus, but only in reference to that particular species of civil Court, which had full powers of original jurisdiction within the meaning of S. 9. Meredith J., observed that although the point was an arguable one, yet in view of the Privy Council decision referred to above much could not be said in support of it, & he finally disposed of the argument in these words :

"To my mind it is a construction impossible to square with the decision of the Privy Council with which I have just dealt. There is no getting over the fact that, where in the corresponding Code of 1859 the same expression is used in, generally speaking, the same contexts, the Privy Council has said that the rent Courts established by the Rent Act of 1859 must be held to fall within S. 284 of Act VIII [8] of 1859, the expression used in S. 284 being simply 'Civil Court'. So far as I can see by comparing the two Codes the expression 'Civil Court' is used in exactly the same sense in both the Code of 1859 & that of 1908, & it is to be noted that in both cases the preamble describes the Act as relating to 'Courts of Civil Judicature'."

[24] Dhavle J. does not appear to have altogether accepted the position that a Revenue Court was a civil Court when exercising judicial functions & deciding ordinary civil disputes assigned to them but he also by another line of reasoning comes to the same conclusion that such Courts were amenable to the revisional jurisdiction of the High Court as provided by S. 115 of the Code. To quote his own language, he says as follows :

"This distinction between Civil & Revenue Courts in S. 5 of the Code is not without a bearing on S. 3, & in my opinion, the Civil Courts contemplated in S. 3 are, to use the words of Rankin J. in Allen Brothers & Co. v. Bando & Co., 49 Cal. 931, 'Civil Courts exercising all the powers of Civil Courts as distinct from Courts which only exercise powers over civil matters of a special class or classes, e. g., the rent Courts under Act X [10] of 1859 & the Land Acquisition Judge.' This, however, does not affect the subordination of our Revenue Court to the High Court for the purposes of S. 115, Civil P. C. because as the same learned Judge, also observed in the same case, "the word 'subordinate' is not defined by the Code because S. 3 is not a definition. This section does not claim to be, & is not intended to be, exhaustive ; Purshottam v. Mahadev, 37 Bom. 114." S. 115, Civil P. C. does not require the subordinate Court to be a Civil Court within S. 3, & the Orissa Tenancy Act definitely involves the subordination of the Revenue Court to the High Court [by way of appeal under sub-s. (3) of S. 204], & thus, through the general provision contained in S. 192 (2), attracts the operation of S. 115, Civil P. C., giving the High Court a power of revision free (so far as I can gather) from the limitations to which its appellate powers are subject."

It would thus appear that the two learned Judges, though for different reasons, both agreed in holding that the Court of the Collector which was subordinate to the appellate jurisdiction of the District Court was a Court subordinate to the High Court within the meaning of S. 115 of the Code; & what is more significant that in dealing with S. 3 of the present Civil P. C., Dhavle J., opines in concurrence with Rankin J., that the word 'subordinate' had not been defined in the Code & S. 3 of the Code was not a definition clause. I need not refer to other parts of the judgment which, as I have already observed, will repay perusal for its wealth of detail & exhaustive treatment of the law on the points.

[25] Manohar Lall J., the dissentient Judge appears to have been of the view that in petty cases where the Collector had jurisdiction to call for the record of a case in which an appeal would lie to him & where no question of title was involved, & Collector's order was final. But where the Deputy Collector & the Collector tried suits under S. 204 (5), Orissa Tenancy Act, of over Rs. 100 in value, they became subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court, because appeals lay in the first instance to the Dist. J. or to the High Court as the case may be, & that being so any orders passed by these Revenue Courts in such cases become revisable by the High Court under S. 115, Civil P. C., but that jurisdiction was limited to such cases only. The conclusion, therefore, is that all the three learned Judges were of the view that in cases where an appeal lay to the Dist. J. from the orders of the Collector or Deputy Collector, the Court of the Collector or Deputy Collector was subordinate to the High Court & their orders were revisable under S. 115 of the Code by this Court.

[26] The question again arose in connection with the proceedings of an Election Commissioner under the Bihar Election Petitions Rules, 1939, in Abdul Razak v. Kuldip Narain, 22 Pat. 577, & all the three learned Judges concerned therein were unanimously of the view that the Election Commissioner referred to in the Bihar District Board Election Petitions Rules, 1939, is a Court & a Court subordinate to the High Court within the meaning of S. 115, Civil P. C. I will refer to a few pertinent passages from the respective judgments of Chatterji & Meredith JJ. Chatterji J. observed as follows:

"On the question whether the Election Commissioner is a Court, I think that the decision of the Full Bench of this Court in Mt. Dirji v. Sm. Goalin, 20 Pat. 373 affords a complete answer. In that case it was held that a Commissioner under the Workmen's Compensation Act (VIII [8] of 1923) is a Court. The tests laid down there are fully satisfied in the present case. To use the words of Fazl Ali J., who delivered the judgment (Harries C. J. & Manohar Lall J. agreeing), the Election Commissioner 'constitutes an independent tribunal & his function is to judge & decide & not merely to enquire & advise, & in judging or deciding the matters before him he has to proceed judicially & not arbitrarily.' The procedure to be followed by the Election Commissioner is, as nearly as may be, the procedure applicable under the Code of Civil Procedure to the trial of suits (see R. 11 (2)); he has also in respect of certain matters, such as, enforcing the attendance of witnesses, compelling the production of documents, examining witnesses on oath, etc., the powers which are vested in a Court under the Code of Civil Procedure when trying a suit (see R. 23). Rule 23 also provides that he shall be deemed to be a Civil Court for the purposes specified therein. There can, therefore, be no doubt that he is a Court.

As regards his subordination to the High Court, the very definition of Election Commissioner given in the Rules makes the position clear. According to R. 2 (g) "Election Commissioner" means the Dist. J. or the Judicial Commissioner exercising jurisdiction over the area in which the election, in respect of which an election petition under these rules is filed, was held. In other words, the Dist. J. or the Judicial Commissioner is given the powers of an Election Commissioner. Undoubtely the Dist. J. is subordinate to the High Court. Necessarily the Election Commissioner as a Court is subordinate to the High Court.

This view is supported by the Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court in Parthasarthy Naidu v. Chintlacharvu Rao, 47 Mad. 369. In that case their Lordships had to consider the following rule framed under the Madras Local Boards Act of 1920: 'No election of a member or of a President of a District, Taluk, or Union Board shall be called in question except by an election petition, presented in accordance with these rules to the District or Subordinate Judge having jurisdiction.' They held that 'A District or Subordinate Judge, in deciding an election petition presented before him under the rules issued by the Local Govt. under the Local Boards Act, 1920, is acting not merely as a persona designata, but as a Court in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction extended for that purpose; consequently, the High Court is competent to exercise its powers of revision over decisions in election petitions'."

Meredith, J. was equally emphatic on the point (vide p. 589 of the report):

"A further question, however, now arises. Has this Court any power under S 115, Civil P. C., to interfere in revision with the Election Commissioner's orders? That depends upon whether the Election Commissioner is a Court; & if so, a Court subordinate to the High Court.

The question whether Election Commissioner is a Court presents no real difficulty. The material considerations in determining such a question are clearly set out in the Full Bench case of this Court, Mt. Dirji v. Sm. Goalin. 20 Pat 373. Applying the tests there specified, there can be no doubt about the matter. The Election Commissioner acts judicially; he follows the procedure of the Code of Civil Procedure, & has the powers which are vested in a Court under the Code of Civil Procedure when trying a suit. Finally, he has the power to grant a declaration.

The question of subordination too presents no real difficulty. Upon this point there is a significant Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court in Parthasarathy Naidu v. Chintlacharvu, 47 Mad 369, where a quotation is made from Rex v. Shoredith Assessment Committee, (1910) 2 K. B. 859 at p. 880 wherein it was pointed out that subjection to the High Court is a necessary & inseparable incident to all tribunals of limited jurisdiction. The existence of the limit presupposes a higher authority to determine & enforce it. Any inferior tribunal cannot be permitted to determine the limits of its own jurisdiction, or to trespass beyond those limits without some power of check. That would be intolerable. In this country, in the absence of anything to the contrary, it is the High Court to which such a tribunal will be subordinate.

I have myself examined the position at length with regard to subordination in Arjun v. Krishna Chandra, 21 Pat. 1, & it is necessary to repeat here what I said there. There also I referred to the very relevant observations in Rex v. Shoredith Assesement Committee. (1910) 2 K. B. 859. National Telephone Co., Ltd. v. Post Master, General, 1913 A. C. 546 is another decision relevant in this connection.

* * * *

The Election Commissioner, & a fortiori an Additional Election Commissioner is clearly a Court subordinate to the High Court within the meaning of S. 115, Civil P. C., & it is open to the High Court to interfere in revision in a proper case."

This decision, I may incidentally observe was followed recently by this very Bench in Jaswant v. Jogendra, 29 Pat. 851.

[27] The cases in which I have referred above were cases undoubtedly arising under different statutes. But it would not be correct to say that the decisions under those statutes are not helpful in considering the constitution & functions of the Authority constituted under the present enactment. If the tests laid down in those cases are applicable to the Authority constituted under the Payment of Wages Act, there is no reason why the question could not be answered on the application of those principles even in the present case, & I fail to see how such an argument would be misleading unless of course it was pointed out that there was some fundamental difference in the present case from the constitution & functions of the Courts dealt with in the cases discussed above. I find, however, that there is a Full Bench decision of the Lahore High Court in Works Manager Carriage Wagon Shops Mohalpura v. K. G. Hashmat, A. I. R. (33) 1946 Lah. 316:I. L. R. (1947) Lah. 1 precisely in point & arose under the Payment of Wages Act with which we are concerned now. In that case the Judges who decided it held that the Authority appointed under S. 15 of this Act was a civil Court & was subject to the revisional jurisdiction of the High Court under S. 115, Civil P. C. They pointed out that one of the fundamental tests as to whether a certain Tribunal was a Court or not was whether it exercised jurisdiction by reason of the sanction of law or whether jurisdiction had been conceded to it by voluntary submission of the parties to the dispute. They also pointed out that the other important test was whether it could take cognizance of a 'lis' & whether in exercising its functions it proceeded to act in a judicial manner. The learned Judges found on a scrutiny of the provisions of the Payment of Wages Act, 1936, & the rules thereunder that it was perfectly obvious that the 'Authority' appointed under the Act performed a delegated judicial function of the State & in exercising those functions it proceeded in a judicial manner. The mere fact that the amounts awarded by the 'Authority' were described in the enactment as directions rather than decrees, & that the 'Authority' as such could not execute its own decrees were not such determining factors as to affect his position as a Court. They, therefore, decided that the 'Authority' must be regarded as civil Court & a Court subordinate to the High Court, within the purview of S. 115, Civil P. C. In dealing with the question whether the authority was or was not a Court, their Lordships followed the Full Bench decision of this Court in Mt. Dirji's case.

[28] These decisions, with which I respectfully agree, leave no doubt in my mind that the questions raised above should be answered in favour of the petitioner in this Court & the preliminary points about the maintainability of this application should be disposed of accordingly.

[29] Before, however, I conclude this judgment, I must deal with a few of the cases which have taken a contrary view of the matter. In particular, I will have to refer to a decision of the Nagpur High Court on which great reliance has been placed for the opposite party.

[30] The decision of the Nagpur High Court is in Sawatram Ramprasad Mills Co. Ltd. v. Vishnu Pandurang, A. I. R. (37) 1950 Nag. 14. The importance of this decision arises from the fact that it deals with the very same questions arising under the very same Act, & although it is a Division Bench judgment, it has thought fit to disagree with the Full Bench of the Lahore High Court, already discussed by me, & appears to rely upon another Division Bench decision of the Bombay High Court in The Spring Mills Ltd. v. G. D. Ambekar, A. I. R. (36) 1949 Bom. 188. The question there involved was whether a revision under S. 115, Civil P. C. lay to the High Court against an order of the Authority appointed by the Provincial Govt. under S. 15, Payment of Wages Act, or, in other words, whether the Authority could be said to be a 'Court' which was 'subordinate to the High Court.'

[31] The opinion in the Nagpur High Court appears to have been divided on the point. Bose J. (as he then was) had held that the Authority was a 'Court' but not a 'Court subordinate to the High Court,' while Bobde J. had expressed a contrary opinion. In view of that conflict the point came to be decided by a Division Bench. The learned Judges broadly observed that the opinion of Bose J. had found favour with the Bombay & the Allahabad High Court, & that of Bobde J. in Lahore & Patna. To be more accurate, even Bose J. had held that the 'Authority' mentioned in the Act was a 'Court' though of course on the other point, whether it was subordinate to the High Court, Bose J. held that it was not. The Division Bench, however, seems to have held that the 'Authority' under the Act was not a 'Court' at all. Their Lordships observed as follows:

"With the growth of administrative institutions a large number of administrative tribunals has come into existence which perform functions analogous to those of Courts but are not 'Courts' in the strict sense. Some of these authorities pronounce upon valuable rights, act in a judicial manner & even take evidence on oath but they are not 'Civil Courts' because their decisions implement some administrative policy or determine controversies not related to matters present generally before the ordinary Civil Courts. The dividing line between administrative tribunals & Courts of civil judicature is always very difficult to define."

Yet this dividing line, in my opinion, had to be defined by reference to certain positive tests.

[32] I do not find, if I may say so with great respect, any material assistance from the judgment as to in what manner the Authority under the Act should not be held to be a Court except the suggestion that with the development of political, social & economic ideas many valuable rights have come to be recognised which were not before the subject-matter of 'lis' in the conventional sense & in their enforcement the policy of the State had been to create special Tribunals with exclusive jurisdiction & to make them in my cases self-contained. This obviously does not take us very far. As I have pointed out above, the 'lis' here is generally between the party in whom the right subsits, namely, the workers & the party who is guilty of the infringement of that right, namely, the employer or the person responsible for the payment of wages. Such a right, in my opinion, was a contractual right & could be enforced in a civil Court subject to the bar provided by S. 22 of the Act, & I see no reason to think that the 'lis' here did not relate to a civil right between two private parties which could otherwise be enforced by a civil Court.

[33] The learned Judges seem to be also of the opinion that where a Tribunal exercises an exclusive & special jurisdiction, it would be wrong to call it a Court of 'civil judicature'. This opinion they formed from their reading of the preamble & S. 9, Civil P. C. as also the provisions of Ss. 3 & 4 of the Code, & they, therefore, held that S. 115 can have no application to Courts which have been given exclusive jurisdiction by express provision of law or by necessary implication but must be confined only to those Courts which are mentioned in S. 3 of the Act. If I may say so with great respect, I do not agree with this view of the law. As I have already pointed out, the word 'subordinate' has not been defined in S. 3 of the Code, & the reference to subordinate Courts in S. 3 is not exhaustive. I am supported in this view of Rankin J. (as he then was), who said that S. 3 "does not claim to be & is not intended to be exhaustive" & Dhavle J. took the same view in the case of Arjun Routara discussed above. Therefore, S. 115, Civil P. C., does not require that the subordinate Court must be a Court of civil jurisdiction within the meaning of S. 3 of the Code.

[34] The reasons given by the learned Judges for holding that the 'Authority' mentioned in S. 15 is not a Court appear to be mainly two-fold; firstly, that the 'Authority' is designated as an 'Authority' & not a Judge & it is mere by an accident that under the notification of the Provincial Govt. the Authority in our Province is a Civil Judge. It could be a mere 'nobody' with experience as a Judge or Magistrate". They also observed that the Authority could be moved not only by a person aggrieved but even by an Inspector under S. 14 of the Act or even by a stranger with the permission of the Authority, & this they regard as a very significant difference. The other reason which has been given by them is that there would be no need to give powers under the Civil Procedure Code for the purpose of taking evidence & of enforcing the attendance of witnesses & compelling production of documents if the Authority was a Civil Court. This they point out with reference to S. 18, Payment of Wages Act.

[35] In my opinion, the fact that a third party could also move the Authority on behalf of the party aggrieved & with the permission of the Authority does not detract from its position as a Court & is not such a material difference as to affect that status if otherwise it answers to all the attributes of a Court. We know in certain cases even under the Code of Civil Procedure that a Court of civil jurisdiction can be moved by a person who is not strictly speaking the party aggrived; for instance, the Advocate General in certain cases may move the Court. In regard to the second reasoning, I cannot do better than refer to the observation of this Court in the Full Bench case of 20 Pat. 373, where the learned Judges repelled the contention thus :

"The provisions made in S. 23 may have been made either ex abundanti cautela or to avoid the necessity of incorporating in the Act a large number of provisions like those to be found in the Civil Procedure Code or because the framers of the Act wanted to emphasise that for the purpose mentioned in the section the Commissioner shall be regarded as a Civil Court. However that may be, the mere fact that it has been expressly stated that the Commissioner will have the powers of a civil Court, cannot by itself justify the inference that he is not a Court."

I may mention here that S. 23, Workmen's Compensation Act, referred to in the above quotation, is a provision analogous to that of S. 18 of the Act with which we are concerned in the present case.

[36] It is fortunate that the learned Judges of the Nagpur High Court who decided the case under reference did not condescend to pay due attention to the important decisions of our own Court which throw a good deal of light on the points in controversy. These learned Judges appear to have brushed aside those decisions with the observation :

"Nor is it helpful to consider those cases in which the constitution & functions of other tribunals have been examined to see whether they are subordinate to the High Court in its revisional jurisdiction under S. 115, Civil P. C. Nothing is likely to be more misleading than an argument based upon certain resemblances which, though apparently there, may not be fundamental to this issue. What we have to do is to find out the points on which particular tribunal either resembles the ordinary civil Courts differs from them."

But the fundamental differences, if any, unfortunately have not been pointed out. The learned Judges only proceed to observe that mere presence of certain attributes do not constitute the Authority a 'Court' subordinate to the High Court but they do not, if I may respectfully suggest, refer to any positive tests, except those I have discussed above, from which it could be definitely ascertained as to what would be attributes of a 'Court.' I, therefore, cannot find my way to accept the correctness of that decision & to depart from the wholesome view repeatedly expressed in the several decisions of this Court & rightly followed by the Full Bench of the Lahore High Court.

[37] The decision of the Bombay High Court on which reliance has been placed on behalf of the petitioner & which has been approved by the above Nagpur decision does not require any elaborate consideration. The learned Judges there took the view that the mere fact that a statute provides an appeal to a Court from a particular body does not necessarily make that body a Court. They, therefore, opined that the Authority under the Payment of Wages Act is not a Court within the meaning of S. 115 & the High Court has no revisional jurisdiction over the orders of that Authority. In the view which I have taken of the matter & which has been consistently taken by this Court, I am unable to extend my approval to this decision for the reasons already given by me. It is quite unnecessary to dilate upon the negative tests & then hold that a particular tribunal or authority is not a Court. What is required is to determine the essential positive tests & see if those tests are satisfied. In answer to the view taken by the Bombay High Court on the question of subordination of a Court, I may quote for my authority, what has been so often quoted, the pertinent observations in Rex v. Shoredith Assessment Committee, (1910 2 K. B 859 at p. 880 :

"subjection to the High Court is a necessary & inseparable incident to all tribunals of limited jurisdiction ; for the existence of the limit necessitates an authority to determine & enforce it."

[38] The opposite party has also sought to rely upon a Special Bench decision of this Court in Jagernath v. Land Acquisition Collector, Patna, 19 Pat. 321. The case arose under the Land Acquisition Act. The decision does not help the contention of the petitioner because their Lordships held that :

"Even assuming the Collector acts judicially in making or declining to make a reference under S. 18 of the Act, it is extremely doubtful whether he can be regarded as a Court."

That being so, they could not but hold that he was not a Court subordinate to the High Court.

[39] I am not unmindful of the fact that there may be certain Courts, Authorities or Tribunals which may have functions & duties like those of a body discharging judicial functions, yet they may not be 'Courts' in the technical sense of the word ; for instance, the Industrial Tribunal set up under S. 7, Industrial Disputes Act, 1947.

[40] In Bharat Bank v. Employees of Bharat Bank, A. I. R. (37) 1950 S. C. 188, the Supreme Court held that such a Tribunal was not a Court even though it had all the trappings of a Court exercising judicial functions. In that case the point to remember is that the decision of the Tribunal could not ex proprio vigore bind the parties without the aid & instrumentality of some other authority or power viz., a notification by Govt. This distinction was very clearly pointed out by Mukherjea J. as also by the other learned Judges. His Lordship observed thus :

"What is necessary is that the determination by its own force & without the aid or instrumentality of any other authority or power must affect the rights & obligations of the parties ; or in other words, the decision itself irrespective of the facts decided, must create rights & impose obligations ; & it should be enforceable as such under the ordinary law of the land. This undoubtedly is one of the fundamental tests which distinguishes a judicial body from one which exercises administrative or quasi-judicial functions."

The other fundamental test which distinguishes judicial or quasi-judicial administrative body, as pointed out by His Lordship, is that the former decides controversies according to law, while the latter is not bound to follow the law for its decision. It is for these reasons that their Lordships held that the Labour Tribunal in question was not a Court though it exercised quasi-judicial functions & had the power of giving decisions on question of differences of an administrative & not justiciable character which cannot be determined by reference to any fixed law or principle of law but were really matters of administrative discretion & judgment.

[41] I must, therefore, hold that the preliminary objections raised on behalf of the opposite party could not be sustained & that this Court had ample power to revise the order of the Authority constituted under the Payment of Wages Act.

[42] The question then is whether on merits we should interfere with this order. As I have already observed in the bringing of this judgment, the two objections raised in regard to the maintainability of the application filed on behalf of the workers are still pending decision by the Authority concerned. The petitioner, however, contends that the manager, Mr. Qasim Lari, appointed under S. 3 of the Act was a necessary party to the application, & he being not a party, the application should have been dismissed in limine. On his behalf reliance is placed upon a decision of the Bombay High Court in P. M. Dixit v. Senior Inspector of Factories, A. I. R. (27) 1940 Bom. 87 which is a single Judge decision of that Court. The learned Judge, of course, has not considered the question whether a revision did or did not lie to the High Court, & in a later case, as I have shown, the same Court has taken the view that the order of the 'Authority' was not revisable. In any case I should examine the reasoning on which the decision proceeds to hold that the manager is a necessary party to the application, & in the absence of such a party the application should not proceed. There the Dist. J. who heard the appeal himself felt some difficulty in maintaining the order as originally passed against the employer in view of the fact that a manager who was responsible for the payment of wages within the meaning of S. 3 of the Act had been appointed. That being so, the view taken by the learned Judge was that the direction should not have been given against the employer but against the manager, except where the amount could not be recovered in the first instance from the manager himself. This to some extent influenced the learned Judge of the Bombay High Court in dealing with the matter & in holding that where a manager is appointed the proceedings should be against the manager alone but if no manager is appointed, they should be against the employer. He supports this view on his reading of S. 15 of the Act & says:

"I think the use of the word 'or' instead of 'and' clearly shows that the proceedings under S. 15 are to be instituted against only one person, whether he is the manager as in this case, or the employer, but not against both."

[43] In my opinion, S. 15 of the Act does not bear the interpretation which has been sought to be put upon it. S. 15 nowhere speaks of the parties to the proceeding. It only says that where the contigency has happened, namely, that there has been deduction from wages or delay in payment of wages contrary to the provisions of the Act, the person aggrieved may apply to the authority for a direction under Sub-s. (3) of the section subject to certain limitations. Sub-s. (3) does not lay down who the opposite party to the application should be. It mainly provides inter alia that where the application is entertained under Sub-s. (2), the Authority shall hear the applicant & the employer or other person responsible for the payment of wages under S. 3 or give them an opportunity of being heard etc. & thereafter direct the refund to the employed person of the amount deducted. Apparently it presumes that in the first instance the name of the employer must be there though it does not definitely say so. R. 8, however, of the rules framed under the Act quite clearly shows that the notice of the application shall be sent to the employer. R. 8 (1) is worded thus:

"If the application is entertained, the Authority shall call upon the employer by a notice in Form E to appear before him on a specified date together with all relevant documents & witnesses, if any, & shall inform the applicant of the date so specified."

The rule, therefore, definitely contemplates that the notice should go to the employer, R. 8 does not speak of any notice to the manager or any other person working under the employer. For obvious reasons it would be so, because if the employer on service of notice appears & accepts the claim, then the necessary directions can be at once given, but if the employer pleads that some other person is responsible for the payment of wages, & satisfies the authority that it is so, the Authority may under those circumstances issue citations upon that person & hear him before giving directions against the latter. If at the same time it is assumed that the word 'employer' used in R. 8 of the statutory rules includes also the manager or other person responsible for the payment of wages under S. 3, even then it makes no difference; because in that case it provides for issue of notice apparently to the employer as also, if necessary, to the person responsible for the payment of wages under S. 3. But as to whether there is such a person responsible for the payment of wages under S. 3 & if so, whether he is actually responsible for making the payment can be only discovered :by the Authority after the employer has appeared in pursuance of the notice & placed the materials. The liability of the employer for the payment illegally deducted from the wages or for the payment of the wages unlawfully detained has never ceased; though it may be that for the time being under S. 3 of the Act the employer has made an officer under him responsible for the payment of wages. That person acts under the employer & inevitably subject to his authority :& control. Therefore, it would be wrong to assume that the application would be held to be not maintainable because the employer has been made a party to the application & not the manager named in S. 3. As I have said, S. 15 does not speak of the manager being a necessary party to such an application. Therefore, it cannot be assumed that failure to implead him would result in the dismissal of the application & make the application inherently defective. I agree that the 'direction' mentioned in the section should in the first instance be made against the manager if he is found to have made the illegal deductions & the payment should be sought to be recovered from him, & it is only where it cannot be so recovered that it should be recovered from the employer. This follows from a perusal of the provisions of Ss. 3 & 19 of the Act. But it does not follow that the application also in the first instance or rather primarily should be made against the manager, & if it is not so made the application should be held to be untenable so as to give no jurisdiction to the Authority to act upon it Such an interpretation, in my opinion, is not at all warranted by the provisions of the Act.

[44] On behalf of the opposite party it has been also argued that this is not merely a 'factory' but an 'industrial establishment', & in the case of an 'industrial establishment' the question of making the manager a party does not arise. The expression 'industrial establishment' has been defined in S. 2 of the Act to mean any workshop or other establishment in which articles are produced, adapted or manufactured, with a view to their use, transport or sale. It is pointed out that in this establishment sugar is manufactured & produced for transport & sale. In the case of industrial establishments S. 3 (b) of the Act provided that if there is a person responsible to the employer for the supervision & control of the industrial establishment, then that person shall be responsible for the payment of wages to the persons employed. It appears that in this case there is a general manager of the Sasamoosa Sugar Works who has been made a party to the application. This question if at all relevant is really a matter for investigation by the Authority concerned as all the materials on the point are not before us. But as I have held in any event even if the manager appointed under S. 3 (a) of the Act has not been made a party to the applications, that would not affect the maintainability of the same. The workers opposite party have already filed an application for making the alleged manager, Qasim Lari, a party to the applications & that matter may have to be dealt with by the Authority himself as also the question of limitation which is entirely within his purview. He may in appropriate cases on sufficient cause shown condone the delay, if any.

[46] I should, however, make it clear that the Authority should write out a self-contained order dealing specifically with the points raised. I have no doubt that if the learned officer had devoted little attention to the matter, much of the wastage of time & inconvenience could have been avoided.

[47] Das J.—I agree with my learned brother as to the order proposed to be passed by him. I also agree generally with him as to the reasons for the conclusions he has come to, on the questions involved in this case. I do not, therefore, propose to say anything more than this that in view of the decisions of this Court in Mt. Dirji v. Sm. Goalin, 20 Pat. 373, Arjun Rautara v. Maharaja Krishna Chandra Gajapati Narayan Deo, 21 Pat. 1 & Abdul Razak v. Kuldip Narain, 21 Pat. 577, it must be held (1) that the prescribed authority under the relevant sections of the Payment of Wages Act is a Court: & (2) that it is a civil Court, subordinate to this Court within the meaning of S. 115, Civil P. C. I think that the aforesaid decisions are binding on us, & it is not open to us to follow the Nagpur decision Sawatram Ramprasad Mills Co. Ltd. v. Vishnu Pandurang Hingnekar, A. I. R. (37) 1950 Nag. 14. I must, however, make it clear that, as at present advised, I consider that the reasons on which the above decisions of this Court are based are good reasons the validity of which does not appear to me to have been shaken by the Nagpur decision.

[48] I am in entire agreement with my learned brother that the failure to make Mr. Lari a party at the first instance did not make the applications incompetent, & there can be no objection to adding Mr. Lari as a party at a subsequent stage.

Income-tax Act (1922), S. 4 — Salami paid to landholder when not assessable to tax, Prima facie salami is not income unless the income-tax authorities show that there are circumstances to indicate that it is so. Where, therefore, there is no such circumstance indicated by the authorities, but on the contrary the evidence on the record indicates that the salami was not in payment of advance rent, the salami is not assessable to tax : A.I.R. During the year of accounting the assessee leased out a large area of land to the lessee for the purpose of enabling him to extract mica therefrom. The lease was for a term of years on an annual rental of Rs. 153. In connection with this lease a salami of Rs. 4000 was paid by the lessee for obtaining the lease. The assessee contended that the sum of Rs. 4000 was a capital receipt in connection with the transfer of prospective mineral rights in the land :

Held that the salami in the present case could not be assessed as revenue & therefore had to be excluded from the assessment. [Para 3]

('47) A I.R. (34) 1947 Pat. 252 : (14 I.T.R. 738). [Pr. 3]

Sarjoo Prasad J.—In this Income-tax reference made by the Income-tax Appellate Taibunal the dispute relates to two items, viz., a sum of Rs. 4000 which was paid to the assessee by way of salami by one Dwarka Prasad Agarwala for obtaining a lease & also another sum of Rs. 351 paid by another person, viz., one Amin Ahmed Khan for obtaining settlement of fireclay land from the assessee.

[2] The assessee is a zamindar & within the abmit of his zamindari there are tracts of various mineral & mica lands. During the year of accounting i.e. 1943-44, the applicant leased out an area of 3071 acres of land to one Dwarka Prasad Agarwala for the purpose of enabling him to extract mica therefrom. The lease was for a term of 9 years on an annual rental of Rs. 153. It was in connection with this lease that a salami of Rs. 4000 was paid by the said Dwarka Prasad Agarwala for obtaining the lease. The assessee contended that this 4000 rupees was a capital receipt in connection with the transfer of the prospective mineral rights in the land. The claim of the assessee was not entertained by the revenue authorities & the salami of Rs. 4000 was taxed as a revenue receipt & not as capital receipt. In regard to the other sum it has been found that this sum was received by the assessee as salami or premium for settlement of fireclay land measuring about 51.6 acres for a period of 9 years. The two leases, one in favour of Amin Ahmed Khan, are both annexures to the reference made by the Tribunal & the two points which have been formulated for decision by this Court are :

"(1) Whether on the facts & in the circumstances of this case the Tribunal was right in holding that the sum of Rs. 4000 received from Dwarka Prasad Agarwala was a revenue receipt &, therefore, taxable under the Income-tax Act ? & (2) whether on the facts & circumstances of this case the Tribunal was right in holding that the sum of Rs. 351 received by the applicant for settlement of fireclay land from one Amin Ahmed Khan was a revenue receipt &, therefore, taxable under the Income-tax Act ?"

[3] These two points, in my opinion, have to be answered in favour of the assessee in view of a number of judicial decisions upon the point which conclude the matter, the latest of those being the decision of this Court in Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O. v. Kamakshya Narain Singh, A. I. R. (34) 1947 Pat. 252, corresponding to 14 I. T. R. 738 at page 746. In the case in question the point was whether a sum of Rs. 5,25,000 received as salami by the assessee was taxable as income. In dealing with this point their Lordships relied upon a Special Bench decision of this Court reported in Province of Bihar v. Pratap Udainath Sahi Deo, 1941 I. T. R. 313, where it was held that

"salami could not be regarded as income as a matter of law. It may in certain cases be regarded as payment of rent in advance & in such cases it could rightly be regarded as income. Where, however, salami could not be regarded as a payment of rent in advance, it could not be regarded as income & would, therefore, not be taxable. Prima facie, salami is not income & it is for the Income-tax authorities to show that there do exist facts which would make the salami income."

In answering the reference their Lordships pointed out that the question whether salami was or was not assessable as income was largely a question of fact which had to depend upon the investigation of the circumstances of the case; but where the facts found indicate that it could not be regarded as income the inference would be one of law. As already observed above, prima facie, salami was not income unless the income-tax authorities show that there were circumstances to indicate that it was so. In the present case no such circumstance has been indicated by the revenue authorities. On the contrary, the indentures which are on the record indicate that the salami was not in payment of advance rent. In my opinion, therefore, the two items of salami in the present case could not be assessed as revenue & therefore, had to be excluded from the assessment. For these reasons the questions formulated have to be answered in favour of the assessee and are answered accordingly. The assessee is entitled to his costs of this reference. Hearing fee, in the circumstances of the case, is assessed at Rs. 100 only.

Sales Tax — Bihar Sales Tax Act (XIX [19] of 1947), S. 20 (2)—Bihar Sales Tax Rules, 1949, R. 58 —Determination—Meaning—Appeal fixed for hearing —Order of dismissal for default—Validity.

The word 'determination' in S. 20 (2) must be construed to mean a decision on the point raised in the case & not merly an order of dismissal for default. Where, therefore, an appeal is not dismissed summarily & is fixed for hearing under R. 58 of the Bihar Sales Tax Rules, it should be decided on merits. But if the appeal is dismissed for default & the assessment is confirmed without giving any reasons in support of the order, the order is illegal. (1950) 18 I. T. R. 928 (All.), Rel. on. [Para 3]

S. N. Dutta & S. C. Sinha — for Petitioners; Govt. Advocate—for the State.

Case referred to:—

('50) 18 I. T. R. 928 (All.) [Pr. 3]

Ramaswami J.—These cases are stated by the Board of Revenue under S. 21 (3), Bihar Sales Tax Act.

[2] The following question of law has been referred in both the statements:

"Whether in order dated 30-4-48 dismissing the appeal for default without deciding the question raised by the appellant in his memo. of appeal to the Commissioner is intra vires & in accordance with law."

[3] On behalf of the assessee, Mr. S. N. Dutt cited S. 20 of the Act which provides that within sixty days from the passing of an order of assessment, with or without penalty, under S. 10, any dealer may, in the prescribed manner, appeal to the prescribed authority against such assessment or penalty for both. Under S. 20 (2) the appellate authority, in disposing of any appeal under sub-s. (1), may confirm, reduce, enhance or annul the assessment or penalty, if any, or both, "subject to such rules as have been prescribed." Reference was made to R. 57, Bihar Sales Tax Rules, which is to the following effect:

"Summary rejection of appeal.—If the memo. of appeal is not in Form XXIV or if all the requirements of the form are not duly complied with, the appeal may be summarily rejected after giving the appellant such opportunity as the appellate officer thinks fit to amend such memo. The appeal may also be summarily rejected on other grounds which should be reduced to writing by the appellate officer:

Provided that before an order rejecting the appeal is passed, the appellant shall be given a reasonable opportunity of being heard."

It was argued on behalf of the assessee that in this case the Commissioner has not purported to act under R. 57 of the Rules but instead fixed a date for hearing under R. 58 which states:

"If the appellate officer does not reject the appeal summarily, he shall fix a date for hearing the appellant or his agent."

From the order sheet of the Commissioner printed at p. 6 of the paper-book it appears that on 9-2-1948 after the memo. of appeal was presented the Commissioner fixed 12-4-1948 for hearing. On the same date he called for a report & asked the Sales Tax Officer to inform the parties of the date fixed. The order sheet dated 29-4-1948 shows that on that date no lawyer appeared for the appellant but a petition for time was presented on the ground that certain documents were filed before the High Court & they had not yet been returned. Thereupon the Commissioner dismissed the appeal for default on the ground that the lawyer should have been present to show "how he was justified in asking for time." It was contended by the learned counsel that since the commissioner did not summarily reject the appeal under R. 57, but had fixed a date for hearing under R. 58 the appeal should have been decided upon merits & the Commissioner ought to have given reasons for confirming the assessment made by the Sales Tax Officer. Since no reasons have been given by the Commissioner it was argued that the order of dismissal for default was ultra vires & not in accordance with law. In this context reference should be made to M. X. De Nornha & Sons, Kanpur v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U. P., 18 I. T. R. 928, in which a notice fixing the date of hearing of a appeal was sent by the Appellate Tribunal by registered post to the address given by the assessee firm. The notice was received by an employee of the firm, who used the seal of the firm, on its behalf. On the day fixed for hearing of the appeal & on the next day to which the case was adjourned by the Appellate Tribunal, the assessee did not appear & the Tribunal dismissed the appeal for default. On these facts it was held by the Allahabad High Court that the Tribunal should have decided the case on merits & the dismissal of the appeal for default could not be said to be hearing of the appeal & its determination. The provisions of S. 20, Bihar Sales Tax Act, are in pari materia with S. 31, Income-tax Act. In my opinion the word "determination" in S. 20 (2), Bihar Sales Tax Act, must be construed to mean a decision on the point raised in the case & not merely an order of dismissal for default. It is clear that the Commissioner acted illegally in dismissing the appeal for default & confirming the assessment without giving reasons in support of this order. For these reasons I would answer the question referred to the High Court in negative. There will be no order for costs.

[4] Sarjoo Prasad J.—I agree. The reference in both the cases should be answered in the manner indicated & for the reasons stated by my learned brother.

†(a) Public Safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3 (1) (a) (iii)—Blackmarketing & hoarding whether affect maintenance of essential supplies & service.

In S. 3 (1) (a) (iii) not only the word "supplies" but also the word "services" has been used. A supply of food or cloth which is essential to the community has a service aspect as well. The use of the word "maintenance" has also to be appreciated. Hence, the acts of blackmarketing or hoarding must affect the maintenance of supply & service essential to the community. A. I. R. (38) 1951 Pat. 47, Foll. [Para 2]

The words 'hoarding' & 'blackmarketing' have a definite meaning in the context of a system of controls, such as will be found in the Foodgrains Control Order, the Cloth & Yarn Control Order & other Control Orders of a similar nature. The maintenance of supplies of food & cloth depends on this system of controls & anybody who evades the Control Orders by hoarding (e. g. secreting part of the stock by making false entries in the stock register, or showing fictitious sales, etc., or blackmarketing (e. g. selling at a rate higher than the controlled rate) clearly acts in a manner which directly jeopardises the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community. [Para 7]

†(b) Public Safety—Preventive Detention Act (1950), S 3(1)—Two courses, prosecution and detention, open to Govt.—Power of Govt. to choose one.

It is not a rule of law that when a person is accused of an offence the only alternative is to prosecute him, & there is no legal authority to detain him. Public safety & the maintenance of public order are the paramount concern of the Govt., & the power of the State Govt. to order the detention of a man is not lost if the Govt. are not in possession of sufficient evidence to secure his conviction. It is not necessary for the executive authority to make a choice between prosecution & detention at the earliest stage & it is not the law that unless such a choice is made the order of detention should be regarded as invalid. What is required is that the executive authority should act according to law, reasonably & in good faith. In all cases it is a question of fact whether the order of detention is mala fide or not. A. I. R. (38) 1951 Pat. 68, Foll.; A. I. R. (31) 1944 Pat. 354, Expl. [Para 3]

(c) Public Safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950). S. 3 (1)—Satisfaction of executive authority —High Court cannot question.

Where two inferences including the one that was drawn by the State Govt. are possible on the facts mentioned in the grounds supplied to the detenu it is not open to the High Court to say that that particular inference should not have been drawn by the State Govt. The High Court cannot undertake an investigation as to the truth or otherwise of the materials on which the satisfaction of the executive authority is grounded. The facts alleged have to be taken to be correct & it will not be a ground for interference if the detenu merely puts forward a counter version. Putting a counter-version is not the same thing as placing circumstances which can go to establish that the alleged facts or grounds are non est. A. I. R. (17) 1930 F. C. 129, Ref. [Para 5]

(d) Public Safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3 (1)—Extent of power of High Court to examine grounds supplied to detenu.

The grounds supplied to the detenu can be examined by the High Court to see if the mandatory provisions of Cl. (5) of Art. 22 of the Constitution have been complied with, viz. (1) that they have been communicated as soon as may be; & (2) they give definite & enough information so as to afford an opportunity of making a representation to the detenu. Secondly, the grounds or facts (materials on which the detaining authority says it has acted) can be examined to see if they are relevant to the object of detention & have a rationally probative value. They can also be examined, if the question of mala fides is raised, the onus on that question being heavy on the detenu. The detenu may, possibly in rare cases, show that the order of detention was made not on the grounds given, but for some other purpose. [Para 8]

The statement that the High Court cannot question the correctness of the grounds means that an investigation into the correctness or otherwise of the grounds, depending as it does on the believability of evidence, cannot be undertaken by the High Court because it is not the satisfaction of the High Court which is a condition precedent to the validity of the order but the satisfaction of the State Govt. In such cases, whether there is an affidavit in reply or not the High Court is powerless to interfere. [Para 9]

(e) Public Safety — Preventive Detention Act (1950), S. 3 (1)—High Court when will interfere.

Affidavits filed on behalf of the detenus may generally be divided into three classes—(i) those that consist of a mere denial of the grounds or facts alleged; (ii) those that consist of an attempted explanation of the fact alleged, the truth of the explanation depending on credibility of evidence; & (iii) those that disclose circumstances which render the grounds or the facts on which the grounds are founded completely non-existent, that is, inaccurate on the face of them, without the necessity & independent of the question, of any evidence. It is in the last class of cases the High Court can interfere on the ground that the order is not bona fide. The first two classes of cases are those in which the Advisory Board is the proper authority to consider the denial or the explanation. [Para 9]

Narayan J. — These are applications under S. 491, Criminal P. C. for securing the release of persons who have been detained under orders which purport to be orders under Cl. (iii) of S. 3 (1) (a), Preventive Detention Act, 1950 (Act IV [4] of 1950). With regard to each of the detenus by or on whose behalf these applications have been filed the State Govt. feel satisfied that if he is allowed to remain at large, he will indulge in activities to the prejudice of the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community & it is therefore that their detention has been ordered. The case of each of these detenus will be separately dealt with, & we have to examine the grounds of detention served on each of them. But before I take up the case of each & every detenu for a separate treatment it is necessary for me to refer to the questions of law that are common to all or some of these applications. The first important contention is that the alleged activities of these applicants do not attract the operation of Cl. (iii) of Sub-s. (1) (a) of S. 3, Preventive Detention Act, & that this provision of law was not intended to cover a case of this nature. The second important contention which has been urged on behalf of those detenus against whom prosecutions were started under S. 7, Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act, 1946, is that their detentions are mala fide inasmuch as the State Govt. having found that the evidence against them was too weak to support a prosecution passed orders for their detention applying Cl. (iii) of S. 3 (1) (a), Preventive Detention Act. On behalf of those detenus against whom no prosecutions were started it is contended that when they could be prosecuted on the facts alleged it was not open to the State Govt. to detain them according to the provisions of the Preventive Detention Act on those very facts. And on behalf of those detenus against whom prosecutions were pending on the day the orders for their detention were passed, it is contended that it was wrong for the State Govt. to detain them while the prosecutions were pending.

[2] So far as this Court is concerned, the first point now stands concluded by our recent decision in Dayanand Modi v. State of Bihar, the judgment of which was delivered on 5-1-1951. My learned brother has exhaustively dealt with the question, & I have agreed with him in overruling the contention that such activities do not attract the operation of Cl. (iii) of S. 3 (1) (a), Preventive Detention Act. In S. 3 not only the word "supplies" but also the word "services" has been used, & as pointed out by my learned brother in his judgment in the cases of Dayanand Modi & others, a supply of food or cloth which is essential to the community has a service aspect as well. In my opinion, the learned counsel were wrong in interpreting the word "service" so narrowly as they did. The dictionary meaning of the word "service" has to be appreciated, & according to the New English Dictionary, edited by Sir James Murray, LL. D., (Oxford publication), one of the meanings given to the word "service" is the act of waiting at table or dishing of food & also the manner in which this is done. The use of the word "maintenance" in Cl. (iii) of S. 3 (1) (a) of the Act has also to be appreciated, & it need hardly be pointed out that acts of blackmarketing or hoarding must affect the maintenance of supply & service essential to the community. The several entries in the Legislative List have never been regarded as water-tight compartments, & a particular act can be covered by more than one item in those lists. The first important contention on behalf of these detenus must, therefore, be now rejected as untenable.

[3] The second point is also now concluded because of our decision in the case of Dayanand Modi & others & also in the cases of Subodh Kumar Singh & Kishori Prasanna Sinha, Cri. Misc. Nos. 626 & 627 of 1950 decided by us on 21-12-1950. It is not a rule of law that when a person is accused of an offence the only alternative is to prosecute him, & there is no legal authority to detain him. As was pointed out by Lokur J. in Gajanan Krishna v. Emperor, A. I. R. (32) 1945 Bom. 533 at p. 536:

"for conviction the Court has to be convinced of the guilt of the accused, & the benefit of a reasonable doubt goes to the accused. But for the purpose of detention it is enough if the Govt. or any officer duly empowered is reasonably satisfied of the necessity of his detention."

Public safety & the maintence of public order are the paramount concern of a civilised Govt. & the power of the State Govt. to order the detention of a man is not lost if the Govt. are not in possession of sufficient evidence to secure his conviction. As was pointed out by his Lordship the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court in A. K. Gopalan v. State of Madras, (1950-13 S. C. J. 174), for preventive detention action can be taken on good suspicion, & that it is a subjective test based on cumulative effect of different actions, perhaps spread over a considerable period. His Lordship further pointed out that the very purpose of preventive detention is to prevent the individual from acting in a particular way & for achieving a particular object. In Basant Chandra Ghose v. Emperor (1945-7 F. C. R. 81), Sir Patrick Spens C. J. who delivered the judgment of the Federal Court pointed out that the decision of this Court in Kamla Kant v. Emperor, 23 Pat. 252—a decision on which reliance has been placed before us by the appellants' counsel—cannot be understood as laying down any general proposition of law that when a man is accused on some definite & specific charge, there cannot be any order of detention passed against him before he is tried of a charge & his guilt or innocence finally determind. Even in that case Shearer J. had observed that he should not be understood to say that where a man has been acquitted, there cannot be an order of detention against him. It is not necessary for the executive authority to make a choice between prosecution & detention at the earliest stage, & it is not the law that unless such a choice is made the order of detention should be regarded as invalid. What is required is that the executive authority should act according to law, reasonably & in good faith, & as pointed out by my learned brother in the cases of Subodh Kumar Singh & Kishori Prasanna Sinha, Cri. Misc Nos. 626 and 627 of 1950 in all cases it is a question of fact whether the order of detention is mala fide or not.

[4] I would now deal with each of these cases separately.

[5] Criminal Misc. No. 623 of 1950—The applicant of this case is the sole proprietor of a firm known as Jagarnath Madanlal which carries on cloth business in the town of Muzaffarpur. On 4-10-1950 the petitioner's shop was raided by police officers & there was a check & verification of the stock kept in the shop with the help of the entries in the stock register. A shortage of 56½ pairs of dhotis & saris was found, & it was further found that the stock register contained no entry with regard to 5 bales of cloth each containing 190 pairs. The Sub-Inspector in charge of the Muzafferpur town police station submitted a report against this detenu on 10-10-1950 & the first information report was instituted on the basis of that report. The petitioner was arrested on that very date. He was refused bail by the Magistrate as well as by the Ses. J. This Court by its order dated 3-11-1950 granted him bail, but on 4-11-1950 & before he could be released on bail, he was served with an order of the State Govt. dated 31-10-1950 which directed that he be detained for having acted in a manner prejudicial to the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community. The grounds of detention were served on the detenu on 17-11-1950. The special grounds mentioned in the order of the Govt. dated 15-11-1950, in which the grounds have been disclosed, are that when the accounts & the stock of this detenu were checked on 4-10-1951, 5 bales of saris & dhotis were found in excess, & that the account further disclosed a shortage of 56½ pairs of saris & dhotis. It is further stated in the grounds that though from the accounts it appears that on 9 9-1950 762 pairs of dhotis & saris had been sold, there was an entry of that date indicating the sale of 808 pairs of saris & dhotis. The explanation offered by the detenu with regard to the excess of 5 bales is that these bales of cloth had been sold though they could not be removed from the premises of the petitioner, because the purchasers had not made payment & transport facilities were not available to them. And the explanation offered for the other discrepancy is that clerical mistakes had been made in making the entries. It is stated that on 9-9-1950 & 30-9-1950 there were sales of 762 pairs & 891 pairs, respectively, but by mistake an entry indicating the sale of 808 pairs was made on the former date & an entry indicating the sale of 791 pairs was made on the latter date. And in this way the detenu explains the shortage of 54 pairs. The explanations, in my opinion, are not such as can be easily accepted. If the 5 bales of cloth had been sold on credit, an entry with regard to these sales could be made in the stock register, & it could be noted in the stock register that these sales had not been made for cash price. Even in the affidavit that has been filed by the detenu, it is stated that one of the credit memo. had not been signed. The facts mentioned in the grounds did exist, & if two inferences including the one that was drawn by the State Govt. are possible on those facts, it is not open to us to say that that particular inference should not have been drawn by the State Govt. This is not a case in which it can be held that the affidavit filed by the detenu discloses such strong circumstances as can show that the alleged facts or grounds are not in existence. It was pointed out by the Federal Court in Machindar Shivaji v. The King, (1949) 11 F. C. R. 827, that the responsibility for making a detention order rests on the provincial executive & that it would be a serious derogation from that responsibility if the Court were to substitute its judgment for the satisfaction of the executive authority &, to that end, undertake an investigation of the sufficiency of the materials on which such satisfaction was grounded. A preventive detention as pointed out by his Lordship Patanjali Sastri J. in A. K. Gopalan v. State of Madras, 1950 13 S. C. J. 174, is a purely precautionary measure which must necessarily proceed in all cases, to some extent, on suspicion or anticipation as distinct from proof (per Lord Atkinson in Rex v. Halliday, (1917) A. C. 260. We can in no case undertake an investigation as to the truth or otherwise of the materials on which the satisfaction of the executive authority is grounded. The facts alleged have to be taken to be correct & it will not be a ground for interference if the detenu merely puts forward a counter-version. Putting a counter-version is not the same thing as placing circumstances which can go to establish that the alleged facts or grounds are non est. And it cannot be said in this case that the affidavit discloses circumstances which go to indicate, beyond any reasonable doubt, that the alleged facts or grounds are non est. This is certainly a case in which it can be said on behalf of the State Govt. that their satisfaction is grounded on materials which are of rationally probative value. In this case some explanations have been offered, which cannot be taken to be correct without a proper enquiry, & no enquiry by us is possible or permissible. I, therefore, see no reason to interfere with the detention order in this case. The case started against him under S. 7, Essential Supplies Act, has now been withdrawn. [Then his Lordship considered the cases of detenus separately & in detail in Cri. Misc. Nos. 624, 652, 661, 669, 663, 664, 636 & 687 of 1950 & came to the conclusion that the orders of detention passed cannot be interfered with.] My conclusion, therefore, is that these applications are not fit to succeed. The applications are dismissed.

[6] Das J. — (Cri. Misc. No. 623 of 1950 & batch.) I agree to the orders proposed by my learned brother in these cases. I wish to add a few words only.

[7] First, as to the question whether activity like hoarding or black-marketing comes within Cl. (iii) of S. 3 (1) (a), Preventive Detention Act, I expressed myself fully in the judgment delivered on 5-1-1951, referred to by my learned brother. The words 'hoarding' & 'black-marketing' have a definite meaning in the context of a system of controls, such as will be found in the Foodgrains Control Order, the Cloth & Yarn Control Order & other Control Orders of a similar nature. The maintenance of supplies of food & cloth depends on this system of controls, & anybody who evades the Control Orders by hoarding (e. g. secreting part of the stock by making false entries in the stock register, or showing fictitious sales, etc.) or black-marketing (e. g. selling at a rate higher than the controlled rate) clearly acts in a manner which directly jeopardises the maintenance of supplies & services essential to the community. If the State Govt. have materials of a rationally probative value on which they are satisfied that a person is likely to act in that manner & to prevent him from acting in that manner it is necessary to pass an order of detention, they have the power to make the order under S. 3 (1) (a) (iii), Detention Act. Therefore, it is necessary to explain clearly, & thereby avoid the possibility of any misunderstanding, as to why we have interfered in some cases & not in others. The orders of detention are made on certain grounds, which must be communicated to the detenus (Cl. (5) of Art. 22 of the Constitution). The grounds, again, may be based on facts, which may or may not be disclosed, it being open to the detaining authority not to disclose facts which it considers to be against the public interest to disclose (Cl. (6) of Art. 22 of the Constitution). But I take it that the facts, so far as they are disclosed, must relate to & be the foundation on which the grounds rest.

[8] Now, the question is how far these grounds or facts can be examined by us. It is, I think, well settled that the grounds can be examined to see if the mandatory provisions of Cl. (5) of Art. 22 of the Constitution have been complied with, viz. (1) that they have been communicated as soon as may be; & (2) they give definite & enough information so as to afford an opportunity of making a representation to the detenu. Secondly, the grounds or facts (materials on which the detaining authority says it has acted) can be examined to see if they are relevant to the object of detention & have a rationally probative value. They can also be examined, if the question of mala fides is raised, the onus on that question being heavy on the detenu. The detenu may, possibly in rare cases, show that the order of detention was made not on the grounds given, but for some other purpose.

[9] We have had three kinds of affidavits filed on behalf of the detenus: one kind consisted of a mere denial of the grounds or facts alleged; the second kind consisted of an attempted explanation of the facts alleged, the truth of the explanation depending on credibility of evidence; & the third kind disclosed circumstances which rendered the grounds, or the facts on which the grounds were founded, completely non-existent; that is, inaccurate on the face of them, without the necessity, & independent of the question, of any evidence. It is in this last kind of cases that we have interfered, on the ground that the order is not bona fide. The first two kinds of cases are those in which, I think, the Advisory Board is the proper authority to consider the denial or the explanation. It is not always easy to appreciate the distinction between the second & third class of cases: the distinction appears to be very thin sometimes, but all the same it is appreciable. Take, for example, the cases where a detenu says that there was no shortage; or that there was miscalculation; or that he has nothing to do with the firm. But the grounds state that there was shortage; or that there was verification or that the detenu was one of the proprietors or partners of the firm. We have taken these to be cases where the truth or otherwise of the explanation given depends on credibility of evidence—a matter not for us to consider & determine. But where the detenu shows that the stock register was not with him but with an officer of the State & yet the ground given is that the register was not duly entered or that there was a discrepancy between the stock as shown in the register & as verified, we held that the ground was inaccurate on the face of it, &, therefore, had no existence in fact. How can a register be entered, if it is in possession of somebody else? Clearly enough, no evidence is required in such a case. Therefore, when it is stated that this Court cannot question the correctness of the grounds, & there are decisions which have said that, the point to be remembered is that an investigation into the correctness or otherwise of the grounds, depending as it does on the believability of evidence, cannot be undertaken by us; because it is not our satisfaction which is a condition precedent to the validity of the order but the satisfaction of the State Govt. In such cases, whether there is an affidavit in reply or not we are powerless to interfere.

[10] It is on this basis that we have declined to interfere in these cases, though in the case of the firm of Bindri Lal Mahabir Prasad all the four brothers have been detained for the activities of the firm. In some of these cases, the explanations given may turn out to be true, if an investigation is made. In Criminal Misc. No. 624 of 1950 there is, I think, room for some doubt—firstly, because the Magistrate checking the stock himself made an error & secondly, there was very little shortage if the method of calculation (one pair as one unit) was as alleged. But these are matters to be considered more properly by the Advisory Board, & however much one may wish to do so, it is clear that we cannot investigate into the truth or otherwise of these explanations in the way desired by the petitioners.

A. F. O. O. No. 19 of 1951, D/- 30-3-1951.

Arbitration Act (1940), S. 34—Contract containing arbitration clause — Breach of contract by deft. — Rescission of contract & suit by pltf. — Stay of suit.

Where a contract contains an arbitration clause, & one of the parties seeks to avoid the contract, the dispute is referable to arbitration if the avoidance of the contract arises out of the terms of the contract itself. Where, however, a party seeks to avoid the contract for reasons dehors it, the arbitration clause cannot be resorted to, since the whole contract including the arbitration clause is set aside. [Para 8]

An agreement between the pltf., an Electric Supply Co. & the Govt. was as follows: (1) The State of Bihar would make an advance payment of Rs. 5 lakhs to the pltf. but simultaneously the pltf. should formally hand over the possession of the undertaking to an authorised officer of the Govt. & (2) that both the pltf. & the Govt. will make their respective valuation within three months of taking over the undertaking & (3) in the case of any difference or dispute between the parties over the payment of balance which may be found due after valuation such dispute shall be submitted to arbitration. The pltf. brought a suit against the Govt. for recovery of possession alleging that the deft. had failed to make valuation or payment within the period of three months & committed the breach of contract & that by reason of the breach the contract stood rescinded:

Held, that the arbitration clause was still effective, the dispute was a matter within the scope of the arbitration agreement, and the suit instituted by the pltf. ought to be stayed. [Para 10]

Ramaswami J.—This appeal is presented by the deft. against an order of the Subordinate Judge of Gaya refusing to stay Title Suit No. 83 of 1950 under the provisions of S. 34, Arbitration Act.

[2] The pltf. Gaya Electric Supply Co. Ltd., had obtained a license for the supply of electric energy in the town of Gaya under the Electricity Act. On 23-6-1949 the Govt. revoked the license by a notification. Thereupon the pltf. instituted a suit against the State of Bihar for a declaration that the revocation of the license was mala fide & ultra vires. Subsequent negotiation took place & as a result, the parties entered into an agreement to the effect (1) that the pltf. would withdraw the suit on 25-10-1949, (2) that within 3 days of the withdrawal of the suit the State of Bihar would make an advance payment of Rs. 5 lakhs to the pltf. but simultaneously the pltf. should formally hand over the possession of the undertaking to an authorised officer of the Govt. & (3) that both the pltf. & the Govt. will make their respective valuation within three months of taking over the undertaking & (4) "in the case of any difference or dispute between the parties over the payment of balance which may be found due after valuation, such dispute shall be submitted to the sole arbitration of a single arbitrator who should be a high Govt. officer of the Provincial Govt. of rank equal to or higher than a Divisional Commissioner & his award shall be final & binding on both parties." The arbitration clause was contained in a letter dated 13-10-1949 from the Chief Electrical Engineer Bihar & was accepted by the pltff in its letter dated 17-10-1949.

[3] On 19-1-1950 the pltf. informed the Chief Electrical Engineer, Bihar, that the value of the undertaking was Rs. 22,06,072-2-0. In his reply dated 28-1-1950 the Chief Electrical Engineer characterised the estimate as fantastic & stated that the Govt. estimate "could not be finalised for want of certain details of some of the plant & machineries which had not been supplied by the pltf." The Chief Electrical Engineer added that according to the rough valuation of the Govt. the estimate was something in the neighbourhood of what had already been paid. In reply to this letter the pltf. did not furnish the necessary details but demanded that the valuation should be completed & the balance of the amount should be paid to him within a fortnight. On the basis of such particulars as were available the Govt. proceeded to determine the valuation. The estimate was prepared at the request of the State Govt. by an officer deputed by the Central Electricity Commission, Simla. The estimate of Rs. 5,56,221-4-10 was duly communicated to the pltf. on 6-4-1950 by the Chief Electrical Engineer Bihar. As pltf. sent no reply the Government, Bihar, referred the dispute to Mr. M. S. Rao, I. C. S., Commissioner of Chota Nagpore, who was appointed as sole arbitrator to decide the matter. On 19-5 1950 Mr. M. S. Rao was informed by the Govt. that he was appointed as sole arbitrator to decide dispute regarding valuation of the assets of the undertaking. Thereafter the pltf. issued notice under S. 80, Civil P. C., to the Govt. alleging that there was breach of contract since the Govt. did not make valuation within the time stipulated, that the agreement stood cancelled, that a suit would be instituted for recovery of possession of the undertaking or in the alternative for specific performance of contract.

[4] On 28-9-1950 the pltf. commenced the present suit alleging that the Govt. had committed breach of contract, that by reason of the breach the contract stood rescinded & that the pltf. was entitled to be restored to possession of the undertaking & also to forfeit the amount of Rs. 5 lakhs paid by the Govt. in deposit. The State of Bihar appeared & filed an application that the suit should be stayed pending the decision of Mr. M S. Rao who had been appointed as sole arbitrator to decide the dispute as to question of valuation. The Subordinate Judge rejected the application on the ground that the subject-matter of the suit was not within the arbitration clause.

[5] The question to be decided in this appeal is whether the dispute in the suit is within the scope of the arbitration clause and whether the suit should be stayed under S. 34, Arbitration Act.

[6] On behalf of the pltf. Dr. Sultan Ahmad contended that the question raised in the suit was not in respect of any matter agreed to be referred in the arbitration clause. Learned counsel pointed out that the pltf. alleged in para. 17 that the deft. had failed to make valuation or to make payment upto 15-3-1950 & so committed breach of contract, that "by reason of the deft's breach of the contract the pltf. has rescinded the said agreement." The pltf. claimed as reliefs that possession of the electrical undertaking should be restored to it, that damages should be awarded from 16-3-1950 till possession was delivered & that the sum of Rs. 5 lakhs should be forfeited to pltf. But in order to ascertain the real nature of the dispute it is necessary to consider not only the plaint but the allegations of the deft. & the letters that were exchanged between the parties. Para. 1 of the agreement (printed at p. 17 of the case) stipulates that upon receipt of payment of Rs. 5 lakhs by cheque the company shall hand over

"formal possession of the undertaking to the Govt. through on instrument of conveyance making transfer of the property unconditional leaving only its valuation open for settlement by arbitration."

Para. 2 states that Govt. will make the valuation within three months of taking over the undertaking & any balance of money found due to the company as per Govt. valuation will be paid to the company & in case of over payment the excess paid should be refunded to Govt. Para. 3 is the arbitration clause which has been already quoted. The company's letter dated 17th of October is also important in this connection. In this letter the company suggested that

"both the company & the Govt. will make respective valuation within the time mentioned & in case there be no amicable settlement between the parties as to valuation the matter should be referred to arbitration of a single arbitrator whose award shall be final & binding on both parties."

Upon a perusal of the terms of contract & of the correspondence which form part of the contract, it is obvious that no stipulation was made that the compensation money should be paid within the period of three months. On the contrary the intention of the parties was that the Govt. would pay compensation money only after the award had been made by the arbitrator. The only question then at issue between the parties was the matter of valuation of the undertaking. According to the contract the valuation was to be made by the Govt., & if the pltf. did not accept such valuation the matter was to be decided by the arbitrator whose decision was to be final between the parties. In the plaint the allegation is that the Govt. of Bihar had neglected to perform the contract by failing to complete the valuation or to make payment to the pltf. within the period of three months or within the extended time granted by the pltf. In essence the pltf.'s claim is that Govt. did not make valuation or make payment & pltf. claims to have rescinded the contract on that ground. In my opinion the dispute is one arising out of or "in respect of" the agreement. For the question of payment necessarily depends on the valuation of the undertaking. The question is directly within the scope of the arbitration clause which states that "if any difference or dispute between the parties over the payment of the balance arises such dispute should be submitted to the solem arbitration of a single arbitrator & his award shall be final & binding on both the parties."

The arbitration clause must be construed according to its language & in the light of the circumstances in which it was made. I hold that the suit instituted by the pltf. refers to a matter within the scope of the arbitration clause & since the deft. is ready & willing to do everything necessary for the proper conduct of the arbitration, the suit ought to be stayed under S. 34, Arbitration Act.

[7] This opinion is supported by Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd v. Skoda (India) Ltd., 41 C. W. N. 568, in which there was a contract between the parties for supply of machinery which contained the following clause relating to payment :

"Cl. 3. The payment shall be made as follows : 30% cash with orders against vendors giving Bank guarantee, 60% against shipping documents, 10% at the end of 1935-36 Season with Bank guarantee of vendees."

The pltf. alleged that the deft. had committed breach of these provisions as regards payment &, therefore, cancelled the contract. The pltf. then brought a suit for declaration that the contract had been rescinded & did not subsist & for an injunction restraining the deft. from referring the dispute to arbitration in accordance with the arbitration clause in the contract. It was held by Panckridge J., that the dispute was one arising out of the agreement & that the deft. was entitled to an order under S. 19, Arbitration Act, staying the suit. The same view was taken in Governor-General in Council v. Associated Livestock Farm (India) Ltd., A. I. R. (35) 1948 Cal. 230, in which the pltf. made a tender for supply of meat for troops in a certain area in Eastern Command subject to the conditions & stipulations specified in the said tender & in the "instructions to tenderers." The tender was duly accepted & the contract was sanctioned by the Q. M. G. in India. There was an arbitration clause in the contract to the effect that "any dispute or difference arising out of the contract shall be referred to the arbitration of the officer sanctioning the contract whose decision shall be final & binding."

It was alleged by the pltf. that there was a breach of contract since the demand was "far above the local requirements of the army," the deft. "wrongfully employed other contractors at much higher rates" & that the supplies were "taken wrongfully." It was held by the High Court that the dispute between the parties arose out of the contract & that the suit ought to be stayed under the Arbitration Act. On behalf of the pltf., Dr. Sultan Ahmad placed reliance on N. K. Jain v. S. B. Sugar Mills, Ltd., 27 Pat. 930. But the facts of that case are widely different from those of the present case. An unregistered lease was executed by S on the one side & N on the other by which S gave in lease to N a sugar factory for a term of five years. It was stipulated in the lease that in default of the lease money by the lessee or in the event of a breach of any of the terms & conditions embodied in the lease the lessor shall be entitled to terminate the lease & re-enter upon the premises demised & it was also stipulated that all disputes between the lessor & the lessee shall be decided by an arbitrator. The lessee defaulted in payment of the lease money & the lessor instituted a suit for ejectment of the lessee on the ground that the lessee was a mere trespasser & not on the ground of any breach of any of the terms of the lease. On an application by the lessee under S. 34, Arbitration Act, to stay the suit it was held that the dispute in the suit was independent of the contract & was outside the ambit of the arbitration clause in the lease The true nature of the dispute in that case was not whether there had been any breach, all or partial, of the substantive stipulation of the contract but whether the defts. were in possession as trespassers. Upon this ground the High Court held that S. 34, Arbitration Act, was not applicable & the suit could not be stayed.

[8] The next question is whether the arbitration clause is effective, whether the arbitration clause can still be invoked in spite of the repudiation by the plff. The principle is clear. Where a contract contains an arbitration clause, & one of the parties seeks to avoid the contract, the dispute is referable to arbitration if the avoidance of the contract arises out of the terms of the contract itself. Where, however, a party seeks to avoid the contract for reasons dehors it, the arbitration clause cannot be resorted to, since the whole contract including the arbitration clause is set aside. In other words, a party cannot rely on a term of the contract to repudiate it & still say the arbitration clause should not apply. In De La Gards v. Worsnop & Co., (1928) 1 Ch. 17, there was an agreement in writing for the sale of a business subject to certain conditions. The pltf. refused to complete the purchase owing to non-fulfilment of one of the conditions, the effect of which, he contended, was that he was no longer bound by the agreement. The defts. insisted that the condition was satisfied & went to arbitration. The pltf. issued a writ claiming a declaration that the agreement was determined, & the arbitration clause was not effective. Clausen J. rejected the argument as fallacious :

"If it be the fact that the condition has not been fulfilled, the result, no doubt, is this, that the obligation of the pltf. to purchase has come to an end & cannot be enforced against him; but it has come to an end, not by reason of the occurrence of some event outside the consideration of the contracting parties, but by reason of certain events which have occurred & which by reason of the non-fulfilment of a condition, namely, the condition stated in Cl. 5, subject to which the contract was expressly made, have resulted in his no longer being under an obligation to purchase."

[9] To a similar effect is the important case Heyman v. Darwins, Ltd., (1942) 1 ALL E. R. 337, in which the respondents contracted with the appellants, an American firm, whereby the latter were to act as their selling agents over a wide area. The agreement contained an arbitration clause in these terms:

"If any dispute shall arise between the parties thereto in respect of this agreement or any of the provisions herein contained or anything arising thereout the same shall be referred for arbitration. . . . . "

A dispute arose between the parties & the appellants, having intimated to the respondents that their letters showed that they had repudiated the agreement, issued a writ against them, claiming a declaration that the respondents had repudiated the agreement & damages under a number of heads. The respondents claimed that the action should be stayed pursuant to the Arbitration Act, 1889, S. 4, in order that the matters in dispute might be referred under the arbitration clause. The appellants contended that the respondents having repudiated the agreement as a whole & the appellants, by the issue of the writ, having accepted that repudiation the contract had ceased to exist for all purposes & the respondents could not afterwards rely on the arbitration clause. It was held by the House of Lords that the dispute between the parties was a dispute within the arbitration clause & the appellants' action ought to be stayed. At page. 341 Lord Viscount Simon states:

"Even so, I do not see how this claim, however expressed, together with the other claims in the writ, can be regarded otherwise as than involving a dispute 'in respect of the agreement' & in respect of something out of it. The fallacy of the other view arises from supposing that, if the respondents have so acted as to refuse further performance of the agreement, this amounts to saying that they deny that the agreement ever existed. If the respondents were denying that the contract had ever bound them at all, such an attitude would disentitle them from relying on the arbitration clause which it contains; but that is not the position they take up. They admit the contract, & deny that they have repudiated it. Whether they have, or have not, is one of the disputes arising out of the agreement ..... As Viscount Finlay said. in Sanderson & Son v. Armour & Co., (1922) S. C. (H. L.) 117, at page 121: "The proposition that the mere allegation by one party of repudiation of the contract by the other deprives the latter of the right to take advantage of an arbitration clause is unreasonable in itself, & there is no authority to support it'."

In his speech Lord Macmillan also states:

"Repudiation, then, in the sense of a refusal by one of the parties to a contract to perform his obligation thereunder, does not of itself abrogate the contract. The contract is not rescinded. It obviously cannot be rescinded by the action of one of the parties alone. Even if the so-called repudiation is acquiesced in or accepted by the other party, that does not end the contract. The wronged party has still his right of action for damages under the contract which has been broken, & the contract provides the measure of those damages. It is inaccurate to speak in such cases of repudiation of the contract. The contract stands, but one of the parties has declined to fulfil his part of it. There has been what is called a total breach, or a breach going to the root of the contract, & this relieves the other party of any further obligation to perform what he for his part has undertaken. Now, in this state of matters why should it be said that the arbitration clause, if the contract contains one, is no longer operative or effective?"

[10] Applying these principles to the present case I hold that the arbitration clause is still effective, that the dispute about the payment of compensation is a matter within the scope of the arbitration agreement, that the suit instituted by the pltf. ought to be stayed.

[11] Upon these grounds I would set aside the order of the learned Subordinate Judge dated 18-12-1950, & direct that the suit instituted by the pltf. should be stayed under S. 34, Arbitration Act.

[12] I should allow the appeal with costs. Hearing fee ten gold mohars.

A. F. A. D. No. 1273 of 1948, D/- 1-3-1951.

(a) T. P. Act (1882). Ss. 107 & 116 — Registered instrument of lease falling under para. 1 of S. 107 not executed in manner specified under para. 3 of that section — Lease if can be construed as one by oral agreement for one year — Subsequent possession if holding over.

A lease of immovable property purported to be made by a registered instrument for a term exceeding one year or from year to year but not executed in the manner specified in the third para of S. 107 is invalid & its invalidity cannot be cured by construing it as a lease for a term of one year made by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession & thereafter to be a case of holding over under S. 116 : Case law considered. [Para. 8]

Anno. T. P. Act, S. 107 N. 8, 10.

(b) T. P. Act (1882), Ss. 105 & 107 — Invalid lease —Possession of part of leasehold — Doctrine of constructive possession of entire leasehold—Applicability — Nature of possession—Lim. Act (1908), Arts. 142 & 144.

The doctrine of constructive possession of the entire lands in the leasehold by proving possession of a part can be pressed in aid by a person who has the legal title vested in him in the leasehold. A person in possession under an invalid lease is a mere trespasser & it is well settled that a trespasser cannot invoke the aid of the principle of constructive possession. The possession of a trespasser is limited to the lands which are actually in his physical possession : Case law referred. [Para 9]

(c) T. P. Act (1882), S. 53A—Scope—If gives right to transferee to enforce his right in Ct.

Per Sinha J.—S. 53A gives no right to a transferee to come to Ct. as a pltf. either to maintain his possession or to recover possession, if dispossessed, after having been put in possession in pursuance of the contract. A transferee who is not clothed with title in the manner recognised by law, cannot be said to be a person having a valid title in law &, therefore, Cts. of law cannot recognise such a title. The Ct. on grounds of equity alone can refuse to enforce the rights of the transferor except so far as those rights are expressly mentioned in the contract in writing & the equitable right in favour of the transferee has been embodied in S. 53A : A. Sinha J. — This appeal has been filed by the pltf. They had filed the suit for declarations that the lands described in schedule A to the plaint belonged to them; that they were in possession as maiyaddi lessees; that the defts. had no right, title or interest in the same; & for permanent injunction restraining the defts. from working the fire-clay in the aforesaid lands & from removing the fire-clay therefrom & also for damages against the defts.

[2] The pltfs.' case is that they had taken a lease for 21 years for extracting fire-clay in seven villages, including village Mandra, the village in suit, from one Shrimati Hirakumari Debi by a registered lease dated 20-1 1934 & that since then they have been in possession by extracting fire-clay in village Mandra & other villages. They alleged that since January 1945 the defts., in collusion with one another, have been illegally extracting fire clay from that village without any right or title to do so.

[3] The suit was contested by deft. 1 alone, although written statements were filed by the other defts. as well. The contesting deft. pleaded that the pltfs. had no valid lease & that they acquired no right or title to village Mandra by virtue of the said lease. He alleged that the lease in favour of the pltfs. was merely a paper transaction & had never been acted upon & the pltfs. were never in possession of village Mandra. He also alleged that Hirakumari Debi had no right to execute the lease in favour of the pltfs., as she was not the owner of the village. But later on he had to admit that he had himself taken a lease of the fire-clay right of village Mandra from the said Shrimati Hirakumari Debi. His lease is dated 5 10-1943 & his allegation is that even before the execution of the registered lease he was extracting fire-clay from that village under an unregistered Hukumnama dated 5-10 1939.

[4] The pltfs'. suit was decreed by the trial Court, but, on appeal, the judgment & the decree of the first Court were reversed. Hence this appeal by the pltfs.

[5] The Court below has come to the following findings:

(1) that Hirakumari Debi was the owner & proprietress of the village; (2) that the pltfs'. lease is only a patta executed by Hira Kumari Debi alone, & the deft's. lease relates to the same right of extracting fire-clay from village Mandra only for a period of 25 years; (3) that the lease in favour of the pltfs. was invalid, because of the provisions contained in S. 107, T. P. Act; (4) that the pltfs. were not in possession of the village in suit & there is no evidence worth reliance that they had ever extracted fire-clay from village Mandra, although the pltfs. were in possession by extracting fire-clay in village Bahira Dih, one of the seven villages mentioned in the patta in their favour; & (5) that the pltfs. were not entitled to invoke in their aid the provisions of S. 53A, T. P. Act, because those provisions are available only to a deft. in an action & not to the pltf.

[6] The learned counsel appearing on behalf of the appellants has urged three points in support of the appeal: (1) that although the lease in favour of his clients was not executed in the manner prescribed by S. 107, T. P. Act, the written document, namely, the patta, can be construed to embody an oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession, &, therefore, such a lease would be valid for one year & thereafter the pltfs-appellants should be held to have been in possession of the leasehold by holding over under S. 116, T. P. Act; (2) that the pltfs-appellants having been found to be in possession of Bahira Dih, one of the villages included in their lease, they must be deemed to be in constructive possession of the other villages including the village in suit; & (3) that the provisions of S. 53A, T. P. Act, are available to the appellants although they are the pltfs. to the action, & they are, therefore, entitled to maintain their possession under that section.

"A lease of immovable property from year to year or for any term exceeding one year, or reserving an yearly rent, can be made only by a registered instrument.

All other leases of immovable property may be made either by registered instrument or by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession.

Where a lease of immovable property is made by a registered instrument, such instrument, or where there are more instruments than one, each such instrument shall be executed by both the lessor & the lessee....."

[8] The contention of Mr. Sen, the learned counsel for the appellants, is that the document in question should be considered as a lease of immovable property for a term not exceeding one year made by an oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession. In my opinion, this contention is not well-founded. Once there is a lease of immovable property for a term exceeding one year & the lease is made by more than one instrument, each of such instruments must be registered & executed by both the lessor & the lessee, & such lease cannot be construed as a lease for a term of one year made by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession. If the section is construed in the manner suggested by the learned counsel, it will make the provisions of S. 107 absolutely nugatory & nullify the statute itself. The first part of the section lays down that there must be a registered instrument for a lease of immovable property from year to year or for any term exceeding one year or reserving an yearly rent, & the next para of the section says that leases other than those mentioned in the preceding para can be made by registered instrument or by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession That is to say, if there is a lease which is not covered by the first para of the section, such lease can be made by a registered instrument or by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession. If a lease has, in fact, been made by a registered instrument, such instrument, & if there are more than one, then, in my opinion, each of such instruments must be executed by both the parties to the lease. In the present case, the lease in favour of the pltfs. was for 21 years & the instrument creating the lease was a registered instrument. It follows, therefore, that such instrument should have been executed by both the lessor & the lessee & that not having been done, it neither constitutes nor creates any valid lease. The contention of the learned counsel supposes that there has been a delivery of possession to the pltfs; but the finding of the final Court of fact is to the contrary. However, I will consider this aspect of the matter later on. Mr. Sen has cited the cases of Aziz Ahmad v. Alauddin Ahmad, A. I. R. (20) 1933 Pat. 485 and Alaudin Ahmad v. Aziz Ahmad, A I.R. (21) 1934 Pat. 369. The judgment in A. I. R. (20) 1933 Pat. 485 was confirmed in the Letters Patent appeal reported in A. I. R. (21) 1934 Pat. 369. The facts of that case were quite simple. That was a suit for arrears of rent against the defts. who had taken verbal leases for the years 1321 to 1327 Fs. After the leases expired in 1327, there were fresh verbal leases granted by the predecessor-in-interest of the pltfs. & the suit was for recovery of arrears of rent for the years 1331 to 1334 Fs. The finding was that the defts. were in possession, but the suit was dismissed because the lower Court held that the leases were hit by S. 107, T. P. Act, & on the facts of that case Khwaja Mohammad Noor, J., relying upon a Calcutta decision, held that a verbal lease accompanied by delivery of possession was valid for one year & thereater if the deft-lessee continued in possession, his continuance in possession could not be otherwise than by holding over & the provision of S. 116, T. P. Act, was attracted & upon that footing his Lordship held that the defts. were tenants of the pltfs. for the subsequent years also & decreed the suit for rent. This decision was upheld in the Letters Patent Appeal & Courtney-Terrell, C. J., with whom Kulwant Sahay, J., concurred, came to the following finding :

"In my opinion, on these facts the defts. are estopped by their conduct from denying the relationship of landlord & tenant. It is perfectly true that the pltf. cannot set up the verbal lease for the specified period. But I agree with Noor J., that a verbal lease for more than one year accompanied by delivery of possession is valid for the first year 1328. There was no fresh lease & the defts. continue in possession after its termination (admittedly as tenants) for successive years, by holding over & S. 116, T. P. Act, applies."

It is quite clear, therefore, that that was an entirely different case from the one we have to deal with in this appeal & that gives no support to the contention of the appellants to the effect that a registered lease, because it does not fulfil the conditions prescribed by S. 107, T. P. Act, could be construed as a lease by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession. The other case relied upon by the learned counsel in the case of Mohan Lal v. Ganga Singh, A. I. R. (30) 1943 Lah. 127. In this case, there was a lease by the usufructuary mortgagee to the mortgagor of a house on a monthly rental. This document was unregistered & was not, under law, required to be registered. A suit was filed for arrears of rent as also for the ejectment of the deft. from the house. It was held in that case that a lease could only be created in the manner stated in S. 107, T. P. Act, & it was further held that the document in that case, a kabuliyat, could be locked at as an admission or an acknowledgment by the person attempted to be made liable & that would furnish the best evidence as to the oral agreement between the parties. In that view of the matter, their Lordships held that the pltf's. suit could be decreed. This case also, in my opinion, is of no help to the appellants the facts being entirely different. The view which I have taken finds support from a Division Bench decision of this Court in Budhan Mahton v. Ramanugrah Singh, A. I. R. (34) 1947 Pat. 78. In this case, the pltfs. had brought a suit for recovery of possession of a certain share in a village & for mesne profits, or in the alternative, for damages. The pltfs. claimed title under a thicca lease date 28-6-1940 granted by deft. 2 of that case for the period 1348 to 1354 Fs. The same share in the village had been given by deft. 2 in zarpeshgi lease to deft. 1 under a patta dated 13-10-1939 for 1341 to 1347 Fs. The deft. took the defence that there was no valid title created in favour of the pltfs. under their alleged lease. One of the points taken in second appeal was that as the documents of lease, namely, the patta & the kabuliyat. had not been executed by both the parties to the documents, the lease was bad & it was dealt with by Chatterji J., with whom Pande J., concurred, as follows :

"Lastly, it is urged by Mr. Dasu Sinha that even though the patta Ex. 3 may not create a valid lease, the lease may be operative as a lease for one year, inasmuch as it was accompanied by delivery of possession. According to S. 107, T. P. Act, a lease for one year may be made either by a registered instrument or by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession. The argument of Mr. Dasu Sinha cannot succeed, unless it be held that the lease was treated by oral argument accompanied by delivery of possession. The pltfs. never made out a case that the lease was created by an oral agreement. Their definite case was that the lease was created by the registered patta Ex. 3."

In that case, their Lordships did not accept the contention of Mr. Dasu Sinha that although the lease purported to be made by an agreement in writing & registered, it could be construed as an oral agreement for one year & thereafter it could be a case of holding over. Their Lordships' view lends support to my opinion that if a lease is purported to be made by a written & registered agreement for a period exceeding one year; on from year to year, it cannot be construed to be an oral agreement of lease for one year & thus defeat the provisions of S. 107 of the Act. I would, therefore hold that in the present case the lease is within the mischief of S. 107, T. P. Act, & the lease is invalid & its invalidity cannot be cured by construing it to be a lease by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession. I would, therefore, reject this contention of the appellants.

[9] The next point that has been urged is that possession of a portion of the leasehold should be construed to be possession of the other portions of the lands comprised in the leasehold. This argument is founded upon the finding that the pltfs. were in possession of village Bahira Dih, one of the seven villages covered by their lease, & it is said that if the pltfs. were in possession of Bahira Dih, they must be held to be in constructive possession of village Mandra, the village in suit, although the pltfs. might have failed to prove their actual physical possession of this village. In my view, this contention is also without merit. The doctrine of constructive possession of the entire lands in the leasehold by proving possession of a part can be pressed in aid by a person who has the legal title vested in him in the leasehold. If his lease is invalid, because it is not in accordance with the provisions of the law, then he cannot be held to be in possession of the entire leasehold by showing that he was in possession of a portion of it. A person in possession under an invalid lease is a mere trespasser & it is well settled that a trespasser cannot invoke the aid of the principle of constructive possession. The possession of a trespasser is limited to the lands which are actually in his physical possession. The finding in this case is that the appellants have failed to prove their possession of the village in suit. Their lease not having been made in accordance with the provisions of S. 107, T.P. Act, the lease must be held to be an invalid lease & their possession of village Bahira Dih, one of the villages covered by the lease, must be held to be that of trespassers as the legal title did not vest in them by the lease in question. Mr. Sen has drawn our attention to a portion of a sentence at p. 1271 of 'Wood on Limitations', 4th Edn. which runs as follows :

"……..while he is in possession of a part of the premises, his possession is entitled to the benefit of the constructive possession, & can only be ousted by, & to the extent of, the actual occupation of a mere intruder."

Mr. Sen has not referred to the earlier part of the sentence which runs as follows :

'The rule is well settled that title draws to it the possession, & it remains with the owner of the legal title until he is divested of it by an actual adverse possession;"

I have underlined (here italicised) the important words in this quotation & Mr. Sen only relies on what follows this part of the sentence & it is quite clear that the benefit of constructive possession is to go to the owner of the legal title & not to a person who has got no legal title. This quotation from 'Wood on Limitations' does not support Mr. Sen, but is against him. That a person in possession under an invalid lease is in possession as a trespasser, is established now beyond doubt. In the case of President & Governors of the Magdalen Hospital v. Alfred Knotts, (1879) 4 A C. 324 it has been held that a lease which was against the provision of law was an absolutely void lease from its very inception & that if the lessee was put in possession under that invalid lease, the right of the lessor to re-enter on the land existed from the moment of the execution of that lease & that right not having been sought to be enforced within limitation, was barred. This case was followed in our Court in Bhukhan Mian v. Radhika Kunari Debi, 19 P. L. T. 489. This was a case of mortgage which had not been registered as was required by law & Manohar Lall J. made the following observation :

"The pltf., therefore, all the time was entitled to institute a suit for recovery of possession of his lands within 12 years of the date of the invalid mortgage—invalid in the sense that it could not be enforced owing to the absence of registration; the possession of the deft. became adverse to the plf. from the very date of the invalid mortgage."

His Lordship relied upon the aforesaid case of the President & Governor of the Magdalen Hospital. In Mt. Jasoda Kuar v. Janak Missir, A. I. R. (12) 1925 Pat. 787, the observations of Jwala Prasad J., with whom Adami J., agreed, lend support to the view that if a person is in possession under an invalid title for more than 12 years, he gets absolute title to the property by adverse possession, that is to say, the person holding under an invalid title is a trespasser & can get his title perfected by adverse possession if he remains on the land for 12 years. In that case, the pltf. had brought a suit for ejectment on the ground of dispossession, the pltf's. title being founded upon a deed of sale. The defence was that the sale-deed was not a valid one & was not executed by the vendors. The other defence was that the deed of sale was not validly registered because the registration was invalid. Their Lordships held that the execution of the document by the vendors had been proved, there was no fraud & that the registration was also valid. But their Lordships held that even if the registration of the document was illegal, the pltf. having remained in possession for over 12 years, had acquired absolute title to the property by adverse possession. This observation of their Lordships may be an obiter dictum, but that shows the view of their Lordships in regard to the possession of a person under an invalid deed. This judgment of their Lordships was followed by the Allahabad High Court in Kashi Nath v. Makchhed, A. I. R. (26) 1939 ALL. 504 This view also finds support from the case of Kandasami Pillai v. Chhinnabha, 44 Mad. 253, where their Lordships made the following observation :

"An unregistered sale cannot be set up as a transaction having effect of itself to transfer any interest in the property; but it is permissible to consider it, as showing the nature of the transferee's subsequent possession, that is, when the sale is of mortgaged property to the mortgagee that it was not as a mortgagee, but as a full owner. That being established it would after the expiry of 12 years ripen into full title & bar mortgagor's right of redemption."

I would, therefore, hold that the possession of the pltfs. of village Bahira Dih does not prove constructive possession by the plts of village Mandra, the village in suit, &, therefore, it must be held, as has been held by the lower appellate Court, that the pltfs. were not in possession of village Mandra. This finding alone is sufficient to dispose of the whole appeal; but as arguments were addressed to us at length, I have thought it fit to consider the other argument as well.

[10] The last point contended for by the appellants was that under the provisions of S. 53A, T. P. Act, the pltfs. were entitled to maintain their possession. Upon the finding that the pltfs. are not in possession, the question does not fall to be decided; but as Mr. Sen has argued this point at length, I would briefly give my opinion on this point. In my judgment, the provisions of S. 53A do not create a right in the transferee to go to Court for the redress of his grievances. It imposes a bar on the exercise of some of the legal rights of the transferor in a Court of law. The relevant portion of the section runs as follows :

"..... Notwithstanding that the contract, though required to be registered, has not been registered, or where there is an instrument of transfer, that the transfer has not been completed in the manner prescribed therefor by the law for the time being in force, the transferor or any person claiming under him shall be debarred from enforcing against the transferee & persons claiming under him any right in respect of the property of which the transferee has taken or continued in possession, other than a right expressly provided by the terms of the contract."

I have underlined (here italicised) the important words in the extract from the section & it is clear to me that the transferor or persons claiming under him cannot enforce any right in respect of, the property which the transferee has been put in possession of, other than a right reserved expressly in the contract. No right to enforce his right in Court has been given to the transferee. If the transferor or a person claiming under him desires to evict a transferee or a person claiming under him from the land of which the transferee had taken or continued in possession in the absence of any express agreement to the contrary, the transferor or a person claiming under him cannot do so & the transferee or a person claiming under him can successfully raise the plea of part performance, that is to say, of having been put in possession of the property in pursuance of the contract. In other words, this provision contained in S. 53A, does not give any active right to the transferee & it has, therefore, been held by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Probodh Kumar v. Dantmara Tea Co. Ltd. 66 I. A. 293, that the amendment of the law effected by the enactment of S. 53A. conferred no right of action on a transferee in possession under an unregistered contract of sale. Their Lordships agree with the view expressed by Mitter J., in the High Court that "the right conferred by S. 53A is a right available only to the deft. to protect his possession ..... The section is so framed as to impose a statutory bar on the transferor; it confers no active title on the transferee."

It must, therefore, be held that the provisions of S. 53A, T. P. Act, give no right to a transferee to come to Court as a pltf. either to maintain his possession or to recover possession, if dispossessed, after having been put in possession in pursuance of the contract. Mr. Sen has placed before us a case of the Allahabad High Court in Ram Chander v. Maharaj Kunwar, A. I. R. (26) 1939 ALL. 611. This case, no doubt, supports his contention. But with very great respect to their Lordships, I do not feel bound to accept their interpretation of the section specially in view of the construction put upon this section by the Privy Council Mr. Sen argues that it looks anomalous that a transferee who was put in possession cannot come to a Court of law as a pltf for declaration of his possession, or, in the alternative, for recovery of possession in pursuance of a contract between him & the transferor. I do not think there is any anomaly. A Court of law can only recognise or give effect to a title which is made perfect in law & if any of the legal formalities is wanting to make a title good in law that title is an imperfect title & the Court will not help a person who has an imperfect title in law. A transferee who is not clothed with title in the manner recognised by law, cannot be said to be a person having a valid title in law & therefore, Courts of law can not recognise such a title. If the transferee though not clothed with a perfect legal title has been put in possession or continued in possession, the Court on grounds of equity alone can refuse to enforce the rights of the transferor except so far as those rights are expressly mentioned in the contract in writing & the equitable right in favour of the transferee has been embodied in S. 53A. In that view of the matter the provisions of S. 53A cannot be brought to the aid of the pltfs.

[11] I would, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs.

[12] Das J —I agree with my learned brother on points (1) & (2), but would like to add a few observations.

[13] There is no doubt that the document which purported to create a lease in favour of the appellants in this case came under para. 1 of S. 107, Transfer of Property Act. It is equally clear that the document was not executed in the manner required by para 3 of the said section; therefore, it did not create nor constitute a valid lease. Now, the question is — can this document be so construed as to spell out the creation of a lease by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession of the kind mentioned in the second para. of S 107, T. P. Act ? In my opinion, the answer must be in the negative, & for those reasons. Firstly, the appellants never set up a case of a lease by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession, independent of the document, for which the document could be a piece of evidence. Secondly, I do not think that the document can be used so as to create by an indirect or back-door method what the statute says can be done in a particular way only. I emphasise the word only in para. 1 of S. 107, S.105 defines a lease, which is a transfer of the right to enjoy immovable properties, i. e., a right in rem; it must be made for "a certain time expressed or implied", which may be (1) less than a year, (2) more than a year. Section 9, T. P. Act, lays down that a transfer of property may be made without writing in every case in which a writing is not expressly required by law. Section 107, provides that a lease of immovable property from year to year or for any term exceeding one year or reserving yearly rent can be made only by registered instrument. The transfer of a right to enjoy immovable property in consideration of rent for a year or less than a year can be made without any writing. Thus. there are decisions which say that an oral lease, purporting to be for more than a year, accompanied by delivery of possession is good, at least for the first year. If after the first year, the lessor accepts rent from the lessee & assents to his continuing in possession, the lease by reason of S. 16, T. P. Act, is renewed from year to year or month to month according to the purpose for which the property is leased as specified in S. 106, T. P Act. (See Adi Nath v. Krishna Chandra, I. L. R. (1943) 1 Cal. 34; Anwarali Bepari v. Jamini Lal, A. I. R. (27) 1940 Cal. 89; Naim Sahib v. Tata Iron & Steel Co. Ltd. A. I. R. (28) 1941 Pat. 244; Aziz Ahmad v. Alauddin Ahmad A. I. R. (20) 1933 Pat. 485, confirmed in Letters Patent Appeal in Alauddin Ahmad v. Aziz Ahmed, A. I. R. (21) 1934 Pat. 369). But no decision has been brought to our notice, except, perhaps, a Lahore decision to which I shall presently refer, which has held that a registered document purporting to create a lease but not executed in the manner required by law can be construed so as to create a lease by oral agreement accompained by delivery of possession The Lahore decision (Mohan Lal v. Ganda Singh, A. I. R. (30) 1943 Lah. 127) related to a kabuliyat, which it was stated, was not a lease within the meaning of S. 107 & which did not require registration; this kabuliyat was looked at as evidence of an admission or acknowledgment of an oral agreement. The position in the case before us is quite different. No case of an oral agreement of lease having been pleaded, there is no question of looking at the document as evidence of such an agreement. I do not wish to make any observations regarding a hypothetical case where the lease is effected by an an oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession & there is also an unregistered instrument evidencing it. In such a case the question may arise if the existence of the unregistered instrument prevents the passing of title by delivery. If and when such a question arises, the answer may have to be given with reference to S. 49, Registration Act, 1908, after its amendment in 1929

[14] On the question of possession, it was argued that the position of the appellants was that of licensees & not trespassers. Assuming that contention to be correct, though I doubt its correctness, the appellants can be licensees only with regard to Bahira Dih. I do not understand how they can be licensees in respect of property which was in somebody else's possession.

[15] As to the provisions of S. 53A, T. P. Act, it is really unnecessary to express any final opinion on the distinction which has been made in some reported decisions between defending possession & recovering possession & the view (based on that distinction) that a transferee may come to Court to defend his possession against acts of aggression on the part of the transferor or his representative, though he cannot ask for recovery of possession for want of a perfect title. As the question does not arise in the view which I take on the other two points, I express no opinion on it.

[16] I agree that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Nilkantha Narayan Singh — Petitioner v. Commr. of Income-tax B & O—Oppo. Party.

Misc. Judicial Case No. 231 of 1949 and 49 of 1950 D/- 10-4-1951.

(a) Income tax Act (1922), S. 4 — Taxable nature of transaction—How to determine.

In the application of the law relating to income-tax the principle is well established that the name given to a transaction by the parties does not necessarily decide the nature of the transaction. It is the substance & not the form of the contract that would be regarded. In analysing the transaction, it is not necessary that the documents should be construed from the purely legal aspect. It is open to the High Court not merely to look at the documents but consider the surrounding circumstances so as to conclude what is the real character of the transaction. [Para 7]

(b) Income tax Act (1922), Ss. 4, 12 — Lease of right to receive royalties & rents from lessees of coalfields—Certain lump sum received as salami & nominal amount reserved as annual rent—Lump sum held taxable.

A, an assessee, who was entitled to receive Rs. 50,000 annually as royalties & rents from three leases of coalfields, executed three documents styled as 'Indentures of lease' in favour of B, conveying thereby his right to collect royalties & rents from the lessees of the coalfields. As consideration for the transfers A was to receive an immediate payment in a lump sum Rs. 1,00,000, Rs. 40,000 and Rs. 60,000 as salami & an annual rent of Rs. 10 Rs. 5 & Rs. 5 respectively. The terms of the leases were 11 years, 10 years & 15 years respectively & A's right to collect the royalties & rents was to receive after the expiry of these periods. The question was whether the lump sum of Rs. 2 lacs received by A as salami under these leases was taxable:

Held (1) that the transaction, though in form a sub-lease, was in substance an assignment by the assessee of his right to realise royalties & rents for a term of 10 to 15 years receiving as consideration for the contract a lump sum of Rs. 2 lacs, which was nothing but advance payment of royalty. [Para 10]

(2) that even though the amount was paid in a lump sum, it could be classed as taxable as there was no magic in the distinction between a lump sum & a periodical sum & the only material question in the case was what was the true nature of the sum. [Para 13]

(3) that the question whether a lump sum payment was a capital payment or income payment was a question of fact to be determined in the context of each particular case. [Para 17]

(4) that, in the circumstances of this case, the amount was taxable. (1948) 16 I. T. R. Sup. 57, (1935) 19 Tax Cas. 390 and (1927) 11 Tax Cas. 730, Relied on; Case law referred. [Para 20]

Ramaswami J.—These references are made by the Income tax Appellate Tribunal under S. 66, Income-tax Act.

[2] The assessee Raja Nilkantha Narain Singh of Nowagarh is proprietor of a big zamindari within the ambit of which coal fields are situated. The predecessor of the assessee had leased out the coal fields on long terms basis to three different parties. The average annual income of royalty & rents from these lessees was about Rs. 50, 000 a year. The accounting year is 1352 Bengal Sambat which ends with the corresponding English date of 14-4-1946. In the accounting year the assessee had executed three documents termed "indenture of lease" in favour of Bengal Discount Co. Ltd. conveying his right to collect royalties & rents from these three lessees. In lieu of this the assessee was paid an immediate amount of Rs. 1,00,000, Rs. 40,000 & Rs. 60,000 for the three "indenture of lease". The annual rent reserved was Rs. 10, Rs. 5 & Rs. 5. In the first case the term of the lease was 11 years, in second case 10 years & in third case 15 years. It was stipulated that after the expiry of the period the right of the assessee will be revived in each case & the assessee would be entitled to collect from the original lessees the amount of royalties & rent as before.

[3] The amount of Rs. 2,00,000 which the assessee received from the Bengal Discount Co. was taxed by the Income-tax officer assessable income. On appeal the Appellate Assistant Commissioner maintained the order of the Income-tax Officer. In second appeal the Appellate Tribunal held that the sum of Rs. 2,00,000 was advance receipt of royalty was therefore assessable to income-tax.

[4] Another question was also debated before Appellate Tribunal, viz, whether the sum of Rs. 84,000 in possession of the assessee on account of the encashment of high-denomination notes. On the same date the assessee encashed notes to the extent of Rs. 95,000. The Income-tax officer assessed the whole amount as the income of the assessee from undisclosed sources. On appeal the Appellate Assistant Commissioner was satisfied that notes to the extent of Rs. 11,000 were included in the amount of Rs. 2 lakhs which the Bengal Discount Co. had paid to the assessee. He therefore reduced the taxable amount to Rs. 84,000. It was argued before the appellate Tribunal that this amount too ought not to be taxed as it was saving of the assessee from the amount he had withdrawn for his personal expense. The Appellate Tribunal held that the explanation was not acceptable & the amount of Rs. 84,000 ought to be assessed to income tax.

[5] The following questions have been formulated by the Appellate Tribunal for the determination of the High Court.

"(1) Whether on the facts & in the circumstances of this case, the Tribunal was right in holding that the sum of Rs. 2 lakhs received from Bengal Discount Co. Ltd. was taxable income, & (2) whether there is any material to justify the assessment of Rs. 84,000 representing the value of high denomination notes which were encashed on 21-1-1946?"

[6] As regards the first question it was argued by the learned Advocate-General on behalf of the assessee that the documents executed in favour of the Bengal Discount Co., were "indentures of leases" in which the outright payment of Rs. 2 lakhs has been shown as salami & the annual rent reserved has been fixed at a small amount. Learned counsel maintained that salami was a capital receipt & was not liable to income-tax

18 Pat. 805 & contended that the premium or salami represented whole or part of the price for the lease executed in favour of the Bengal Discount Co. and so was a capital receipt & ought not to be taxed. Learned Counsel also referred to Shiva Pd. Singh v. Emperor, 4 Pat. 73 in which the question was whether a sum of money received by the assessee by way of salami or premium for granting a mining lease was taxable. It was held by Sir Dawson-Miller that the salami was the price for parting with the direct enjoyment of the property & was not taxable. But in my opinion the material facts of both the cases ought to be distinguished from those of the present case. In 4 Pat. 73 the lease was for a period of 999 years. The amount of salami was Rs. 3 lakhs & odd. In 18 Pat. 805 the settlement was made for an indefinite period & the salami was Rs. 1800 for 4½ bighas of land. Upon the interpretation of the transaction in each case, the High Court held that the salami represented the price for parting with the land & was not advance rent. In 18 Pat. 805 Manohar Lal J. indeed observed that it was impossible to lay down a hard & fast rule that salami can in no case be taxable, that the question would depend on the facts & circumstances of each case.

[7] In the present case, the problem is to determine what is the real nature of the transaction between the assessee & the Bengal Discount Company. It is true that the parties have described the contract as "indentures of leases", the lump sum payment of Rs. 2 lakhs as "salami" & the small annual payment of Rs. 10 or Rs. 15 as "rent". But in the application of the law relating to income-tax the principle is well established that the name given to a transaction by the parties does not necessarily decide the nature of the transaction. It is the substance & not the form of the contract that should be regarded. In analysing the transaction, it is not necessary that the documents should be construed from the purely legal aspect. It is open to the High Court not merely to look at the documents but consider the surrounding circumstances so as to conclude what is the real character of the transaction.

[8] The principle is stated by Lord Greene in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. 36/49 Holdings, Ltd., (1944), 25 Tax Cas 173 :

"The true nature of the sum is not necessarily its nature in law, but its nature in business or in accountancy which ever way one likes to put it, because from the legal point of view there may be no difference whatsoever as between the parties between a capital & an income sum. It may be totally irrelevant to the legal relationships into which they are proposing to enter. When, however, the tartius gaudens, in the shape of the Revenue, appears on the scene, that matter which as between the parties may have been a matter of not the slightest importance becomes immediately a matter of very great importance, & it is necessary to examine the circumstances of each individual case, including any documents which require to be construed, in order to ascertain what is the character to be attributed to the payment."

[9] The documents must therefore be examined in the light of this principle. Ext. D/1 is described as indenture of sub leases granted by the Raja in favour of the Bengal Discount Co., for a period of 11 years, Cls. 1 & 2 state that the premium of Rs. 1 lakh has been paid, that the rent of the land is fixed at Rs. 10 per year. Cl. 4 recites that by virtue of the deed the company will be entitled to realise all the royalties & commission payable by the lessee Rai Sahib Chandanmal Indrakumar by suit or amicably & the company will have the same right as the first party in respect thereof. Cl. 5 empowers the Bengal Discount Co. to realise the surface rent from Rai Sahib Chandanmal Indrakumar. But there is an exception that besides surface land required for colliery the Bengal Discount Co. will have absolutely no claim to the remaining surface land. Cl. 5 also states that the assessee was giving notice to Rai Sahib Chandanmal Indrakumar to pay royalty & commission to the Bengal Discount Co , for the period of the lease. The other documents, Exs. D/2 & D/3. are couched in similar terms. But in Ex. D/5 there is the important recital that the Raja was not able to pay income-tax & road cess & was in need of further money & on this account was giving the lease in respect of his right created by the registered patta dated 9-3-1900 from Messrs Nowagarh Properties limited.

[10] It is manifest that the transaction, though in form a sub-lease, was in substance an assignment by the Raja of his right to realise royalties & rents for a term of 10 to 15 years. As consideration for the contract the Raja received a lump sum of Rs. 2 lacks, which it is plain is nothing but advance payment of royalty. No other right except the right to collect royalty & rent from the original lessees is transferred by the assessee to the Bengal Discount Co. The assessee has not parted with any interest in the land but has merely assigned his contractual right.

[11] Reference may be made in this context to Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Thomas Nelson & sons (1940) 22 Tax Cas 175 in which the assessee company had lent a sum of money to an Indian company under an agreement which provided that interest was to be paid at 3 per cent. per annum & that on repayment of the principal sum or any part thereof there should also be paid a premium varying with the date of repayment. The premiums prescribed by the agreement for each of the ten years of the currency of the loan are set out in the agreement, the first of them is at the rate of 2 per cent., the second is at 4 per cent, in each of the next five years there is an increase of 2½ per cent. in arithmetical progression & for the last three years of the ten the rate of increase per annum is 3 per cent. The full amount of the loan was ultimately repaid to the assessee together with the accrued interest & the premiums payable under the agreement. The contention raised by the assessee was that the premiums were part of the principal sums repaid & were capital payments. The Lord President decided the question as a question posed on the particular terms of the contract. In his opinion the premiums were in the nature of annual profits or gains being part of the consideration given by the borrowers for the use of the capital lent to them, & part of the creditor's share of the profit which the borrower is presumed to make from the use of the money & he observed :

"It is not irrelevant to notice that the agreement provides for a payment by way of premium which may be made in each year of the currency of the loan, & that, taken along with the stipulated interest, the effect of this provision is to give the lender a return on their capital varying between 5 per cent. in the earlier years & something over 5½ per cent. in later years, a rate which can only be regarded as a reasonable return for the use of their capital & not as to any extent an accretion to it."

It was, however, pointed out that

"the fact that the borrowers would, under the contract, pay a premium only when they chose to make a capital payment does not necessarily have the effect of making the premium a capital payment, any more than the lenders' waiver of their right to exact payment of interest each year as the effect of converting the payment of arrears of interest into a capital payment."

[12] On behalf of the assessee the argument was addressed that income connoted a periodical monetary return, that in the present case the amount of Rs. 2 lacs being a lump sum payment cannot be classed as income. Reference was made to Income-tax Commissioner v. Shaw, Wallace & Co., 59 I. A. 206 in which at p. 212 Sir George Lowndes observed :

"The object of the Indian Act is to tax 'income', a term which it does not define. It is expanded, no doubt, into 'income, profits & gains', but the expansion is more a matter of words than of substance. Income, their Lordships think in this Act connotes a periodical monetary return, "coming in" with some sort of regularity, or expected regularity, from definite sources. The source is not necessarily one which is expected to be continuously productive, but it must be one whose object is the production of a definite return, excluding anything in the nature of a mere windfall. Thus income has been likened pictorially to the fruit of a tree, or the crop of a field. It is essentially the produce of something which is often loosely spoken of as 'capital'. But capital, though possibly the source in the case of income from securities is in most cases hardly more than an element in the process of production."

But this passage must be read in the context of the material facts of that case. The question before the Judicial Committee was not whether there was a periodical monetary return but whether the sums received by the respondent were taxable income under S. 6 (4), Income tax Act. It was held by the Judicial Committee that the fundamental idea of "business" as a source of taxable income under S. 6 (iv) was the continuous exercise of an activity that there must be a business "carried on" by the assessee & that the sums received by the respondents in the case were not the produce nor the result of carrying on the agencies of the oil companies in the year in which the sums were received & so the sums were not liable to be taxed. The authority of the definition given by Sir George Lowndes is shaken by the subsequent decision of the Judicial Committee in Kamakshya Narain Singh v Commissioner of Income-tax 22 Pat. 713 in which Lord Wright held that mine royalties were clearly income & not capital & were assessable to income-tax. At p. 723 Lord Wright criticised the definition of Sir George Lowndes in the Shaw Wallace case :

"It is not in their Lordships' opinion correct to regard as an essential element in any of these or like definitions a reference to the analogy of fruit or increase or sowing or reaping of periodical harvests. Lord Cairns (loc-cit) used these expressions because he was distinguishing mineral leases from capital leases. Sir George Lowndes (loc.cit) speaks of income' being likened pictorially to the fruit of a tree or the crop of a field. But it is clear that such picturesque similies cannot be used to limit the true character of income in general, & particularly when it is constituted by mining rent or royalties. These are periodical payments, to be made by the lessees under his covenants in consideration of the benefits which he is granted by the lessor".

At p. 724 Lord Wright states :

"There is therefore in their Lordships' judgment, no real justification for treating the royalties as capital payments. They think that they are 'income' within the meaning of the Act, whatever may be the exact definition of that word in the Act. Its applicability may in particular cases differ because the circumstances, though similar in some respects, may be different in others. Thus the profit realised on a sale of shares may be capital if the seller is an ordinary investor changing his securities, but in some instances at any rate it may be income if the seller of the shares is an investment or any insurance company. Income is not necessarily the recurrent return from a definite source, though it is generally of that character. Income again may consist of a series of separate receipts, as it generally does in the case of professional earnings. The multiplicity of forms which 'income' may assume is beyond enumeration".

[13] On behalf of the assessee, the argument was stressed that the payment of Rs. 2 lakhs was made to assessee in a lump sum & so the amount ought not to be classed as taxable income. But there is no magic in the distinction between a lump sum & a periodical sum & the only material question in the case is what is the true nature of the sum In Rust Proof Metal Window Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioner, (1948) 16 I. T. R. Sup. 57, a patentee entered into a contract conferring on a licensee the right to manufacture up to a stated number of articles in accordance with the patent on condition that the licensee paid a lump sum down & a royalty of so much per article. It was held by Lord Greens M. R. that the lump sum payment was an income, & not a capital receipt, & so was liable to excess profits tax & that the division of the price into separate elements did not by itself have the effect of turning the lump sum into a capital receipt.

[14] The observation of Lord Macmillan in Van den Berghs Ltd. v. Clark, (1935) 19 Tax Cas. 390, is apposite :

"Now what were the appellants giving up ? They gave up their whole rights under the agreements for 13 years ahead. These agreements are called in the stated case

"pooling agreements," but that is a very inadequate description of them, for they did much more than merely embody a system of pooling & sharing profits. If the appellants were merely receiving in one sum down the aggregate of profits which they would otherwise have received over a series of years, the lump sum might be regarded as of the same nature as the ingredients of which it was composed."

Again, in North Fleet Coal & Ballast Company's case, (1928) 12 Tax Cas. 1102 there was contract, subsisting for ten years for the sale of chalk & also for the building of wharf. It was agreed between the quarry company & the purchaser that in consideration of the payment of £900 yearly for the remaining four years of the term the purchaser should be relieved of his liability ; subsequently the company accepted a lump sum payment of £3000 in lieu of the annual payments. Rowlatt J., held that the payment of £3000 was chargeable to excess profits duty as a trading profit as it represented profits in a new form & it was tantamount to income.

[15] The case of Constantinesco v. Rex, (1927) 11 Tax Cas. 730, is materially in point. In that case an award of £70,000 was made by the Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors in respect of the user by the British Govt. during the war of certain gear invented by the assessee for enabling a bullet to be fired between the propeller of an aeroplane. It was held by the Commissioner of Income-tax that the lump sum payment was simply royalty for four years & that Income-tax should be deducted. The decision was affirmed by the House of Lords who agreed that in the circumstances of the case the lump sum payment did not constitute a capital sum but was royalty paid in respect of the user of the patent & was liable to be taxed. At p. 746 Viscount Cave states:

"The payment was made in respect of the use of the invention over a period of time. The claim put in was a claim as for royalty in respect of the successive uses of the invention. In the case of patented inventions it was the practice of the Commission, as appears from their Report which has been cited on behalf of the Appellant, to take as a basis of their award a fair royalty as between a willing licensor & a willing licensee, & I have little doubt that that basis was accepted in the present case, subject, no doubt, to certain deductions. Lastly, the patent itself, that is the corpus of the patent, was not taken away from the Appellant & his partner but still remains in them. In view of all the facts I am satisfied that the sum awarded is to be treated as profits or gains, & annual profits or gains, within the meaning of the Income-tax Act."

Viscount Dunedin was also emphatic :

"I think, on the real merits of the case, the case was scarcely arguable. This was a patent which remains this man's property. He, in the old days, got royalties for it, & those were the profits of his property. He had taken, by the Crown, the same license of user as private persons had before, & to say that the payments which the Crown make lose their character as income & suddenly become capital is, think, as all the Courts have understood the case, one of the most hopeless contentions I have ever heard urged at your Lordships' Bar."

[16] To the same effect is the decision in Mills v. Jones, (1929) 14 Tax Cas. 769, in which an award was made by the Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors in respect of the user, past, present & future, by the British Govt. (including user by way of selling for use, licensing or otherwise) of the Mills bomb. Over 75 millions of these bombs had been made during war & large stocks were still in existence. The Appellant, as patentee of certain improvements to this Bomb, received sums representing the major part of this award, & as charged to income-tax thereon. The General Commissioners, on appeal held that the sums received by the appellant were annual profits or gains chargeable to income-tax under Sch. D. The House of Lords held that the assessee was rightly charged to income-tax & that the principle of Constantinesco's case: (1927) 11 Tax Cas. 730, was applicable. At p. 786 Lord Buckmaster proceeded to base the decision on the finding of fact of the Commissioners that the amount of the future user included in the payment was negligible. Lord Dunedin agreed with Lord Buckmaster's opinion & significantly added. "I think the finding of fact is conclusive."

[17] My learned brother has referred to Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. British Salmson Aero Engines Ltd., (1938) 22 Tax Cas. 29, but, in my opinion, the ratio of that case is different. In that case the assessee by a certain agreement granted to the licensees an exclusive right for a period of ten years to construct, use & sell in a certain territory Salmson Aero Engines. The consideration for the license was that the licensees were to pay a fixed sum of £25,000 payable in three instalments &, in addition to these payments, & as royalty, a sum of £2500 & a like sum each twelve months during the following nine years. The Crown contended that all these payments were income & the assessee insisted, on the contrary, that all these payments were in the nature of capital receipts. The Special Commissioners decided that the fixed sum of £25000 was capital receipt & the payments of royalty of £2500 were assessable to income-tax. The decision of the Special Commissioners was affirmed by the Court of appeal. In pronouncing judgment Lord Greene, Master of Rolls, treated the question whether a lump sum payment was a capital payment or income payment as a question of fact to be determined in the context of each particular case.

"It seems to me that in the case of patents, as in the case of any other matters, the fundamental question remains in respect to any particular payment: is it capital or is it income? & that question has to be decided, as it has to be decided in reference to other subject matters, upon the particular facts of each case, including in those facts the contractual relationships between the parties. It has been said that the question is one of fact, & it is when one gets to the bottom of it, an accountancy question. In saying that it is a question of fact, one does not mean that, in deciding it, questions of law may not have to be discussed & decided. For example, the construction of a contract may be one of the elements which must be taken into consideration in deciding that question; there may be cases where the construction of the contract (sic) is of itself the really decisive matter in answering the question."

At page 48 Lord Greene again states:

"I do not propose to add anything by way of expression of my own views on the principles on which that question ought to be determined. It is a question which has been investigated very carefully in a number of different connections & different matters of fact have been regarded in different cases as of importance & of weight. It seems to me, on all the facts of this case, including the terms of the contract itself which is the important, & indeed, the essential fact in the case, that the Commissioners were perfectly entitled to come to the conclusion to which they did come, that this class of payment was not of an income nature but of a capital nature. I can find nothing in the facts of the case, or in the construction of the documents, which would justify me in saying that the Commissioners' conclusion is wrong in law; & in my judgment their conclusion is the right one."

Scott, L. J. in his concurring judgment emphasised that in so far as the Special Commissioners came to the conclusion that a particular payment had "the accountancy quality" of capital payment, that was a view which the Court of Appeal was entitled & ought to give great weight. At page 49 Scott, L. J. states:

"In my view, that kind of weight ought to be attached to the findings of the Commissioners in the present case. It is quite true that they put before us the whole of their material, & that that material, in substance, consists of agreement made between the licensees & the patentees, & nothing more. But they have taken the view, without hesitation evidently, that these lump sum payments were in the nature of capital payments. If there were any doubt from the purely legal point of view, which I do not think there is, that opinion of the Commissioners ought to weigh in the balance, & in my opinion. this is an additional reason for upholding their finding."

In my opinion this is the proper legal principle of this decision & only on such a principle can the decision be reconciled with Mills case & Constantinesco's case

[18] Reference should be made to Glasson v. Rongier, (1944) 26 Tax Cas 86 in which the assessee who was admittedly carrying on the vocation of authoress, had entered into three agreements with a publishing company in 1925, 1932, & 1935, respectively, whereby she granted limited publishing rights in respect of three books written by her in consideration of payments based on the number of copies sold. In 1940 these agreements were cancelled & the same limited publishing rights were transferred outright to the publishing company in consideration of a lump sum payment. On appeal against an assessment to income-tax it was contended that the lump sum payment was a capital receipt. Macnaghten J. rejected the contention, holding that the payment in question formed part of the annual profits & gains of the assessee, & was rightly taxed.

[19] My learned brother has referred to the fact that in Salmson Aero Engine's case, the decision of Lord Greene was also based on the circumstance that:

"in the agreement there was a fundamental difference in the nature of the two classes of sums, in this sense that the former class starts off by being a lump sum payment definite & fixed, which is then payable by instalments. The other class is not of that description; no lump sum payment is referred to; it is on the face of it, nothing but an undertaking to pay yearly sums as royalty."

But this passage must be read in the context of the whole judgment & the decision of Lord Greene in a subsequent case shows that the circumstance is by no means decisive of the matter. In Rustproof Metal Window Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, (referred to supra) a patentee had entered into a contract conferring on a licensee the right to manufacture up to a stated number of articles in accordance with the patent on condition that the licensee paid a lump sum down & a royalty of so much per article. Even so Lord Greene held that the lump sum payment was an income & not a capital receipt & so was liable to excess profits tax & that the division of the price into separate elements did not by itself have the effect of turning the lump sum into a capital receipt. At page 66 Lord Greene states:

"The only considerations on the other side, once the company's arguments above discussed are rejected, are that the parties themselves call the £3000 a capital payment & the agreement separates the £3000 from the payments which are described as royalties. I cannot attach to these considerations sufficient importance to outweigh those on the other side. The fact that parties call the £3000 a capital sum cannot make it a capital sum if it is not. The word capital is a mere lable attached to the £3000 with an eye, no doubt, to tax considerations. The fact that the agreement separates the £3000 from the royalties is nothing more than a drafting necessity having regard to the fact that the latter are based on the actual number of boxes treated with the process, while the former is paid for the right to apply the process to any number of boxes up to Rs. 75,000. If a patentee negotiating with an intending licensee who wishes to obtain the right to manufacture up to a stated number of articles in accordance with the patent states his terms to be a lump sum down & a royalty of so much per article I can see no reason why the more division of the price into those separate elements should by itself necessarily produce the result that the sum down must be regarded for tax purposes as a capital receipt."

[19a] It was urged on behalf of the assessee that if the premium in this case is held to be an income receipt it ought to follow as a logical result that the price for an outright sale of the royalties should be classed as income & not as a capital receipt, that such a conclusion was opposed to common sense. But it is not the business of the Court to demarcate the boundary between two categories in a mathematical sense. The indication of the boundary need only be sufficiently distinct for the immediate problem in hand. In this connection reference should be made to Hobbs v. L. & S. W. Railway, (1875) 10 Q. B. 111, in which Lord Blackburn observed of the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale:

"It is a vague rule, & as Bramwell B. said, it is something like having to draw a line between night and day; there is a great duration of twilight when it is neither night or day; but on the question now before the Court, though you cannot draw the precise line, you can say on which side of the line the case is."

[20] For the reasons given I am definitely of opinion that the amount of Rs. 2 lakhs which was paid by the Bengal Discount Co. to the assessee in consideration of the so-called indentures of lease was a taxable income.

[21] This question must therefore be answered against assessee.

[22] As regards the second question it was argued for the assessee that there was no material upon which the Income-tax Officer could regard the amount of Rs. 84,000 as income from undisclosed source. Mr. Dutt pointed out that three reasons were given by the Appellate Tribunal in support of the inference that the sum of Rs. 84,000 was taxable. In the first place, it was stated that the assessee did not produce any Home Chest Account though it was his case that the high denomination notes were savings from his personal allowance. In the next place, it was pointed out that the assessee could not save any money since in the indenture of lease, Ex. D-3, there is a recital that the assessee was in need of money to pay the income-tax & road-cess for the properties. Lastly, it was observed by the Tribunal that the assessee was not in a position to say wherefrom the notes of the value of Rs. 10,000, each were obtained & his failure to do so led to the conclusion that he was unwilling to disclose the source. On behalf of the assessee it was argued that no Home Chest Account was maintained by the assessee & the Tribunal had no warrant for drawing an adverse inference. In my opinion the contention of the assessee is correct. There was no material before the Tribunal to suggest that a Home Chest Account was maintained & the Appellate Tribunal ought not to have drawn an adverse inference because no such account was produced. As regards the recital in Ex. D 3, learned counsel for the assessee stated that the accounts of the amounts withdrawn by the Raja for seven years were produced before the Tribunal, that the accounts showed that the Raja had a balance of Rs. 1,84,000. These account books were accepted by the Tribunal as genuine & there was hence no material upon which the Tribunal could reach the inference that the high denomination notes were not the saving of the Raja out of his personal allowance which he had drawn. It appears that the amount of Rs. 84,000 consisted of three notes to the value of Rs. 10,000 each & the rest of Rs. 1,000 each. The Income tax Officer had asked the Raja to show any lump sum payment of above Rs. 10,000. The Raja actually showed three such receipts, the first dated 15-3-1943 for Rs 25,565, the second dated 10-2-1945 for Rs. 45,000 & the third dated 24-9-1945 for Rs. 29,534. The Tribunal remarked that there was no evidence that there was a Rs. 10,000 note in any of these receipts & that the Raja & his employees had not disclosed from whom the notes of the value of Rs. 10,000 each were obtained. In my opinion, there is no onus thrown upon the Raja to indicate from whom each note to the value of Rs. 10,000 was received, & no adverse inference ought to have been drawn by the Tribunal against the assessee.

[23] In this context reference should be made to Income-tax Commissioner, Bombay Presidency & Aden v. Bombay Trust Corporation Ltd., 63 I. A 409 in which B, a company registered & carring on business in British India, was assessed to income-tax in respect of the year of assessment 1928-29 as agent of H, a company registered & carrying on business outside India. On a reference to the High Court it was held that there was no evidence that in 1927 H received from B, any sums as interest on money lent, and that H, was not therefore in receipt of the profits or gains taxable under S. 42, sub-s. 1, & S. 43, Income-tax Act. At p. 418 the report states:

"In their Lordships' opinion the High Court at Bombay have rightly answered in the negative the question referred to them. However sceptical the attitude which the income-tax authorities may think fit to adopt towards the declarations offered & the entries made in the Bombay company's books, it is necessary, if the assessment made is to be supported, that there shall be some evidence to show that in 1927 the loan from the Hong Kong company continued, & that interest "accrued or arose" to that company thereon. If the entries in the books show no payment to the Hong Kong company and nothing due to the Hong Kong company, the income-tax authorities cannot, without evidence, insist upon a right to treat entries showing a tael loan of six & a half-crores made by a Shanghai company & interest calculated in taels paid thereon, as evidence that a somewhat similar amount was due from & was being paid by the Bombay company to the Hong Kong company."

[24] In the result I hold that there is no material to justify the assessment of Rs. 84,000 representing the value of high denomination notes which the assessee encashed on 24-1-1946. This question must accordingly be answered in favour of the assessee.

[25] As the assessee has succeeded in part I do not propose to make any order as to costs of the hearing.

[26] Sarjoo Prasad J. — I agree with my learned brother in the answer proposed by him to the second question under reference, namely, that there was no material to justify the assessment of Rs. 84,000 representing the value of high denomination notes which were encashed on 21-1-1946. But as I am going to indicate, I have felt considerable difficulty & hesitation in according my assent to the answer given by him to the first question under reference, namely, whether on the facts & in the circumstances of the case the Tribunal was right in holding that the sum of Rupees two lakhs received from Bengal Discount Company Limited was a taxable income.

[27] The sum of Rs. 84,000 had been assessed by the Revenue Officer as the assessee's income from undisclosed sources. The findings of the Tribunal on that point are not adequate to lead to an inference that the said sum represented some secret profits of the assessee & was, therefore, taxable as income from undisclosed sources. The assessee had submitted his accounts from which it appeared that the assessee had, during the last seven years from 1346 to 1352 B. S., drawn from his serishta various sums of money representing the income from his estate & had from time to time given back to the serishta according to his requirement certain sums of money, & the difference between the two sums represented a balance of Rs. 1,82,000 & odd which amount would be more than sufficient to cover & explain the sum of Rs. 84,000 representing the value of the high denomination notes. These figures have not been contested by the Department, and in fact they have been accepted by the Revenue-authorities. The case of the Department, however, is that this amount must have been spent by the assessee in view of the fact that he entered into the transactions with Bengal Discount Company for the purpose of raising money to satisfy his needs. If the view of the Department is correct, then the money must have been spent before 21-4-1945, when the assessee first entered into transaction with the aforesaid Company & the income aforesaid must have been received by the assessee between this 21-4-1945 & 21-1-1946, when the high denomination notes appear to have been cashed. Now the various sources of the assessee's income are all stated in the accounts, & if the accounts are held to be genuine, as they have been held to be genuine, I do not see how it can be inferred that this money came from any different source during the period in question. The Revenue-authorities appear to have presumed that there was some homechest account kept by the assessee which the latter has failed to produce, & therefore, the presumption must be raised against him. In my opinion, there is no legal foundation for such a presumption as there is no basis for assuming that there was a homechest account maintained by the assessee. My learned brother has elaborately gone into this question, & it would not serve any useful purpose for me to repeat the reasons given by him for coming to the conclusion that there was no justification for the assessment of the said Rs. 84,000.

[28] The difficulty, however, arises when dealing with the first question whether the Revenue authorities were justified in assessing the sum of rupees two lakhs received by the assessee from the Bengal Discount Company. This amount represented the salamis received by the assessee on account of three different leases executed by the former in favour of the said Company. The documents are described as indentures of leases & the lump sum payment of rupees two lakhs has been specifically mentioned as salami, while there are small annual payments of Rs 10 or Rs. 15 mentioned in the documents by way of rent. The documents also indicate that they are to operate for the periods of 11, 10 & 15 years respectively. The subject-matter of the lease as mentioned in the documents is a certain area of land being about 323 acres or 544 bighas. The documents proceed to recite that by virtue of the lease in question the lessee will be entitled to realise all the royalties & commissions payable to the lessor by one Rai Sahib Chandanmal Indrakumar who had already taken settlement of the mining rights in the lands from the lessor. The lessee was also given the right to realise rent on account of certain surface rights from the said Rai Sahib, but he had no right whatsoever to the remaining surface lands. The lessee was further placed in the same position as the lessor in regard to the right to realise rents, royalties & commissions from Rai Sahib Chandanmal during the operation of the lease. The document further provided that if during the said period the lessee auction-purchased for arrears of royalties & commissions the interest of Rai Sahib Chandanmal Indrakumar in the lands, then after the expiry of the lease the purchaser lessee would have to pay the rents & royalties as payable by Rai Sahib Chandanmal himself to the lessor. These, in short, are the material terms of the document. It would prima facie appear on the face of the recitals that this lump sum payable under the various leases was payable as salami & was sought to be a distinct payment from the annual payments mentioned therein. There was thus a fundamental difference in the nature of the two classes of sums payable under the leases in question. The former starts off with a lump sum payment, definite & fixed; the other class is not of that description. The latter class is indisputably nothing but an undertaking to pay yearly sums as royalty. The parties were thus creating an obligation as between themselves which they chose to describe as rent payable each year in respect of the fixed rate but as salami in regard to the lump sum payment.

[29] It has been held in various cases of this Court that salami is really in the nature of a premium paid for granting a lease; in other words, it was the purchase price of a lease-hold interest; but so far as annual rent or royalty is concerned, it being an annual increment to the income, it was taxable as such. Normally, therefore, salami would be regarded as a capital receipt unless the Revenue-authorities showed that there was something in the circumstances of the case to indicate that it was not a capital receipt but a payment made in lieu of the periodical income or a payment in advance of rent or royalty; see, for instance, Shiva Prasad v. Emperor, 4 Pat. 73 and Commissioner of Income-tax v. Visheshwar Singh, 18 Pat. 805. There is thus a vital difference between a single payment made at the time of the settlement and recurring payments made during the period of the enjoyment of the property. The parties have themselves chosen to clothe the transaction in that form & the question is whether the presence of tertius gudens in the shape of the Revenue, on the scene would make any material difference to the real nature of the transaction.

[30] It has been urged on behalf of the Department that the Court in construing a document must look to the substance of the transaction; in other words, the Court must tear off the veil & look in the face of the transaction itself. It is pointed out that the substance of the transaction in the present case is more or less this: that a lump sum of royalty is being paid in advance to the assessee for the period of the lease, & the document does not really transfer any right in the corpus of the property itself but merely a right to realise royalty. Speaking for myself, I do not see why the document cannot be regarded as a transfer of interest in immoveable property itself. It is true that the lessor had at the time only the right to receive the royalty from Rai Sahib Chandanmal but at the same time continued to be the owner of the lands in question, and he purported to transfer a parcel of this right as owner in favour of the lessee which for the time being was demonstrated by his right to realise rents & royalties. Then again the premium or salami paid cannot be assumed necessarily to be a lump sum payment of the royalty in advance. In that case every premium can be treated as a consolidated amount of the rental paid in advance. It goes without saying that premium or price is always fixed after taking into consideration the amount of annual rent which the lessee is to pay to the lessor, & this ratio of the premium to the annual rent varies almost in each case in the inverse proportion. It is true that the lessee here gets the right to collect the royalty during this period, but then the position is that for the period of the lease the lessor cannot enforce this right as against Rai Sahib Chandanmal, & it is on account of parting with this right that the lessor-assessee has received the consideration of the premium in question. Besides, the royalty actually realisable by the lessee from Rai Sahib Chandanmal from year to year is a variable & an unknown quantity (though, of course, the minimum royalty may be indicated). Therefore, there is nothing to connect the premium paid with the proportion of the royalty realisable by the lessee himself after the leases began to operate. For all these reasons I was inclined to think that this salami was not an advance payment of the annual rent or royalty for the period of the lease; although it must be conceded that the period during which the lease is to be operative varies from 10 to 15 years only, & the annual rental payable is a very small amount.

[31] I do not find it easy to distinguish the present case from the ratio decidendi in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. British Salmson Aero Engines Ltd., (1938) 22 Tax. Cas. 29. In that case the assessee by a certain agreement granted to the licensees an exclusive right for a period of ten years to construct, use & sell in a certain territory Salmson Aero Engines. The consideration for the license was that the licensees were to pay a fixed sum of Rs. £25,000 payable in three instalments &, in addition to these payments, & as royalty, a sum of £2,500 & a like sum each twelve months during the following nine years. The Crown contended that all these payments were income & the assessee insisted, on the contrary, that all these payments were in the nature of capital receipts. The Master of the Rolls in coming to his decision referred to two important circumstances;

"The first thing to notice about it is that it is not merely an agreement under which the English Company receives the right to use a patent: Under this agreement the English Company is entitled to restrain the patentees themselves from exercising the patent in the territory, & it is entitled to call upon the patentees to take steps to prevent others exercising the invention within the territory. Now these rights are to my mind different from the mere right of user."

In the present case even if we regard the leases not as constituting any transfer of interest in immoveable property but as mere license for a certain number of years to collect the rent & royalty, the assessee has certainly parted with his right to make such collection during the period in favour of the licensee who alone could sue for the rent & royalties in question. The other circumstance to which the Master of the Rolls refers is that in the agreement there was a "fundamental difference in the nature of the two classes of sums, in this sense, that the former class starts off by being a lump sum payment, definite & fixed, which is then payable by instalments. The other class if not of that description, no lump sum payment is referred to; it is, on the face of it, nothing but an undertaking to pay yearly sums as royalty."

It was accordingly held in the case that the lump sum payment of £25,000 was as capital receipt not liable to assessment but that the further payments of £2,500 were royalties & taxable as income of the assessee. It is true that the case was a decision on its own facts but the facts are very significant. The contract was not a lease but a mere license & the period for which it was to operate was only a period of ten years, yet the decision about the lump sum payment was to treat it as a capital payment & not income. This decision has been very strongly relied upon by Manohar Lall J. in 18 Pat. 805, referred to above.

[32] The term 'income' has nowhere been defined in the Income-tax Act any more than the case of Shaw Wallace & Co. 59 I. A. 206 : 59 Cal. 1843 the Judicial Committee attempted to describe the term 'income' in the following manner :

"The object of the Indian Act is to tax 'income' a term which it does not define. It is expanded, no doubt, into 'income, profits & gains' but the expansion is more a matter of words than of substance. 'Income', their Lordships think, in this Act connotes a periodical monetary return 'coming in' with some sort of regularity, or expected regularity, from definite sources. The source is not necessarily one which is expected to be continously productive but it must be one whose object is the production of a definite return, excluding anything in the nature of a mere windfall. Thus, income has been likened pictorially to the fruit of a tree or the crop of a field. It is essentially the produce of something which is often loosely spoken of as "capital." But capital, though possibly the source in the case of income from securities, is in most cases hardly more than an element in the process of production."

[33] This definition or description of income appears to have been substantially adopted by Lord Russell who further amplified it in the case of Gopal Saran Narain Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O. 62 I. A. 207. Again in Kamakshya Narain Singh's case, 22 Pat. 713 Lord Wright in adverting to the earlier judgments observed :

"It is not in their Lordships' opinion correct to regard as an essential element in any of these or like definitions a reference to the analogy to the fruit, or increase, or sowing or reaping or periodical harvests.... Sir George Lowndes speaks of income being likened pictorially to the fruit of a tree or the crop of a field. But it is clear that such picturesque similies cannot be used to limit the true character or income in general ..... Income is not necessarily the recurrent return from a definite source, though it is generally of that character. Income again may consist of a series of separate receipts as it generally does in the case of professional earnings. The multiplicity of forms which income may assume is beyond enumeration."

This broader connotation of the word 'income' makes it all the more difficult and elusive and it is not easy to specify and define its various characteristics.

[34] There has, therefore, often been considerable embarrassment in drawing a line between what is capital receipt and what is revenue receipt or 'Income.' It was this embarrassment which tempted an eminent Judge to observe that in some cases the matter is so dangerously close to the border-line that it has to be decided, as it were, by the spin of the coin. The cases relied upon on behalf of the Taxing Department are all cases where the lump sum payment specifically carried the attribute of the periodical payment as income & was definitely identifiable as such. It is true that the Income-tax Act is not cast on logical lines and in some cases the line has to be drawn with an arbitrary firmness. This case appears to me to be very much on the border-line, if not, as I tried to show, on the right side of it. My learned brother is very definitely of the opinion that "the amount of Rupees Two lakhs which was paid by the Bengal Discount Company to the assessee in consideration of the so called indentures of lease was a taxable income."

His decision is in conformity with the decision of the revenue authorities & I do not propose to disturb the status quo unless the circumstances of the case were absolutely compelling & pointed definitely in a contrary direction. I have, therefore, persuaded myself eventually to adopt the answer proposed by my learned brother to the first question as well. The question whether a certain amount is capital receipt or income has always to be decided on the facts & circumstances of each case, & no hard & fast rule can be laid down for the purpose.

No universal meaning can be given to the meaning of the phrase "definite information" inasmuch as the application of S. 34 must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case. It is not, however, necessary that the "definite information should relate to a pure question of fact. Even definite information with respect to the state of the law will bring the section into operation. The section cannot be invoked merely because the income-tax Officer changed his mind about the interpretation of the law but the section will doubtless operate if the Income Tax Officer is informed that a case has been overruled or that a statute or a regulation had been passed which has not been brought to his attention before. The word "discovery" which occurs in S. 34 must be construed to mean no more than "finds out" or "has reason to believe" or "satisfies himself". The assessee a limited company carrying on business in Chotanagpur, a partially excluded area, was assessed to income-tax for the year 1939-40 under the Indian Finance Act 1939 though it was not in force in that area. The assessment was set aside by the Appellate Tribunal and also by the High Court upon a reference to it. In the meanwhile Bihar Regulation 4 of 1942 had come into force on 7-7-1942 with retrospective effect from 30-3-1939 as a result of which the Finance Act 1939 was brought into force in Chotanagpur. The Income-tax officer then cancelled the previous notice under S. 34 and issued a fresh notice under S. 22 (2) read with S. 34 on 12-2-1944 on the strength of Reg. 4 of 1942.

'Held' that the circumstance that the Income-tax Officer came to know that Regulation IV of 1942 had been promulgated constituted "definite information", in consequence of which the income-tax officer discovered that the income which was chargeable in 1939-40 had escaped assessment. The previous proceedings for assessment were invalid and non-existent and therefore the second notice under S. 34 issued on 12-2-1944 was valid. A I R (29) 1942 All 295, Rel. on. RAMASWAMI, J.: This reference is made by the Income-tax Appellate Tribunal under S. 66 (1), Income-tax Act.

(2) The assessee Chaturam Horilram Limited of Kodarma is a private limited company which is composed of two Hindu undivided families of which Chaturam & Darshanram are the kartas. The assessee carried on the business of exporting mica for sale to foreign countries. On 22-12-1939 the Income-tax officer made assessment for the year 1939-40 & determined the total income to be Rs. 1,09,200. In appeal the Appellate Tribunal set aside the assessment on the ground that the Indian Finance Act of 1939 was not in force in Chotanagpur which was a partially excluded area. At the instance of the Commissioner of the Income-Tax reference was made to the High Court on the following question:

"whether levy of income-tax should be made on the assessee for the year 1939-40 in the absence of a notification under S. 92 (1), Govt. of India Act, by the Governor extending the Finance Act of 1939 to the excluded area?"

On 30-9-1943, the High Court answered the question in the negative.

(3) After the decision of the Appellate Tribunal but before the date of the judgment of the High Court the Governor of Bihar enacted Bihar Regulation IV of 1942 to which the Governor-General gave assent on 30-6-1942. The notification was published in the Bihar Gazette on 7-7-1942. As a result, the Indian Finance Act of 1939 was brought into force in Chotanagpur Division & the Santal Parganas District with retrospective effect from 30-3-1939.

(4) On 8-7-1941 the Income-tax Officer had issued notice to the assessee under S .34, Income Tax Act. At the instance of the assessee the proceedings were stayed for some time but on 8-2-1944 the Income-tax officer made the following order:

"Due to recent judgment of the High Court the assessment under S. 23 (3) stands cancelled & with it the notice under S. 34 issued in this case becomes ineffective & is withdrawn. Assessee derives income from mica mining & dealing, money-lending, mining rents & non-agricultural sources of zamindary, & this has escaped assessment in its entirety. Issue notice under S. 22 (2) read with S. 34 again to file a return of income in the prescribed form & within the prescribed time, & inform the assessee that the original notice under S. 34 has been cancelled."

A fresh notice under S. 34 was issued on 12-2-1944 after which the income of the assessee was determined to be Rs. 4,86,351. On appeal the Assistant Commissioner reduced the amount by Rs. 11,187. The assessee preferred an appeal to the Income-tax Appellate Tribunal who held that the notice under S. 34 was validly issued. It was also before the Tribunal that the cash credits amounting to Rs. 4,04,618 in the books were satisfactory explained. The Tribunal held that the assessee had failed to discharge the onus which lay upon him to explain the cash credits & that the Income-tax Officer had rightly held that the cash credits were secret profits of the assessee.

(5) At the instance of the assessee the Appellate Tribunal has propounded the following question of law for being determined by the High Court:

"Whether in the circumstances of the case, the notice issued on 12-2-1944 under S. 34, Income-tax Act, was validly issued for the assessment of the year 1939-40?"

(6) On behalf of the assessee Mr. Baldeva Sahay stressed the argument that the notice issued under S. 34 was illegal since the Income tax officer had no "definite information", and since there was no "discovery" that income chargeable to income-tax had escaped assessment. Learned Counsel, therefore, maintained that the conditions precedent for the issue of the notice were not existent & the assessment made under S. 34 was illegal. In my opinion this argument is wholly untenable. From the statement of the case it is plain that on 8-2-1944 the Income-tax Officer cancelled the original notice which had been issued under S. 34 on 8-7-1941. Instead the Income-tax Officer issued a fresh notice under S. 22 (2) read with S. 34 requiring the assessee to file return of income. It is true that in the order dated 8-2-1944 the Income-tax officer did not mention in so many words that Regulation IV had not been promulgated. But as observed in the judgment of the Appellate Tribunal there can hardly be any doubt that the fresh notice dated 12-2-1944 was issued on the strength of Regulation IV of 1942. The circumstances that the Income-tax Officer came to know that Regulation IV of 1942 had been promulgated constitutes in my opinion "definite information", in consequence of which the Income-tax officer discovered that the income which was chargeable in 1939-40 had escaped assessment. No universal meaning can be given to the meaning of the phrase "definite information" for it is obvious that the application of S. 34 must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case. It is not however, necessary that the "definite information" should relate to a pure question of fact. Even definite information with respect to the state of the law will bring the section into operation. The section cannot be invoked merely because the Income-tax Officer changed his mind about the interpretation of the law but the section will doubtless operate if the Income-tax Officer is informed that a case has been overruled or that a statute or a regulation had been passed which has not been brought to his attention before. Upon the admitted facts of the present case it is manifest that the Income-tax officer had definite information with respect to the promulgation of Bihar Regulation IV of 1942 & as a result of this denfiite information the Income-tax officer made discovery that income had escaped assessment. The word "discovery" which occurs in S. 34 must in my opinion be construed to mean no more than "finds out" or "has reason to believe" or "satisfies himself". This view is supported by 'Williams v. Trustees of W. W. Grundu', (1934) 1 K B 524, in which case the discovery was that an interest supposed to be vested was in fact contingent, that is to say, it was as to a pure point of law. Finlay J. held "discovers" means only "has reason to believe" or " finds out" & he followed the same view in a later case 'British Sugar Manufacturer Ltd. v. Harris', (1938) 2 K B 220. In a Scotch case, 'Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Mackinlay Trustees', (1938) 22 Tax Cas 305, the Judges adopted the same view as that taken by Finlay J. holding that "discovery" might include a mere discovery of the state of law, & that it was not necessary that any new fact should be discovered. On behalf of the assessee Sahay J. contended that the assessee had made a due return of his income in 1939-40 & such income cannot be said to have escaped assessment within the meaning of S. 34 of the Act. Learned Counsel referred to 'Rajendranath Mukherjee v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal', (1934) 2 I T R 71 (P C), in which the question was whether the Income-tax Officer could proceed under S. 23 (1) or that he should have proceeded under S. 34, Income-tax Act. It appears that in April 1927, notice was issued to Burn & Co. calling for a return of their income for the year 1926-27 & a return was duly made in 1928. Meanwhile the income-tax authorities thought that Martin & Co. had purchased Burn & Co. & made an assessment on Martin & Co. in respect of the joint income to Burn & Co. & Martin & Co. Martin & Co. appealed & the High Court ultimately held on 16-5-1930, that the two companies should have been separately assessed. The assessment of Martin & Co. was accordingly amended by eliminating the income of Burn & Co. & the Income-tax officer assessed Burn & Co. on 8-11-1930 on their income as returned in 1928. It was held by the Judicial Committee that the assessment made under S. 23 (1) on Burn & Co. on 8-11-1930 was a legal assessment. Lord Macmillan who pronounced the opinion of the Judicial Committee observed that the income of Burn & Co. did not "escape assessment" within the meaning of S. 34, Income-tax Act, that income which has been duly returned for assessment cannot be said to have escaped assessment within S. 34 though it has not been taxed within the assessment year. At p. 77 he observed:

"The fact that S. 34 requires a notice to be served calling for a return of income which has escaped assessment strongly suggests that income which has already been duly returned for assessment cannot be said to have 'escaped' assessment within the statutory meaning. Their Lordships find themselves in agreement with the view expressed in 'Lachhiram Basantlal v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal', by the learned Chief Justice (Bankin) at p. 118: 'income has not escaped assessment if there are pending at the time proceedings for the assessment of the assessees' income which have not yet terminated in a final assessment thereof'. It may be that if no notice calling for a return under S. 22 is issued within the tax year then section 34 provides the only means available to the Crown of remedying the omission, but that is a different matter."

(7) It is patent that the Judicial Committee proceeded on the assumption that the assessment of Burn & Co. was pending all along & there was no necessity to issue notice under S. 34. The facts of the present case are widely different. There was no valid notice served under S. 23 (2) & there was no valid proceeding under S. 34 before the Bihar Regulation IV of 1942 was enacted. As the Indian Finance Act of 1939 had not been extended to Chotanagpore, all proceedings initiated by the Income-tax officer before 30-6-1942 were illegal & the ratio of the Privy Council case will not therefore be applicable.

(8) Mr. Baldeva Sahay learned counsel for the assessee further pointed out that on 22-12-1939 the Income-tax officer assessed total income to be Rs. 1,09,200 but on 29-3-1944 after the notice under S. 34 was served the Income-tax Officer determined the total income of the assessee to be Rs. 4,86,351. The contention was raised on behalf of the assessee that it was not open to the Income-tax officer to go on making fresh computation & issuing fresh notice of demand. In support of his argument reference was made to 'Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay Presidency and Aden v. Khemchand Ramdas', (1938) 6 I T R 414 (PC), in which on 17-1-1927, the assessees who were registered as a firm were assessed under S. 23 (4) of an income of Rs. 1,25,000 at the maximum rate. Being a registered firm no super tax was levied. A notice of demand was also made before March 1927. On 13-2-1928, the Commissioner, in exercise of his power under S. 33, cancelled the order registering the assessees as a firm & directed the Income-tax officer to take necessary action. On 4-5-1929, the Income tax officer assessed the firm to super tax. Upon these facts it was held by the Judicial Committee that the assessment made on 17-1-1927, was final and conclusive, that fresh action taken by the Income-tax Officer on 4-5-1929, was hopelessly out of time; that the order of 4-5-1929, was therefore one which the Income-tax Officer had no power to make. The Judicial Committee held that it was a debatable question whether the circumstances in the case were such as to bring it within the provisions of S. 34; but the case clearly would have fallen within the provisions of S. 35 had the Income tax officer exercised his power under section within one year from the date on which earlier demand was served upon the respondents. The facts of the present case are manifestly different for the assessment made by the Income tax officer was illegal since the Indian Finance Act of 1939 was not in force in Chotanagpore on the material date & the principle of the Privy Council case cannot therefore be applied. On behalf of the Commissioner of the Income Tax Mr. Dutta relied upon 'Bishwanath Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax', (1942) 10 I T R 322 (All), in which the facts are almost parallel to those of the present case. The assessee, the late Maharaja of Benares, was a non-resident & he was assessed to income-tax for the assessment year 1936-37 without appointing an agent under S. 43 of the Act. The High Court, therefore, set aside the assessment on 14-2-1938. Nine days later the Income-tax officer made an order appointing an agent of the Maharaja & notice under S. 34 read with S. 22 was served upon the agent. Return was subsequently filed by the agent & he was assessed to income-tax. The assessee contended that the income had not escaped assessment within the meaning of S. 34 of the Act & therefore the notice issued on the agent on 23-2-1938 was not valid. Upon these facts it was held that the former notice issued to the Maharaja was not a notice within the meaning of S. 22 (2) & the assessment proceedings were illegal & were void from start to finish. Consequently the income had escaped assessment within the meaning of S. 34 of the Act & the notice dated 23-2-1938 issued on the agent was legally valid. In the present case too the assessment made by the Income-tax Officer on 22-12-1939 was illegal & void since the Indian Finance Act 1939 was not operative in Chotanagpore on that date. The proceedings under S. 34 initiated by the Income-tax Officer on 8-7-1941 were wholly without jurisdiction for the same reason. In the eye of law the assessment proceedings (previous to 7-7-1942) were non-existent. In my opinion, the second notice under S. 34 of the Act dated 8-2-1944 was therefore validly issued for assessment of the year 1939-40.

(9) On behalf of the assessee Mr. Baldeva Sahay contended that there was no evidence on which the Tribunal could have held that the cash credits were secret profits of the assessee. But this question has not been formulated by the Appellate Tribunal; no statement of the case has been made thereon. It is therefore not open for the High Court to examine this question in this case. It is of importance to state that the jurisdiction with which the High Court is invested under the Income-tax Act is of an exceptional nature and in hearing the reference the High Court has seisin only of such question of law as has been duly raised before the Appellate tribunal & upon which there is statement of the case. The view that I have expressed of S. 66 finds support from 'Anglo French Textile Co.. Ltd. v. Income Tax Appellate Tribunal', (1950) 18 ITR 234 (Mad), in which an assessee applied to the Income-tax Appellate Tribunal under S. 66 (1), Indian Income-tax Act, to refer certain questions to the High Court. The Tribunal referred only some of them & refused to refer the others on the ground that they did not arise. The assessee thereupon filed an application in the Original Side of the High Court under S. 45, Specific Relief Act, for a writ of mandamus requiring the Tribunal to refer the other questions. The application was rejected by the High Court & it was held that no mandamus could be issued for the reasons that S. 66 was self-contained & did provide for the contingency when the statement of the case was incomplete as well as when no reference had been made at all. The principle finds support in the following observation of Lord Macmillan when delivering judgment of the Board in 'Commissioner of Income Tax Bihar & Orissa v. Maharajadhiraja of Darbhanga', 60 I A 146 at p. 160:

"The Commissioner unfortunately omitted to formulate any question of law arising out of this transaction. The duty of the High Court under S. 66, Sub-s. 5 is to decide the question of law raised by the case referred to them by the Commissioner & it is for the Commissioner to state formally the questions which arise. Here the High Court itself formulated the questions to be decided. Their Lordships deprecate this departure from regular proceedings, but in the circumstances have not thought it proper to decline to express their view on the question thus informally presented."

Reference should also be made to 'Trustees Corporation (India) Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay', 57 I A 152, in which Lord Blanesburgh said:

"Their Lordships are fully alive to the circumstances in which the High Court was constrained to direct that these further questions should be referred to it for consideration & the result in the present case of the order then made merely serves to confirm the view of the Board that the High Court will, in future cases, be well advised to require before they seek to entertain any question under S. 66, Income-tax Act, that the preliminary requirements of the section are strictly complied with. The stringency of these requirements is clearly deliberate. It is the intention of the enactment that the High Court is not to be flooded with such applications. The object is salutary & in their Lordships' judgment the High Court will be well advised, before they entertain any question under the section, always to see that the preliminary statutory conditions have been fully observed."

(10) It is necessary to state that the provisions of the corresponding section of the English Income-tax Act (8 & 5 Geo, V Ch. 40, S. 149) are different from those contained in S. 66, Indian Income-tax Act & the interpretation of S. 66 must depend upon a consideration of the language in which that section is couched & a reference to English practice is not apposite.

(11) In the result I hold that the question referred to the High Court should be answered in the affirmative. The assesee must pay the cost of this reference. Hearing fee Rs. 250.

(12) SARJOO PROSAD, J.: I entirely agree and have nothing to add.

Supreme Court Appeal No. 69 of 1948, D/- 19-3-1951.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 110 para 2 — Para whether independent of para 1 — Value of subject-matter in suit less than Rs. 10, 000 — Appeal to Supreme Court, whether lies under para 2.

What S. 110, Civil P. C. requires is that the subject-matter in the Court of first instance must be Rs. 10,000 or upwards, and in addition that the amount or value of the subject-matter on appeal must be the same or the decree must involve, directly, or indirectly some claim or question to or respecting property of like amount or value. This latter provision contained in para 2 of the section is to be read as an alternative to the second restriction in the earlier part of the section. To read it as a provision independent of para. 1 of the section would render the provision in para 1 as to the value of the subject-matter in the Court of first instance a dead letter. It is not open to the Court so to interpret the section. The Court is bound so to interpret it that effect may be given to all its provisions if it can reasonably do so. A I R (3) 1916 Mad 985 and A I R (36) 1949 Pat 448, Relied on. Case law discussed.

Held, that the application for leave could not be allowed as the value of the subject-matter in the Court of the first instance was less than Rs. 10,000. (Para 18)

Anno: Civil P. C., S. 110 N. 11.

(b) Interpretation of Statutes — Statutes must be construed as a whole — Repugnancy to be avoided — Civil P. C. (1908), S. 110.

It is a well settled rule of interpretation that every clause of a statute should be construed with reference to the context and the other clauses of the Act, and, so far as possible, no clause, sentence or word should be considered superfluous, void or insignificant. A grammatical and literal construction is, therefore to be avoided if such construction leads to absurdity, repugnancy, or inconsistency with the rest of the construction. Thus if paragraph 2 of section 110 be read independently of paragraph 1 by adopting a grammatical rule of construction, the provision for the compliance of the first requirement of paragraph 1 would become nugatory and shall stand repealed by the second clause. An interpretation, therefore of the second paragraph ought not to depend on the spacing or punctuation. (Para 21)

(2) The application for leave to appeal was filed on 4-10-1948, that is, before the Constitution of 1950 came into force & will, therefore, be governed by S. 110, Civil P. C. This section provides:

"In each of the cases mentioned in Cls. (a) & (b) of S. 109, the amount or value of the subject matter of the suit in the Court of first instance must be ten thousand rupees or upwards, & the amount or value of the subject-matter in dispute on appeal to His Majesty in Council must be the same sum or upwards, or the decree or final order must involve directly or indirectly, some claim or question to or respecting property of like amount or value,

& where the decree or final order appealed from affirms the decision of the Court immediately below the Court passing such decree or final order, the appeal must involve some substantial question of law."

The words "His Majesty in Council" must now be read as "The Supreme Court".

(3) The order sought to be appealed from being one of reversal, the only question for consideration is whether the requirements of S. 110 as to value are satisfied. The original mortgage suit which was instituted as far back as in 1916 was valued at Rs. 5,783/12/6 but the final mortgage decree which was passed in appeal by this Court on 21-9-1938, was for Rs. 67,247/4/9. The execution of this decree was held to be barred by limitation by the order of this Court now sought to be appealed from. The amount or value of the subject matter in dispute on appeal, therefore, is considerably over Rs. 10,000/-.

(4) The provisions of S. 110 as to value are contained in the the first two paragraphs. The two paragraphs are separated by the word 'or', & upon a plain grammatical construction, they appear, at first sight, to be independent of each other; in other words, the second para appears to be an alternative to the whole of the first. But on a closer examination, the true position seems to be otherwise, as I will presently show.

(5) The first para imposes two conditions (1) as to the value of the subject-matter of the suit & (2) as to value of the subject-matter in dispute on appeal. Both these conditions must be fulfilled, as held by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 'Motichand v. Ganga Prasad Singh', 29 I A 40; 'Mangamma v. Mahalakshmamma', 57 I A 56 & 'Rajendra Kumar v. Rash Behari', A I R (18) 1931 P C 125. In these cases their Lordships pointed out that the word "and" meant "and" & not "or", so that each of the two conditions had to be separately fulfilled. With regard to the last case, it may be further mentioned that though the High Court had granted a certificate that the requirements of S. 110 were fulfilled, the Board, on the preliminary objection taken by the respondent, refused to entertain the appeal on the ground that the value of the subject matter of the suit, at the date of its institution, was below Rs. 10,000/- &, therefore, the requirements of S. 110 were not fulfilled.

(6) The question then arises whether the second para. can be read independently of the first, in other words, whether it is an alternative to the whole of the first paragraph. In the second para. the words 'involve directly' are wide enough to cover the actual subject matter in dispute. If, therefore, this para. is taken to be independent of the first, the result will be that an appeal will lie to the Supreme Court, subject, of course to the provisions of the third para. of the section, in every case where the value of the subject-matter in dispute on appeal is not less than Rs. 10,000/-, no matter what the value of the subject matter of the suit was. In that case, not only the first condition in the first para. would be rendered wholly nugatory. But this para. itself would have to be treated as a complete superfluity.

(7) In 'A. V. Subrammania Aiyar v. Sellammal', 39 Mad 843, leave to appeal was sought in a case where the value of the subject-matter of the suit in the Court of first instance was below Rs. 10,000/-, but the value of the appeal to His Majesty in Council exceeded that amount by reason of the addition of mesne profits for the period from the institution of the suit to the date of the petition for leave to appeal. It was contended that the case fell within the second para. of S. 110 &, therefore, leave should be granted. This contention was over-ruled in these words:

"If this contention be accepted, a certificate must be granted in any case in which the amount or value of the subject-matter in dispute on appeal to His Majesty in Council is not less than Rs. 10,000/- whether or not the amount or value of the subject-matter of the suit in the Court of the first instance fell below Rs. 10,000/- & this provision becomes wholly nugatory."

This reasoning was approved by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of 'Mangamma v. Mahalakshmamma', 57 I A 56, already cited.

(8) The same view was taken by this Court in 'Satibaladasi v. Chotanagpur Banking Association Ltd.', 27 Pat 237, in which the value of the subject-matter of the suit in the Court of first instance was below Rs. 10,000/-, but the value of the subject matter in dispute on appeal was more than Rs. 10,000/- as there was a mortgage decree including post-litem interest. It was contended that the decretal amount should be taken to be the value for the purpose of the second para. of S. 110. This contention was negatived in these words:

"If this were the proper construction of the section, the first requirement of paragraph 1 would be rendered nugatory."

The learned Judge followed the aforesaid decisions in 'A. V. Subramania Aiyar v. Sellammal', 39 Mad 843.

(9) A contrary view, however, appears to have been taken by this Court in 'Ishwari Prasad Singh v. Kameshwar Singh', A I R (28) 1941 Pat 288, decided by Harries, C. J. & Fazl Ali, J. (as he then was). There a suit was brought by the auction-purchasers of the disputed property in execution of a mortgage decree for a declaration that the property could not be attached & sold in execution of the certificate in a certain certificate case. The suit was decreed by the trial Court, but was dismissed on appeal by the High Court. The pltfs. then applied for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council. The value of the suit as well as of the appeal was Rs. 7699 odd, being the amount for which the certificate was issued. But the value of the property was considerably over Rs. 10,000/-. It was contended on behalf of the petitioner that they were entitled to leave as a matter of right, because the case fell under the second para. of S. 110. Their Lordships acceded to this contention & granted leave. It appears from the report that the said Madras decision in '39 Mad 843', & the Privy Council decision in '57 I A 56', were not brought to their Lordships' notice. The only case referred to in their judgment is 'Nadir Hussain v. Municipal Board, Agra', I L R (1937) All 405. We examined the original records of that case & found that the appeal was eventually dismissed on 25-2-1943, by the Privy Council on the merits. Apparently, no objection to the validity of the certificate given by this Court under S. 110 was raised before the Privy Council.

(10) Again, in the recent case of 'Bashir Mohammad Khan v. Md. Kabir Ahmad Khan', A I R (35) 1948 Pat 372, this Court granted leave to appeal apparently, on the basis of the second para. of S. 110. There the suit was brought by one of the heirs of a deceased Mohammadan lady for recovery of his share of the dower due to her which, he alleged, was Rs. 40,000/-. It is not clear from the report as to what the value of the suit was, but on examination of the records of that case, it appears that the suit was valued at Rs. 6,668/8/8, being the pltfs' share. The trial Court dismissed the suit. On appeal to this Court, it was decreed for Rs. 6666/8/8, being the pltf's admitted share, on the finding that the dower was Rs. 40,000/-. The principal deft. then applied for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council. It was contended on his behalf that the decree directly or indirectly involved a claim or question to or respecting property of above Rs. 10,000/- in value. This contention was accepted. Manohar Lall J., who delivered the judgment to which Mukherji, J. agreed, referred to a large number of cases & at the end followed the view taken by the Calcutta High Court in 'Nurul Absar v. Haripada Biswas', 50 C W N 255, which will be presently dealt with. It appears that the leave granted by this Court was challenged, at the hearing of the appeal before the Supreme Court, on the ground that the requirements of S. 110, Civil P. C. were not satisfied as the value of the appellant's claim was below Rs. 10,000/-. This objection was overruled in these words:

"This matter was fully dealt with by the High Court & we agree with their view that the suit as well as the appeal involves at least indirectly a question relating to an amount exceeding Rs. 10,000."

Overruling the preliminary objection, their Lordships allowed the appeal on the merits. From the above quoted observation it is apparent that their Lordships did not treat the case as falling exclusively under the second para. of S. 110.

(11) In the aforesaid Calcutta case '50 C W N 255, there was an estate of which there was a common manager appointed under S. 95, Bengal Tenancy Act. The purchaser of a four-anna share in the estate brought a suit against the common manager, impleading all the co-sharers as parties, for recovery of possession of the purchased share on a declaration that the appointment of the common manager was illegal. The suit was valued at Rs. 2,900/-, being the value of the right of the common manager to the four anna share, though it was stated in the plaint that the value of the pltf's share was Rs. 10,020/-. The trial Court decreed the suit, but on appeal, it was dismissed by the District Court. On second appeal, the High Court restored the decree of the trial Court, holding that the appointment of the common manager was illegal. The deft. then applied for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council. It was admitted that the value of the right of management of the four anna share claimed by the pltf. could be taken to be about Rs. 2,900/-. The learned Judges, therefore, said:

"The subject of the suit in the Court of first instance & of the appeal to His Majesty in Council is, therefore, below Rs. 10,000/-. So the case does not fulfil the requirements of the first para of S. 110, Civil P. C."

Next they proceeded to consider whether the case came within the second para. of S. 110. They were of opinion that the effect of the decree in question was that the deft. could no longer manage as common manager not only the pltf's share, but also the shares of the remaining owners which were outside the subject-matter of the suit, &, therefore, the decree directly involved the question of the management of their shares also which were admittedly over Rs. 10,000/- in value. Consequently it was held that the case came within the second para. of S. 110. The value of the subject-matter of the suit being Rs. 2900/- only, it is difficult to reconcile this decision with the Privy Council case in '57 I A 56', cited above. This Privy Council decision was actually referred to by the learned Judges, but they were apparently of the opinion that their Lordships' decision had no reference to the first para. of S. 110. But from the judgment of their Lordships it will appear that they approved the reasons given by the Madras High Court in '39 Mad 843'. Both Wallis C. J. & Srinivasa Aiyangar, J., who decided that Madras case, definitely held that if the second para. were to be considered independently of the first, the condition as to the value of the subject-matter of the suit prescribed in the first para. would be wholly nugatory. They further held that "property" in the second para. contemplated property additional to the subject matter in dispute. On this latter point, however, their Lordships of the Privy Council reserved their opinion in the recent case of 'Shevantibai v. Janardhan Raghunath', 71 I A 142.

(12) The last mentioned Privy Council case '71 I A 142', arose out of a suit brought by an assignee of the share of a member of a joint family for partition of the joint family property. The total value of the joint family property exceeded Rs. 10,000/-, but the value of the pltf's share was about 3,000 only. Both the trial Court & the appellate Court dismissed the claim for partition on the ground of limitation. The pltf. applied for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council which was refused by the High Court. The pltf., then applied for special leave which was granted, reserving liberty to the respondent to contest it at the hearing of the appeal. When the appeal came up for hearing, the respondent took the preliminary objection that leave to appeal should not have been granted. The appellant, on the other hand, contended that the High Court should have granted leave on the second clause in S. 110, as the decree involved directly or indirectly a question respecting the whole of the joint family property, admittedly of a value exceeding Rs. 10,000/-. Their Lordships rejected this contention in these words:

"It is enough for the purposes of the present case to say that their Lordships feel no doubt that a question as to the title of the pltf. to the share which she claims in the joint property does not become a question respecting the whole of the joint family estate merely because if her title is established it will result in the joint family estate being partitioned."

Their Lordships also stated

"Their Lordships do not find it necessary to decide whether the words of the second clause in S. 110 can be on their true construction ever refer to any property but that outside the suit."

Their Lordships, however, made no reference to the requirements of the first para. of S. 110. But from this, it by no means follows that their Lordships intended to hold that the second para. was quite independent of the first, which would be contrary to the view taken in the case in 57 Indian Appeals 56. It is obvious that their Lordships gave reason which, in their opinion, was just necessary to meet the appellant's contention. If their Lordships had accepted the contention, the position, of course, might have been quite different.

(13) In 'Maung Thwe v. A.L.A.R. Chetty Firm', A I R (10) 1923 Rang 71, the value of the subject matter of the suit in the Court of first instance was less than Rs. 10,000/-, but the value of the subject matter in appeal exceeded that amount, as it included the interest which accrued till the date of the decree. The requirements of the first para. of S. 110 were, therefore, not satisfied. It was, however, contended that the case came under the second para. Their Lordships disposed of this contention as follows:

"It is urged that the decree involves, directly or indirectly, some claim or question to or respecting property of like amount or value. In the first place it is claimed that this provision is to be read alone & not subject in any way to the requirements of the first para. of the section. We are quite unable to accept this view. It is based apparently on the spacing & quasi-separation into a separate para. We do not consider that it was intended to make it a separate provision. What the section requires is that the subject-matter in the Court of first instance must be Rs. 10,000/- or upwards, & in addition that the amount or value of the subject-matter on appeal must be the same or the decree must involve, directly or indirectly, some claim or question to or respecting property of like amount or value. This latter provision is to be read as an alternative to the second restriction in the earlier part of the section. To read it otherwise would render the provision as to the value of the subject matter in the Court of first instance a dead letter. It is not open to us so to interpret the section. We are bound so to interpret it that effect may be given to all its provisions if we can reasonably do so."

Then their Lordships referred to the aforesaid Madras decision in '39 Mad 843'. I entirely agree with the view so taken.

(14) It, therefore, follows that the second para. of S. 110 cannot be read independently of the first para.

(15) Mr. D. N. Verma on behalf of the petitioners contends that the first para. is applicable where the appeal arises out of a suit & cannot apply to an appeal which arises out of an execution proceeding. It is said that so far as the matters in controversy in the suit were concerned, they were settled at rest by the decree passed in the suit, & the questions arising in the execution proceeding relate to the execution of the decree & have no relation to the subject-matter of the suit. Consequently, it is contended, an appeal arising out of an execution proceeding will be governed, not by the first, but by the second para. If this contention is to be accepted, it will have to be assumed that though for the purpose of an appeal arising out of a suit, the second para. cannot be read independently of the first, as shown above, still in the case of an appeal arising out of an execution proceeding, it may be taken by itself. Such inconsistent position is not permissible. Further, it will be noticed that there are the words "decree or final order" in the second para. Obviously, therefore, this para. will apply equally to an appeal arising out of a suit as also to an appeal arising out of an execution proceeding. But in either case, it will have to be read subject to the provisions of the first para. It is true that the questions arising in an execution proceeding may have no relation to the matters that were in controversy in the original suit. But for the purpose of S. 110 this is immaterial. The whole object of this section is to fix a pecuniary limit below which there could be no appeal to His Majesty in Council. The section, as it stands, has to be interpreted & effect must be given to all its provisions.

(16) In this connection the case of 'Gossain Bhaunath Gir v. Bihari Lal', 4 Pat L J 415, is in point. It arose out of an execution proceeding in which the mortgaged property was sold in execution of a mortgage decree. One of the judgment-debtors who was interested in a share only of the mortgaged property applied for setting aside the sale of the property in which he was interested. His application was dismissed by the trial Court & its decision was affirmed on appeal by this Court. The J. D. then applied for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council. The judgment was one of affirmance, but before considering the question whether it involved any substantial question of law, as required by the third para. of S. 110, Dawson-Miller, C. J. who delivered the judgment (Coutts J. agreeing) said:

"But before it becomes necessary to consider that question the petitioner must make out that the subject matter of the suit in the court of first instance & the subject matter of the dispute on appeal to His Majesty in Council is of the sum of Rs. 10,000/- or upwards."

His Lordship then proceeded to consider the question of valuation, & was of opinion that though the mortgaged property sold was over Rs. 10,000 in value, the J. D., himself valued his interest at Rs. 4000/-. His Lordship, therefore, concluded:

"In the present case I think that the appellant has failed to show that the subject matter of the suit or dispute in appeal is of Rs. 10,000/- or upwards, & this application must be dismissed with costs."

It thus appears that in his Lordship's view the requirements of the first para of S. 110 were to be satisfied, even though that was a case arising out of an execution proceeding. It is true that the question whether the case could come under the second para of S. 110 was not raised or decided. Nevertheless, their Lordships did consider that the requirements of the first para of S. 110 had to be satisfied. This decision is a complete answer to Mr. Verma's contention that the first para. does not apply to an appeal arising out of an execution proceeding.

(17) It has been faintly suggested that a suit, as defined in Wharton's Law Lexicon, includes a petition to court &, therefore, an execution application may be treated as a suit for the purpose of the first para. of S. 110. But having regard to the various provisions of the Civil P. C., it is not permissible to use the word 'suit' in such wide sense. S. 26 of the Code provides:

"Every suit shall be instituted by the presentation of a plaint or in such other manner as may be prescribed."

O. 4, R. 1 of the Code then provides:-

"(1) Every suit shall be instituted by presenting a plaint to the court or such officer as it appoints in this behalf."

(2) Every plaint shall comply with the rules contained in Orders VI & VII so far as they are applicable."

The provisions for application for execution which can be found in O. 21 of the Code are quite distinct. Consequently, an execution application can on no account be regarded as a suit.

(18) As already stated, the value of the original suit in the present case was Rs. 5783/12/6. Consequently, the first requirement of the first para. of S. 110 is not satisfied. The application, therefore, must be dismissed, but in the circumstances, without costs.

(19) This order will govern Supreme Court Appeal No. 70 of 1948 which is also by the D. Hs. & arises out of the same judgment of this court, in so far as it set aside the order of the trial court allowing the decree-holders' application for review of its previous order dismissing their application for execution as not maintainable.

(20) LAKSHMIKANTA JHA, C. J. : I fully concur in the order proposed.

(21) It is a well-settled rule of interpretation that every clause of a statute should be construed with reference to the context & the other clauses of the Act, & so far as possible, no clause, setence or word should be considered superfluous, void or insignificant: 'Canada Sugar Refining Co. Ltd. v. The Queen', ((1898) AC 735 at 741). 'The Queen v. The Bishop of Oxford' ((1879) 4 Q B 245 at 261). A grammatical & literal construction is, therefore, to be avoided if such construction leads to absurdity, repugnancy, or inconsistency with the rest of the construction. If para. 2 of S. 110 be read independently of para. 1 by adopting a grammatical rule of construction, the provision for the compliance of the first requirement of para. 1 would become nugatory & shall stand repealed by the second clause. An interpretation, therefore, of the second para. ought not to depend on the spacing or punctuation. It is logically proper, & indeed imperative, to construe the second para in the light of the provision of the first para. to avoid repugnancy, & if so construed there is no escape from the conclusion that the second para. is only an alternative to the second part of the first para. With these observations, I entirely agree with the reasons given by my learned brother.

Tenancy Laws — Bihar Tenancy Act (8 of 1885), Ss. 40(6), 188 — Jurisdiction of Collector whether affected in hearing appeal preferred by some landlords without impleading others.

The non-joinder of ten-annas co-sharer landlords to an appeal preferred before the Collector by the six-annas co-sharer landlords u/s. 40(6) from an order fixing the rent made by the Rent commutation officer does not attract the provisions of S. 188 as the filing of an appeal is not a thing "which the landlord is under this Act required or authorized to do." Even assuming that S. 188 is applicable and the Collector acted in violation of the provision of the statute while hearing the appeal, such a violation would not affect the jurisdiction which is conferred upon him by S. 40(6). For a mere violation of an imperative provision of the Statute cannot affect the jurisdiction of the Ct. Even if a party is not before the Ct., on general principle the Ct. can pass an order in its favour but not against it. 35 Cal 331 PC; AIR (13) 1926 P C 142; AIR (35) 1948 Pat 460, Rel. on, A I R (35) 1948 Pat 153 held impliedly overruled by A I R (36) 1949 Pat 139. LAKSHMIKANTA JHA, C. J.: This is an appeal under the Letters Patent by deft. 1 from the judgment of Shearer, J. It arises out of a suit for recovery of cash rent for the years 1350 to 1353 Fasli. The rent was claimed at the rate of Rs. 229/1/- per year. The courts below decreed the suit & on second appeal to this Court the decrees of the courts below have been affirmed.

(2) The facts relevant to the point for decision are as follows: Originally the defts. were bhaoli tenants & the rent was payable wholly in kind. They applied for commutation of rent under S. 40, Bihar Tenancy Act, & Rent Commutation officer fixed the rent at Rs. 179/5/-. In the rent commutation proceedings all the landlords were impleaded & the order was passed in the presence of the 16 annas landlords. Only the plffs, who are 6 annas co-sharer landlords, appealed against the order of the Rent Commutation officer to the Collector under S. 40, Clause (6), Bihar Tenancy Act, without impleading the remaining 10 annas co-sharer landlords in the appeal. The Collector set aside the order of the Rent Commutation Officer & fixed the rent at Rs. 229/1/- by his order dated 7-2-1945. While the appeal was pending before the Collector, the tenants who are the defts. in the present suit, applied for reduction of the rent fixed by the Rent Commutation officer under S. 112A(1)(c), Bihar Tenancy Act, & the rent was reduced from Rs. 179/5 to Rs. 168/1/9. In the present suit the plff. claimed rent at the rate of Rs. 229/1- as fixed by the Collector. The defts. resisted the suit on the ground that the rent having been reduced in a proceeding under S. 112A (1) (c), Bihar Tenancy Act, the plffs. were not entitled to claim rent at the rate fixed by the Collector. The plffs. on the other hand, alleged that the order passed by the Rent Reduction Officer in the proceeding under S. 112A (1) (c) was ineffective because the foundation of his order was the order of the Rent Commutation officer which had been reversed by the Collector on appeal. They asserted that they were entitled to claim the rent at the rate fixed by the Collector. The courts below, as well as Shearer, J., accepted the plffs. contention & the suit was accordingly decreed at the rate of rent fixed by the Collector.

(3) The point for our consideration is whether the order passed by the Collector fixing rent at Rs. 229/1/ is with or without jurisdiction, the defts. appeal must fail.

(4) The argument of Mr. Bose, on behalf of the appellant, is that the order of the Collector is without jurisdiction because there was violation of the statutory provision of S. 188, Bihar Tenancy Act, inasmuch as the 10 annas landlords were admittedly not impleaded as parties before the Collector. In my opinion, this argument is not sustainable. The Collector had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal under S. 40, Cl. (6), Bihar Tenancy Act, even in the absence of the 10 annas co-sharer landlords, & his order cannot be characterized as one passed by him without jurisdiction.

"Jurisdiction may be defined as the power & authority conferred on a Court to pronounce the sentence of the law or to award the remedies provided by law upon a state of facts, proved or admitted, referred to the Court for decision & authorised by law to be the subject of investigation or action by that Court, & in favour of, or against, persons who present themselves, or who are brought before the Court in some manner sanctioned by law as proper & sufficient." (See Black on 'Jurisdiction', section 215).

In 'Ramranbijaya Prasad Singh V. Ramkawal', 26 Patna 748 at p. 754) it was held

"By jurisdiction is meant the authority which a court has to decide matters that are litigated before it or to take cognizance of matters presented in a formal way for its decision".

(5) S. 40, Cl. (1), Bihar Tenancy Act, provides:

"Where an occupancy-raiyat pays for his holding rent in kind....either the raiyat or his landlord may apply to have the rent commuted to money rent."

Section 188, which is of general application, lays down:

"Where two or more persons are joint landlords, anything which the landlord is under this Act required or authorized to do must be done either by both or all these persons acting together, or by an agent authorized to act on behalf of both or all of them."

S. 40 (1), read with S. 188, requires that all the landlords must be party to the rent commutation proceeding. In the present case the proceeding commenced at the instance of the raiyat & admittedly all the landlords were parties to the proceeding. Therefore, there was no defect of party, in so far as the proceeding before the Rent Commutation officer was concerned. His order, therefore, was with jurisdiction. Cl. (5) of S. 40 requires:

"The order shall be in writing & shall state the grounds on which it is made & the time from which it is to take effect."

Cl. 6 (a) of S. 40 provides:

"An appeal shall lie from an order referred to in Sub-S. (5)

(i) If such order is passed by any officer other than the Collector of a district, to the Colleetor of the district or to any officer specially empowered by the Provincial Govt. by notification to hear such appeals."

Therefore, the Collector had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal.

(6) It is contended by Mr. Bose that there was non-compliance with the provisions of S. 188, Bihar Tenancy Act, because all the landlords were not impleaded. An examination of S. 40, Cl. (6), Bihar Tenancy Act, does not show that the "landlord is under this Act required or authorised" to file an appeal. All that the section provides is that "An appeal shall lie"; in other words, the order is made appealable. It does not provide, nor is it necessary to provide, by whom the appeal may be filed. The appeal is to be preferred only by the aggrieved party; for this no specific statutory provision is necessary. Therefore, the filing of an appeal is not a thing "which the landlord is under this Act required or authorized to do." The filing of an appeal is, no more than the institution of a suit for rent, a thing required or authorized by the Act. In 'Pramada Nath v. Ramini Kanta Roy', 35 I.A. 73 at p. 78 the Privy Council held: "The filing of a suit" for rent "is not a thing which the landlord is, under the Act, required or authorized to do." The 6 annas landlords, who are the present plaintiffs, if they felt aggrieved by the order of the Rent Commutation officer, were certainly entitled to prefer an appeal, & if they did not implead the remaining 10 annas co-sharer landlords as respondents, all that might be said was that there was defect of parties. But no objection on this score was taken before the Collector at the hearing or at any other stage by the defts. who contested the appeal before him.

(7) Even assuming that S. 188, Bihar Tenancy Act, is applicable & the Collector acted in violation of the provision of the statute, such a violation would not affect the jurisdiction which is conferred upon him by S. 40 (6). The Privy Council in Umed Mal v. Chand Mal, (53 I. A. 271) held that the failure to join a necessary party is only a material irregularity in the exercise of jurisdiction & falls within Cl. (c) of S. 115, C P. C. Their Lordships observed:

"The very question is whether Fatima ever conveyed the bighas to the alleged mortgagees, & it was a material irregularity to decide it in the absence of Fatima herself. Under the circumstances, the Chief Commissioner had the power to make such order in the case as he thought fit"

It has been held by the Full Bench in 'Maharaja Bahadur 'Ramranbijaya Prasad Singh v. Ramkawal Upadhya', 26 Patna 748 that a mere violation of an imperative provision of the statute cannot affect the jurisdiction of the Court. But even if a party is not before the Court, on general principle the Court can pass an order in its favour but not against it. In 'Radha Mohan v. Shreekishun Gir, 27 Pat 242, Meredith J, on a review of the divergent views on the point has held that "the word 'parties' in O. 41, R. 33, is wide enough to include persons who were parties to the suit in the trial Court, but were not parties to the appeal". He has further held that "there is nothing whatever in the terms of rule 4 to suggest that the persons, who did not appeal, must be impleaded as respts. & were it necessary, one would expect words to that effect in the rule.... Neither rule offends the principle that an order cannot be passed to the prejudice of a person in his absence, because the terms of each rule carefully & expressly limit its application to orders in favour of the absent person so that no question of any objection by him being shut out can arise." Therefore, in my opinion, even though the 10 annas co-sharer landlords were not impleaded before the Collector, & even if section 188, Bihar Tenancy Act, be held applicable to a proceeding in appeal, non-compliance with its provision cannot affect the jurisdiction of the Collector.

(8) Learned counsel for the appellant has strongly relied upon the case of 'Basdeonarain v. Karu Mahton, 26 Pat. 592 in support of his contention. But the decision seems to have been impliedly overruled by the Full Bench in 'Ramranbijaya Prasad Singh v. Ramkawal', 26 Pat 748. The Collector, in my opinion, was competent to pass the order even in the absence of a necessary party & his order cannot be collaterally challenged. The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Court-fees Act (1870), Ss. 7 (ix), 12 (ii), Sch. I Art. 1—Applicability.

The plaintiffs mortgaged a certain share in a tauzi usufructuarily to defendants 1 and 2 to secure a loan of Rs. 1,600. 12 bighas of land were included in the hypothecated property as bakasht land. The suit was brought by the plaintiffs to redeem the mortgage. They also sought khas possession of these 12 bighas as against defendants 3 and 4 alleging that these defendants were the benamidar for defendants 1 and 2. The plaintiffs succeeded as regards the prayer for redemption in both the Courts below and this portion of the decree was not challenged. Defendants 3 and 4, who claimed occupancy rights in the 12 bighas, which they claimed to have been settled with them by the predecessor-in-interest of the plaintiffs with the consent of the mortgagees. This defence was accepted by the Munsiff, but, in appeal by the plaintiff, the lower appellate Court held that there was no such settlement and granted the plaintiff the relief prayed for. Defendants 3 and 4 filed the second appeal. The suit was valued in the Court of first instance at Rs. 1,600 under cl. (ix) of S. 7. The same value was placed by the plaintiff on his appeal in the lower appellate Court. On an objection by the Stamp-reporter that the relief as regards the 12 bighas was not covered by cl. (ix) of S. 7 the District Judge accepted the valuation but on a different basis, namely, Rs. 683-7-3 on account of a set-off claimed by the plaintiffs and refused by the Munsiff and the balance of Rs. 916-8-9 as the value of the 12 bighas of land on the basis of rental of Rs. 36. The appellants in the High Court valued their appeal at Rs. 1,147-8-7 consisting of Rs. 916 and odd as the value of the land and Rs. 220 and odd on account of excess cost etc. assessed against them:

Held that the question that was raised in the present appeal was not a question which arose between the mortgagor and the mortgagee. It arose between the mortgagor and persons who were strangers to the mortgage. Clause (ix) of S. 7, therefore, did not apply. The matter in dispute in the second appeal was the right to hold the land as an occupancy raiyat at a particular annual rent. The decision of the District Judge as regards the valuation of the property had no finality, and was not binding for the purpose of valuing the appeal in the High Court and the Taxing Officer was empowered to assess the value. The court-fee was payable on the appeal under Art. 1 of Sch. I. In addition to ad valorem court fees payable on account of excess cost etc. the appellants were liable to pay ad valorem court fee on the value of the interest claimed by them in the 12 bighas of land. There was no logical connection between the rent and the value of the holding. The property consisted of 12 bighas of cultivable land, and prima facie Rs. 916 was a low valuation: A.I R. Order.—This is a reference under S. 5, Court-fees Act.

[2] One Ramyad Gosain, proprietor of three annas and odd share in touzi No. 1484, mortgaged this share usufructuarily in the year 1911 to defendants 1 and 2 to secure a loan of Rs. 1,600. 12 bighas of land which forms the subject-matter of the present appeal was included in the hypothecated property as bakasht land. The present suit has been brought by the plaintiffs as successors-in-interest of Ramyad Gosain to redeem the mortgage. They also seek khas possession of these 12 bighas as against defendants 3 and 4 alleging that these defendants are the benamidar for defendants 1 and 2. The plaintiffs have succeeded as regards the prayer for redemption in both the Courts below and this portion of the decree is not challenged. The present appeal is by defendants 3 and 4, who claim occupancy rights in the 12 bighas, which they claim to have been settled with them by Ramyad Gosain in 1919 with the consent of the mortgagees. This defence was accepted by the Munsiff, but, in appeal by the plaintiff, the lower appellate Court has held that there was no such settlement and has granted the plaintiff the relief prayed for. Hence, the present appeal.

[3] The suit was valued in the Court of first instance at Rs. 1,600 under cl. (ix) of S. 7, Court-fees Act. The same value was placed by the plaintiff on his appeal in the District Court. On an objection by the Stamp-reporter that the relief as regards the 12 bighas is not covered by cl. (ix) of S. 7, the District Judge accepted the valuation but on a different basis, namely Rs. 683 7-3 on account of a set-off claimed by the plaintiffs and refused by the Munsiff and the balance of Rs. 916-8-9 as the value of the 12 bighas of land. Regarding this latter sum, the District Judge remarked :

"This may be taken as adequate, in view of the fact that defendants 3 and 4 have, according to the judgment of the lower Court, to pay rental of Rs. 36 to the plaintiff."

The appellants, to this Court have valued their appeal at Rs. 1,147-8-7 consisting of Rs. 916 and odd as the value of the land and Rs. 230 and odd on account of excess cost etc. assessed against them.

[4] This reference has been made to me for a decision on two points : firstly, as to whether cl. (ix) of S. 7 has any application and, secondly, if ad valorem court fee is payable, how it is to be assessed.

[5] Really, there is no distinction between the the two points. Clause (ix) of S. 7 is not a charging section. It merely prescribes the manner in which the valuation is to be computed in certain cases in which an ad valorem court-fee is payable. The charging section in the case of appeals in the High Court against judgments of Subordinate Courts is S. 4, which provides that no document of any of the kinds specified in the first or second schedule to the Act as chargeable with fees, shall be filed or received in a High Court in the exercise of its jurisdiction as regards appeals from the Courts subject to its superintendence unless in respect of such document there be paid a fee of an amount not less than that indicated by either of the said schedules as the proper fee for such document. We have, therefore to see whether there is any provision in the schedules which applies to the appeal. In the present case, there is no specific article that applies and we have to fall back on the residuary provision, Art. 1 of Sch. 1, under which an ad valorem court-fee is chargeable on "the amount or value of the subject-matter in dispute". The test is what is the subject matter in dispute and what is its amount or value ?

[6] The question of the applicability of cl. (ix) of S. 7 has been referred to me on account of my decisions on references under S. 5, Court-fees Act made in Second Appeal Nos. 1500 of 1949 and 704 of 1949, in both of which I held that the value should be computed as provided in cl. (ix). Those appeals arose out of suits for the redemption of usufructuary mortgages in which the plaintiff had added a prayer for mesne profits. I pointed out in my decisions that the claim for mesne profits was superfluous, as the Court was bound under the provisions of S. 76, T. P. Act read with O. 34, R. 7, Civil P. C., to take accounts between the parties. The suits were, therefore, plain and simple suits for redemption. Hence, for the purposes of the payment of court-fee they were governed in the Court of first instance by cl. (ix) of S. 7. The appellants in the High Court raised the very same points that had been raised in the Courts below. In one case, the plaintiff was the appellant, in the other case the defendant. So far as the appeal by the plaintiff was concerned, it was clear that the matter in dispute in second appeal should be valued on the same basis as his claim was valued in the Court of first instance. From this it would follow that the same basis of valuation should be accepted for the appeal by the defendant, for there is no reason why an appeal, which raises the same points as were raised in the Court of first instance, should be valued differently according to whether the appellant is the plaintiff or the defendant. My decisions in those cases have no application to the present case, where redemption has been granted and the correctness of the decree to that extent has not been challenged. The question that is raised in the present appeal is not a question which arises between the mortgagor and the mortgagee. It arises between the mortgagor and persons who are strangers to the mortgage. Clause (ix) of S. 7 therefore, is entirely foreign to the present appeal. For this reason, I would answer the first point in the negative.

[7] As regards the second point, the test for valuation is plain, namely, what is the subject-matter in dispute and what is its amount or value? The matter in dispute in this appeal is the right to hold the land as an occupancy raiyat at a particular annual rent. It has been urged on behalf of the appellants that this value should be computed in accordance with cl. (xi), sub cl. (cc) of S. 7. That section relates to a suit for the recovery of immovable property from a tenant including a tenant holding over after the termination of a tenancy. It has no application to a suit in which the relationship of landlord and tenant is denied by the plaintiff. Next, it is suggested that following the principle in cl. (iv), sub-cl. (c) of S. 7, the valuation placed on the relief sought in the memorandum of appeal should be accepted. It is well established, however, that the Court is not bound to accept a valuation which on the face of it is arbitrary. The valuation stated in the memorandum of appeal is based on that adopted by the District Judge. That valuation was a fortuitous one arising out of particular facts of the appeal before the District Judge. The appellants-plaintiffs had there placed a total value of Rs. 1,600 on their appeal in accordance with cl. (ix) of S. 7. The District Judge having held that cl. (ix) has no application and having allotted a portion of the stated valuation to one of the specific reliefs claimed, accepted the remaining amount as sufficient to cover the other relief. The reason given by him for accepting that amount as sufficient has no logical connection with the value of that relief. It is based on the amount of the rent claimed as payable by the tenant. No attempt was made by the District Judge to ascertain what proportion that rent bore to the net produce of the land. It might have been a high rent which would considerably diminish the value of the holding On the other hand, it might have been a very low rent, which would have exactly the contrary effect. So there is no logical connection between the rent and the value of the holding. The property consists of 12 bighas of cultivable land, and, prima facie Rs. 916 seems a low valuation.

[8] It has also been suggested, though somewhat faintly, that the decision of the District Judge as regards the valuation of the property is final. The decision has no finality even as regards the correctness of court fee charged in the Court below, vide cl. (ii) of S. 12 of the Act. It is certainly not binding for the purpose of valuing the appeal in this Court and the Taxing Officer is empowered to assess the value: Krishna Mohan v Raghunandan, 4 Pat. 336.

[9] For the reasons I have given above, I hold that the court-fee is payable on the appeal under Art. 1 of Sch. I to the Court-fees Act. In addition to the ad valorem court-fee payable on account of excess cost etc., the appellants are liable to pay ad valorem court-fees on the value of the interest claimed by them in the 12 bighas of land. The reference is answered accordingly.

Case referred to:

Judgment. — This is an application by an under-trial prisoner who has challenged his detention. The facts are these. The petitioner was committed to take his trial in the Court of Session for an alleged offence under S. 5, Explosive Substances Act (VI [6] of 1908). Section 7 of that Act lays down that no Court shall proceed to the trial of any person for an offence against this Act except with the consent of the State Govt. After the case had proceeded to trial & in the course of arguments, it was discovered that no consent, as required by S. 7 of the Act, had been obtained. The learned Assistant Ses. J. who was conducting the trial, then recorded an order the concluding portion of which runs as follows:

"I hereby quash the proceeding & order that the accused Gopal Krishna Pal be remanded to custody. The case is adjourned to 27-11-50 for a fresh trial. Meanwhile the prosecution should obtain necessary consent of the Govt. The assessors are discharged. Fresh assessors will be summoned. The witnesses should also be summoned in the order in which they had been summoned. For the purpose of choosing the assessors by lot the sessions clerk will put up the list of assessors at once."

[2] The question is whether the aforesaid order is correct, & whether the learned Ses. J. was right in giving an adjournment when the proceeding was quashed. It appears that a similar case arose in Bombay, Emperor v. Kallappa Dundappa, A. I. R. (14) 1927 Bom. 21. It was there pointed out that the words used in S. 7, Explosive Substances Act, were not as wide as some similar enactments in the Criminal P. C. It was further pointed out that S. 7, Explosive Substances Act, merely restrained the Court from proceeding to the trial of any person for an offence under the Act except with the necessary consent. But lack of such consent did not invalidate the committal proceedings. It was stated therein that the committal proceedings were only an 'inquiry' as defined in cl. (k) of S. 4, Criminal P. C. In that case also it was pointed out that though the learned Ses. J. could not proceed with the trial the accused person on that commitment without the requisite consent, the proper procedure was to arrange to postpone the trial till the requisite consent was obtained. The learned Assistant Ses. J. seems to have followed the same procedure in the present case.

[3] Our attention was drawn to a decision of the Federal Court in Basdeo Agarwalla v. King Emperor (1945 Federal Courts Reports 93). Their Lordships had to consider in that case the words of cl. 16 of the Drugs Control Order, 1943, which provides that no prosecution for any contravention of the provisions of the Drugs Control Order shall be instituted without the previous sanction of the Provincial Govt. Their Lordships held that the sanction required was not intended to be, & should not be, an automatic formality & should not be so regarded either by police or officials. They pointed out that the whole proceeding was bad for lack of such sanction.

[4] There is a vital point of distinction between the words used in Cl. 16 of the Drugs Control Order, 1943, & the words used in S. 7, Explosive Substances Act, & that distinction was the basis of the decision in the Bombay case.

[5] It is clear to us that the order of the learned Assistant Ses. J. is a good order; & there are no reasons for interference by us. If the committal proceedings were valid the detention of the petitioner for an alleged offence under S. 5, Explosive Substances Act, is not illegal.

[6] We would accordingly dismiss the petition.

V.B.B. Petition dismissed.

Misc. Judicial Case No. 229 of 1949, D/- 14-3-1951.

Income-tax Act (1922), Ss. 3, 4, 22, 34 — Foundation of liability — Bihar Regulation, IV [4] of 1942 — Retrospective effect of—Escaped income-tax—Notice under S. 34—Validity of.

The issue or receipt of notice is not the foundation of the jurisdiction of the Income-tax Officer to make the assessment or of the liability of the assessee to pay the tax. The liability to pay the tax is founded on Ss. 3 and 4, Income-tax Act which are the charging sections. Section 22, and others are the machinery sections to determine the amount of tax: A. I. R. (34) 1947 F. C. 32, Foll. [Para 4]

The assessee, a private limited company, carried on its business at a place situated in Chota Nagpur, a partially excluded area. The assessee was assessed to income-tax for the year 1939-40. The income was determined to be Rs. 346. The Indian Finance Act, 1939 was brought into force in Chota Nagpur with effect from 30-3-1939 by Bihar Regulation IV [4] of 1942. On 10-7-1941 the Income-tax Officer issued notice to the assessee under S. 34 on the ground that the income had partly escaped assessment. A revised estimate was made and the total income was computed to be Rs. 8,146. The assessee contended that there could be no question of income escaping income-tax when the Indian Finance Act was not in force in Chota Nagpur at the material time:

Held (1) that under S. 92 (2), Government of India Act, 1935, the Governor had full plenary powers of legislation in respect of the partially excluded area and that he had power to make the Finance Act applicable to the Chota Nagpur by Bihar Regulation IV [4] of 1942 with retrospective effect; [Para 4]

('47) 1947-15 I. T. R. 302 : (A.I.R. (34) 1947 F. C. 32). [Pr 4]

FACTS—Bihar Mica Concern Ltd., the assessee company, is a private limited company, the share-holders being Chatturam and Darsanram, holding equal shares. The assessee company carriers on business at Kodarma which is situated in Chota Nagpur. Chota Nagpur is a partially excluded area. The assessee company was assessed for the year 1939/40 by the Income-tax Officer on 25-8-1939. Its income was determined at Rs. 346. On 10-7-1941 the Income-tax Officer recorded the following order on the order sheet:

"As income from business appears to have partly escaped assessment, issue notice under S. 34 read with S. 22 (2) for income return for the year assessable in 1939-40 within one month from the date of the receipt of this notice."

Notice was issued on 10-7-1941. The assessee company filed a return in pursuance of the notice under S. 34 for the assessment year 1939-40.

The case dragged on before the Income-tax Officer and on 31-3-1944 a revised assessment order was passed computing the income at Rs. 8,146. An appeal was preferred before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner. He dismissed the appeal, whereupon an appeal before the Tribunal was filed. That appeal was argued, along with the appeal by Chatturam Horilram Ltd., on the basis that the facts in both the cases were similar.

The Indian Finance Act, 1939, was brought into force in Chota Nagpur with effect from 30-3-1939 by Bihar Regulation IV [4] of 1942. That Regulation was assented to by the Governor General on 30-6-1942 and published in the Bihar Gazette on 7-7-1942. If the Regulation had not been made by the Governor, the original assessment made on 25-8-1939 and the revised assessment made on 31-3-1944, would have been set aside. Two points were raised before the Appellate Tribunal (1) Whether the notice issued on 10-7-1941 under S. 34, Income-tax Act was validly issued; and (2) whether the cash credits amounting to Rs. 7,800 in the assessee company's books were satisfactorily explained by the assessee company.

The question as to what definite information did the Income-tax Officer have on 10-7-1941 when he directed the issue of a notice under S. 34, was not raised before the Tribunal. The argument before the Tribunal was that there could be no question of income escaping income-tax when the Indian Finance Act was not in force in Chota Nagpur at the material time.

The position that emerges out of the facts stated above is that an original assessment was made on 25-8-1939 and a revised assessment on 31-3-1944. If the Regulation referred to above had not been made these assessments would be invalid. The questions of law that arise out of the facts stated above, therefore, are :

"1. Whether the revised assessment made on 31-3-1944 is validly made having regard to the fact that the Bihar Regulation IV [4] of 1942 had been made with retrospective effect ?

2. Whether the notice under S. 34 issued on 10-7-1941 was validly issued for the assessment for year 1939-40 ?"

Ramaswami J.— This reference is made by the Income-tax Appellate Tribunal under S. 66 (1), Income-tax Act.

[2] The assessee Bihar Mica Concern Ltd. is a private company limited, the share-holders being Chatturam and Darsanram, holding equal shares. The assessee carried on business at Kodarma which is situated in Chotanagpore, a partially excluded area. The Income-tax Officer made assessment for the year 1939-40 on 25-8 1939. The income was determined to be Rs. 346. No appeal was preferred by the assessee to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner or to the Tribunal. On 10-7-1941 the Income tax Officer issued notice under S. 34 on the ground that the income had partly escaped assessment. The proceedings continued till 31-3 1944. A revised estimate was made and the total income was computed to be Rs. 8146. An appeal was preferred by the assessee to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner who dismissed the appeal. A second appeal was preferred before the Appellate Tribunal who heard it along with the appeal instituted by Chhatturam Horilram Limited. The Appellate Tribunal delivered a single judgment dismissing both the appeals.

[3] At the instance of the assessee the Appellate Tribunal has referred the following questions of law for being determined by the High Court :

(1) "Whether the revised assessment made on 31-3-1944 is validly made having regard to the fact that the Bihar Regulation IV [4] of 1942 had been made with retrospective effect ? and (2) Whether the notice under S. 34 issued on 10-7-1941 was validly issued for the assessment of the year 1939-40?"

[4] In my opinion both these questions must be answered against the assessee in view of the principle enunciated by the Federal Court in Chatturam v. Commissioner of Income tax, Bihar, (1947) 15 I. T. R. 302. In that case the assessee was served on 20-4-1940 with a notice under S. 22 (2), Income-tax Act, for furnishing a return in the prescribed form for the accounting year 1939-40. On 22-4-1940 a notice under S. 22 (1) was published in the newspapers requiring persons generally to submit the returns in prescribed form. On 26-5-1940 the Governor of Bihar by Notification under S. 92 (1), Government of India Act, directed that the Indian Income-tax Act and the Indian Finance Act 1940 should be deemed to have been applied to the Chotanagpur Division with retrospective effect. To remove doubts as to the retrospective applicability of the Acts the Governor of Bihar acting under S. 92 (2), Government of India Act made Regulation I [1] of 1941. The Regulation received assent of the Governor-General on 13-6-1941. There were appeals against the assessments and the appeals were pending when Regulation I was made. Upon these facts it was held by the Federal Court that under S. 92 (1) the Governor was acting in exercise of his legislative powers; that in any event under S. 92 (2), Constitution Act, the Governor had full plenary powers of legislation in respect of the partially excluded area and that he had power to make Regulation I [1] of 1941 applicable to the Chotanagpore Division with retrospective effect. It was further held that the issue or receipt of a notice was not the foundation of the jurisdiction of the Income-tax Officer to make the assessment or of the liability of the assessee to pay the tax. The liability to pay the tax is founded on Ss. 3 and 4, Income-tax Act, which are the charging sections. Section 22 and others are the machinery sections to determine the amount of tax and it was futile to contend that the Income-tax Officer was not entitled to assess the party or that the party is not liable to pay any tax because notice had not been issued to him.

[5] Applying the ratio of this decision to the present case it is manifest that both the questions referred to the High Court must be answered in the affirmative. The assessee must pay the cost of this reference. Hearing fee Rs. 250.

Visheswar Singh — Petitioner v. Commissioner of Income tax, Bihar and Orissa— Opposite Party.

Misc. Judicial Case No. 228 of 1949, D/- 13-10-1950.

Income-tax Act (1922), S. 41 (1) — Trust — Construction—Applicability of first proviso.

A babuana grant provided as follows :—"The late Maharajadhiraj Sir Rameshwar Singh constructed a palace known as 'Rajnagar Palace', as also several temples of marble and masonary, all of rare architectural beauty and value and installed therein various deities . . . It is the pious duty of the parties to these presents to make suitable provision for the performance of the daily worship, Raj Bhog, periodical festivals and ceremonies of the said deities as well as for the upkeep, preservation, repair and maintenance of these monumental works of art with their appurtenances of gardens, tanks, etc. Therefore, out of the villages mentioned in Sch. A at foot hereof, the villages detailed and specified in Schs. B and C hereunder written are granted to the said Maharajadhiraj Kumar Visheswar Singh subject to the trust that the income of the villages specified in Sch. B would be wholly devoted to the performance of the Pooja, Path, Raj Bhog, Utsab and Samaiya of the deities aforesaid and that of the villages in Sch. C would be entirely devoted to the maintenance, upkeep, repair and preservation of the said palaces, temples, gardens, tanks, and other appurtenances :

Held, that the document did not create two different kinds of trusts. It was in substance a dedication of all the properties to the deities and in making the dedication, it separately provided on the one hand for the performance of the pujas and observance of the festivals, etc., and on the other for the repair and upkeep of the temples and other appurtenances. The mere fact that the palaces, gardens and tanks had also been mentioned did not in any manner affect the position because these things went along with the temples and the idols which were installed therein. Both Schs. B and C properties had the same characteristics, and the income from both the properties was to be spent over determinate objects, namely, the deities which were undoubtedly juridical persons. Though the shares of these deities had not been defined all the various deities had been mentioned in the document, and, as such in the eye of law they had equal shares in the income of the properties, and, in the circumstances, the income of the properties in Sch. C also should be assessed in the same manner as the income of the properties in Sch. B. Thus the income of the trust property in the hands of the trustee was not liable to be assessed at the maximum rate under the first proviso to S. 41 (1), but should be assessed at the rate applicable to the individual income of each of the deities : A I. Sarjoo Prosad J. — This is a reference made under S. 66 (1), Income-tax Act, by the Income-tax Appellate Tribunal, Bombay Bench. The point of reference is

" whether the income from the properties mentioned in Sch C is taxable at the maximum rate under the first proviso to S. 41."

The answer to the question depends upon the interpretation of a certain deed of trust executed by the Maharajadhiraj of Darbhanga on 23-7-1929, in favour of the applicant, Raja Bahadur Visheswar Singh, his brother.

[2] The facts are that in the Darbhanga Raj, which is claimed to be an impartible estate, maintenance grants are made in favour of the junior members of the family. They are commonly known as babuana grants. In pursuance of this practice it appears that the present Maharajadhiraj of Darbhanga executed the deed aforesaid under which a babuana grant was given to the applicant in respect of a number of villages in separate enjoyment. I shall briefly refer to the relevant terms of the document in question. After the preliminary recitals, it proceeds to state as follows :

"Now these presents witness that in accordance with the family custom or usage, otherwise called Dastcor Khandan or Kulachar of Darbhanga Raj, of assigning a maintenance of Babuana grant to the younger son or sons of the family and also in pursuance of the aforesaid amicable settlement and arrangement the said Maharajadhiraj Kameshwar Singh Bahadur doth hereby grant and convey to the said Maharajadhiraj Kumar Visheswar Singh such interest in all the villages or parts of villages & other classes of lands, appertaining to and in fact constituting the Rajnagar Circle of Darbhanga Raj as per detailed list given in Sch. A below with all arrears of rent due in respect thereof with all buildings, structures, erections, standing thereon, except such as are hereinafter specified as trust properties and all rights appertaining thereto as are usually conveyed under a Babuana grant to the junior members of the family to have & to hold the same as a maintenance or Babuana grant according to the custom of the family subject amongst others to the conditions hereinunder specifically set forth."

This recital shows that the applicant received a grant of all the villages given in Sch. A of the document except such as were hereinafter specified as trust properties. Now, the specification of the trust properties is contained in para. 5 of the recitals in the document. I propose to reproduce a part of this para. which has been the subject-matter of interpretation by the parties before this Court. Para 5 says :

"That the late Maharajadhiraj Sir Rameshwar Singh constructed a palace known as 'Rajnagar Palace' as also several temples of marble and masonary all of rare architectural beauty and value and installed therein various deities., viz. Sri Durga, Sri Kali, Sri Ardh Narishwar, Sri Rajeshwari, Sri Ramshwarnath Mahadeva, Sri Radhakrishna, Sri Ramjanki. Sri Soorj, Sri Criba Debi (Goswan), Sri Vishun and Sri Mahadeva, the said palace and temples are situated in village Rajnagar except two temples which are situated in villages Barrooar and Korabia, Perganna Bachhaur and all the three villages aforesaid form part of this grant. The late Maharajadhiraj, Sir Rameshwar Singh used to celebrate the Puja, Path, Raj, Bhog Utsab and Samaiya of the various deities aforesaid on a grand scale befitting his position as Maharajadhiraj of Darbhanga. Hence, it is the pious duty of the parties to these presents to make suitable provision for the performance of the daily worship, Raj Bhog, periodical festivals & ceremonies of the said deities as well as for the upkeep, preservation, repair and maintenance of these monumental works of art with their appurtenances of gardens, tanks, etc. etc. Therefore out of the villages mentioned in Sch. A at foot hereof, the villages detailed and specified in Schs. B and C hereunder written are granted to the said Maharajadhiraj Kumar Visheswar Singh subject to the trust that the income of the villages specified in Sch. B would be wholly devoted to the performance of the Pooja Path Raj Bhog Utsab and Samaiya of the deities aforesaid and that of the villages in Sch. C would be entirely devoted to the maintenance, upkeep, repair and preservation of the said palaces, temples, gardens tanks, and other appurtenances. The said Maharajadhiraj Kumar shall stand possessed of the said palace, temples with their appurtenances and the villages mentioned in Schs. B and C below upon trust for the purposes above mentioned and shall be the first trustee in respect thereof . . "

I may also refer to another relevant recital in the document as contained in para 6. The relevant portion is

"The aforesaid palace and temples as also the villages mentioned in Schs. B and C shall not be liable to be partitioned, sold, exchanged or otherwise disposed of or dealt with by the trustee nor shall the income of the aforesaid villages or any of them be used or spent otherwise than for the purposes set forth above."

These recitals indicate that the properties specified in Schs. B and C of the document were given to the Raja Bahadur to be held as a trustee for disbursing the income thereof over the performance of the daily worship, Raj Bhog periodical festivals and ceremonies of the deities as well as for the upkeep, preservation, repair and maintenance of the monumental works of art with their appurtenances of gardens, tanks, etc. The recitals also show that the income from Sch. B properties was to be wholly devoted to the performance of Puja Path, Raj Bhog, Utasab and Samaiya of the deities, and that the income from Sch. C properties was to be devoted to the upkeep, repair preservation of the palaces, temples, gardens tanks and other appurtenances. The contention of the assessee is that the properties both in Schs. B and C were part and parcel of the same endowment in favour of the deities who were the cesti qui trust, and that the properties being vested in the deities or held in trust for them by the applicant, who was the first trustee, under the terms of the proviso to S. 41 of the Act, it should be deemed that each of the deities installed in the various temples enumerated in the document has an equal share out of the income of both the properties mentioned in Schs. B and C of the document, and therefore, the assessment should be on this basis. The contention of the Department, however, is that the document really speaks of two separate trusts, one in respect of the deities and the other for the purposes of maintaining the palaces, temples, gardens, tanks, and other appurtenances; and although, in so far as Sch. B properties are concerned, it may be held that the dedication was in favour of the deities but in respect of Sch. C properties, the properties being vested in the trustee himself and not in the palaces, temples, gardens etc. which were not juridical persons, the assessment in respect of the income from Sch. C properties should be at the maximum rate under the first proviso to S. 41.

[3] The Income-tax officer held that the income of the properties mentioned in the trust deed was not receivable on behalf of any particular person; the shares of the beneficiaries being indeterminate, be, therefore, assessed at the maximum rate. The appellate Assistant Commissioner of Income-tax upheld the assessment. He observed that on the terms of the deed the individual shares of the persons on whose behalf the incomes of the trust properties were receivable were indeterminate or unknown and that the mere fact that the trustee disbursed or appropriated the income in a certain manner did not affect the legal position. When the matter came to the Income-tax Tribunal, the Tribunal was of the view that in respect of Sch. B properties mentioned in the document the income of which was wholly devoted to the worship of the deities is of the different temples, the assessment should not be at the maximum rate but at the rate applicable to each beneficiary and deity. In doing so, they relied upon a decision of this Court Sri Sri Jyotishwari Kalimata v. Commissioner of Income tax, B & O., (A. I. R (34) 1947 Pat. 178: 1946-14 I. L. R. 703. In regard to Sch. C properties, however, they took the view that the income from these properties stood on a different footing. They held that the income of these properties was to be utilised for the upkeep of the palaces, gardens, tanks, temples, etc. As these objects were not juridical persons, it could not be said that the properties were vested in them; nor could it be said that the income was to be disbursed over these objects according to some determinate shares. They, therefore, held that the assessment in respect of the income from these properties in Sch C should be at the maximum rate; in other words, they allowed the objection of the assessee in respect of Sch. B properties but rejected his claim in respect of Sch. C properties. And this they did on the basis that in their view the document created two different trusts, one for the Puja Path etc. of the deities, & the other for the maintenance of the palaces, gardens, tanks, temples, etc. They also observed that in regard to the second trust, if it had been restricted to the upkeep of temples only, it might well have been assumed that it was intended for the benefit of the deities. But the objects mentioned therein include other objects also, & therefore the principle that a trust in favour of the temple means a trust in favour of the deities installed therein, & therefore, a trust in favour of a juridical person does not apply to such a case. In my opinion, the members of the Tribunal were in error in thinking that the document created two different kinds of trusts. It is true that the provision in the document that the income from Sch. C properties was to be utilised entirely for the maintenance, upkeep, repair & preservation of the said palaces temples, gardens & other appurtenance may apparently lead to this impression; but this recital has to be read in the light of the recital in the earlier part of the para. which quite clearly shows that the intention was to provide for the performance of the daily worship of the various deities installed in the several temples of marble & masonary, all of rare architectural beauty, & also to provide for the upkeep of these monumental works of art with their appurtenances of gardens, tanks, etc. It was, therefore, in substance a dedication of all the properties to the deities of which the applicant was appointed the first trustee under the terms of the document & in making the dedication, it separately provides on the one hand for the performance of the pujas & observance of the festivals etc. & on the other for the repair & upkeep of the temples & other appurtenances.

The mere fact that the palaces, gardens & tanks have also been mentioned does not in any manner affect the position because these things go along with the temples & the idols which are installed therein. The intention of the document was not to treat these objects as separate entities, & it is difficult to hold that the trust created in respect of Sch. C properties in view of their small income was something quite apart from the trust in favour of the idols in the temples. Reading the whole para together, the impression is that they are all part & parcel of the same trust though it is enjoined upon the trustee to spend the income from the properties in the two schedules in different ways, one exclusively for the purposes of worship & the other for the upkeep of the temples, gardens & other appurtenances thereof. If the above construction of the documents is adopted, then it is quite clear that both Schs. B & C properties have the same characteristics, & in that case the income from both the properties is to be spent over determinate objects, namely, the deities which are undoubtedly juridical persons. It is true that the shares of these deities have not been defined but all the various deities have been mentioned in the document, & as such, it will have to be assumed that in the eye of law they had equal shares in the income of the properties, & in the circumstances, the income of the properties in Sch. C also should be assessed in the same manner as the income of the properties in Sch. B. The Tribunal have relied upon a decision of this Court in Sri Joytishwari Kalimata v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., A. I. R. (34) 1947 Pat. 178, which clearly lays down the principle that the income of the trust property in the hands of the trustee is not liable to be assessed at the maximum rate under the first proviso to S. 41 (1), Income tax Act, but should be assessed at the rate applicable to the individual income of each of the deities.

[4] It is contended by Mr. S. N. Dutt for the Department that it is not really a trust at all. According to him, the properties in Schs. B & C are also vested in the applicant though he holds subject to certain conditions, namely, that the income of Schs. B & C properties is to be spent for the purposes specified & earmarked in the document. In his submission, Sch. C properties have nothing to do with the deities at all. He says that the purpose for which the disbursement of these properties is to be made is entirely a different purpose, & although the temples might be included, yet there are the palaces, gardens, etc. also mentioned therein, & as it is not known that part of the income is to be spent over these palaces, gardens, etc., the amount to be spent over the temples is indeterminate. Therefore, he says that there is no option but to assess the income of the Sch. C properties at the maximum rate as it has been done by the revenue authorities. The learned counsel relies upon the finding of the Tribunal which is to the effect that there was no evidence or material to show that the palaces, gardens, tanks, etc., were parts of the temples. He points out that a trust in favour of palaces, gardens, tanks etc. would not be a trust at all. & therefore, it must be held that the properties in Sch. C were vested in the trustee himself, namely, the applicant assessee. It is true that if the disposition in respect of Sch. C properties is treated on a separate footing, then the properties would be vested in the trustee himself, but, as I have already discussed above, this interpretation will not be a correct interpretation of the document. S. 41 of the Act does not make any distinction whether the properties are vested in the trustee or vested in the benefeciaries thereof. It is only concerned with the disbursement of the income over determinate objects of the trust in defined shares or otherwise. Therefore, in my opinion, this contention is without any merit & is not sustainable in view of the true interpretation of the document.

[5] For the above reasons, the reference should be answered in the negative, & the income from the Sch. C properties should be taxed not at the maximum rate under the first proviso to S. 41, but on the same basis as the income from Sch. B properties as directed by the Tribunal already. The assessee, in the circumstances of this case, will not be entitled to any costs of the hearing of this application.

The defendant who was a sub-lessee from the plaintiff repudiated the plaintiff's title and refused to pay the rent. The plaintiff thereupon gave a notice to quit and on non-compliance of the notice brought a small cause suit for recovery of arrears of rent only till the date of suit. This suit was ultimately decreed but during this suit there was a fresh disclaimer of plaintiff's title and the plaintiff without serving any fresh notice to quit brought a suit for possession and injunction in respect of the demised premises:

Held, that the second suit was barred by O. 2, R. 2 as the plaintiff had failed to claim the relief for ejectment of the defendant on the ground of forfeiture in his previous suit for rent. It was open to the plaintiff to choose a proper forum where he could have claimed all the reliefs arising out of the same cause of action. But having failed to do so he must be deemed to have omitted to sue for these reliefs. He could not by his own choice defeat the provisions of O. 2, R. 2, Civil P. C. : A. I. R. (20) 1933 Pat. 715 and A.I.R. (18) 1931 P.C. 229, Ref. [Paras 6, 7]

Held further that the suit was not maintainable on the basis of disclaimer of plaintiff's title in the previous suit as the plaintiff had failed to give fresh notice as required by S. 111 (g), T P. Act. The previous notice to quit could not avail him as it had been waived by suing only for arrears of rent only. [Para 8]

The question whether the status of the defendant is that of sub-lessee or licensee is a mixed question of law and fact depending upon the deed of agreement and the surrounding facts and circumstances. A license as defined in S. 52, Easements Act, must be distinguished from a lease. A license does not create any interest or property in the estate of the grantor, and, therefore, a licensee is not entitled to a notice to quit before eviction. On the other hand, a lease as defined in S. 105, T. P. Act, creates an interest in immoveable property, and a notice of the intention to determine the lease is necessary before eviction. [Para 9]

A had taken a lease of certain land from the Municipality for a period of five years with option of renewal for the construction of a petrol pump and a shop. By a subsequent document described as an indenture of agreement, A agreed to tranefer to B the exclusive right of management of the shop and the petrol pump standing on the demised land in consideration of a premium of Rs. 20 per month till the time the pump continued to exist on the site. A undertook to render assistance to B in obtaining a lease of the petrol pump in his own name from the oil company. A removed the materials of the shop and in its place B constructed a new shop. B was to bear all the taxes, charges and the expenses of management and he was to continue the business in his own name. Thus A had no other interest left in the business except to receive the monthly premium :

Held, on a construction of the document and the surrounding circumstances that the document created a sub-lease and not a licence in favour of B. [Para 9]

Sarjoo Prosad J.—The defendant is the appellant in this appeal which relates to a suit for injunction and accounts. The plaintiff in the action took in lease a piece of land in Mohalla Sabzibagh of the Patna town from the City Municipality for the purpose of installing a petrol pump and erecting a shop for motor accessories. The lease was under a registered document dated 29th March 1941, for a term of five years with option for renewal for a further period of five years. After obtaining the lease, the plaintiff put up a temporary shed on the site and got a petrol pump installed, and he ran the business under the name and style of Ali & Sons. Finding some difficulties in carrying on the business, the plaintiff on 28th August 1945, entered into an agreement with the defendant. The terms of the agreement have assumed some importance in the case and may have to be referred to in some detail at a later stage in the judgment. For the present it may be sufficient to observe that the purport of the agreement was to transfer the entire management of the shop to the defendant, and the plaintiff in consideration thereof was entitled to the payment of a monthly premium of Rs. 20 only with effect from September 1945. The defendant in his turn undertook to run the business in its old name with the option to get the petrol pump transferred to his own name. By virtue of the agreement the defendant was duly let into occupation and possession of the land, and in course of the year it appears that the Standard Vacuum Oil Company transferred the lease of the petrol pump to the defendant. The lease granted by the Municipality to the plaintiff expired in March 1946, and thereafter the defendant applied to the Municipality for grant of the lease to him and changed the original name of the business. The plaintiff states that in view of this conduct of the defendant he served a notice on 9th September 1947, terminating the agreement and asking the defendant to quit the land and the business by 30th September 1947. The defendant, however, did not vacate the premises. The plaintiff then instituted a suit in the Court of Small Causes at Patna being S. C. C. Suit No. 109/99 of 1947 for recovery of arrears of premium from May 1946 to September 1947. In that suit, it is alleged, the defendant pleaded, inter alia, that the plaintiff had no title to the lease given by the Municipality after the expiry of the term of five years mentioned therein. The S. C. C. suit was decreed on 16-9-1948, and in revision the decision of the learned Judge was affirmed by this Court on 24-3-1949. The plaintiff in the meantime had filed the present suit on 27-2-1948, urging that the lease in favour of the plaintiff granted by the Municipality continued to operate and the defendant having repudiated the plaintiff's title had forfeited his right under the agreement dated 28-8-1945, to remain on the land. The plaintiff accordingly prayed for permanent injunction restraining the defendant from going near the site or working the petrol pump or having any concern with the premises. There was a further prayer for accounting and for a decree in favour of the plaintiff in respect of any sum found payable to him from the defendant.

[2] The defence to the action substantially was that the defendant had been inducted on the site by the plaintiff as a sub-leasee subject to the payment of Rs. 20 only to the latter, and that the agreement in question was not merely to transfer the right of management with respect to the concern. It was further urged that the plaintiff's lease having expired and no fresh lease having been granted to him, the suit at the instance of the plaintiff was not maintainable he having no title to the property and that no case of forfeiture had at all been made out. The defendant further averred that the present suit was barred under O. 2, R. 2, Civil P. C.

[3] The learned Munsif who tried the suit found that the plaintiff continued to be a lessee in respect of the premises but that he had failed to make out a case of forfeiture. He further held that the claim for accounts was not maintainable and that the suit was barred by O. 2, R. 2 Civil P. C. In regard to the defendant's case that the agreement constituted a sub-lease in his favour, the learned Munsif accepted the defendant's plea on a consideration of the terms of the agreement as also the surrounding circumstances and evidence in the case. On these findings he dismissed the suit.

[4] The lower appellate Court also held that the learned Munsif was justified in coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff's lease had not come to an end and the plaintiff was entitled to sue. On the question whether under the terms of the agreement dated 28-8-1945, only the right to manage the business had been transferred, the learned Subordinate Judge observed that the appellant had accepted the position that the document created a sub-lease, and that, therefore, it was unnecessary to enter into a further discussion of the matter. He, however, appears to have also found in concurrence with the learned Munsif that "It is clear from the evidence and the surrounding circumstances that the intention of the parties was to create a sub-lease in respect of the premises. Plaintiff no doubt purported to transfer the management of the petrol pump and the shop but what was in fact transferred was the lease-hold itself."

He accordingly held that the defendant's status was that of a sub-lessee. He, however, came to the conclusion that the lease in favour of the defendant had come to an end by forfeiture though there was no liability to render accounts. He accordingly allowed the appeal and decreed the suit of the plaintiff.

[5] It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge on the question of forfeiture was not maintainable at all. In my opinion there is much force in this contention. The claim of the plaintiff is based on two grounds. It is based, firstly, on the ground that when the plaintiff's lease expired on 29-3-1946, in April following the defendant repudiated the plaintiff's title and stopped paying rent. This was followed by a notice to quit given by the plaintiff asking the defendant to vacate the premises by the end of September 1946. When the defendant failed to comply with the demand in the notice, the plaintiff instituted the Small Cause Court suit to which I have already referred claiming recovery of premium due from May 1946, up to the date of the institution of the suit. The next ground on which the claim of forfeiture rests is that there was a fresh disclaimer of the plaintiff's title in the written statement which the defendant filed in the Small Cause Court suit, and the manner in which the suit was contested by the defendant. It may be stated at the outset that this written statement was found inadmissible in evidence by the learned Munsif. The learned Subordinate Judge appears to rely upon the allegation made in para. 9 of the plaint of this suit in regard to the recital in the written statement. But the learned Subordinate Judge himself characterises the allegation therein as quite vague and not worthy of any weight being attached to it. It is doubtful whether the mere recital in the plaint in the absence of the written statement in the Small Cause Court suit itself would be enough to prove the disclaimer in question. There can be, however, no dobut that one of the principal questions raised in the Small Cause Court suit was the attack on the title of the plaintiff. The Small Cause Court suit of course ended in favour of the plaintiff, but having regard to the manner in which the case was contested, there was certainly a disclaimer of the plaintiff's title. I will examine both these grounds in their order.

[6] In so far as the first ground is concerned, both the Courts below have come to the conclusion that the relief as to forfeiture claimed in the present suit should have been included in the plaint of the previous suit, and this not having been done, the relief as to forfeiture is barred under O. 2, R. 2, Civil P. C. The lower appellate Court in dealing with the point (though I must say that he has mixed up the consideration of the two aspects of forfeiture) says thus :

"Plaintiff's suit for rent for the period following the first disclaimer in April 1946 amounted to waiver of forfeiture. Plaintiff had a cause of action for ejectment or injunction on the date the S. C. C. suit was filed. He chose not to include a relief by way of ejectment or injunction in that suit. His relief as regards the arrears due and the relief by way of ejectment or injunction arose out of defendant's refusal to pay the premium on the ground of plaintiff's want of title. In other words he was entitled to two reliefs out of one and the same cause of action. Having relinquished one of the two reliefs it was not open to the plaintiff to ask for that relief in another suit. If the present suit were based on the cause of action, plaintiff's claim would manifestly have been barred under O. 2, R. 2 of the Civil Procedure Code and to that extent I entirely agree with the contention put forward on behalf of the respondent."

The decision of the two Courts below on the point appears to me to be correct. The cause of action consists of the whole bundle of facts which entitles the plaintiff to certain reliefs. It may be that a particular set of facts may be co-related to a certain kind of relief but that will not mean that those sets of facts constitute different causes of action. They all form the occasion or foundation of a suit, and with a view to avoid multiplicity of litigations the Code provides under O. 2, R. 2 that "a person entitled to more than one relief in respect of the same cause of action may sue for all or any such reliefs; but if he omits, except with the leave of the Court, to sue for all such reliefs, he shall not afterwards sue for any relief so omitted."

It is not, therefore, open to the plaintiff to cut up the different sets of facts all relating to the same cause of action but connected with a particular kind of relief in order to make the different sets the foundation for different suits. He must sue for all these reliefs together and his omission to do so disentitles him to seek the relief in a subsequent suit. The plaintiff in this case, as observed above, was entitled to sue for ejectment of the defendant on the ground of forfeiture by the time he instituted the Small Cause Court suit. He did not, however, choose to do so. Therefore his claim now on this ground evidently comes under O. 2, R. 2 (3), Civil P. C. It was held in Saqir Hassan v. Tayab Hassan, A. I. R. (27) 1940 ALL. 524 that if a person is wrongfully kept out of possession of immoveable property he is entitled to sue for possession and for mesne profits and under the provisions of O. 2, R. 2 (3) he is bound to include both claims in one suit. If he sues only for mesne profits he cannot in a subsequent suit sue separately for possession. In the present case, the plaintiff sued only for the premium due when he instituted the Small Cause Court suit but not for possession. Therefore, he cannot now on that account claim recovery of possession.

[7] It is next argued on behalf of the plaintiff that in the Small Cause Court suit there could have been no claim for recovery of possession. Now it was open to the plaintiff to chose a proper forum and he cannot by his own choice defeat the provisions of the Code. There was nothing to prevent the plaintiff from instituting the suit before another Court of competent jurisdiction where he could have claimed all the reliefs to which he was entitled under the same cause of action. As observed in Kamakhya Narain Singh v. Ramraj Singh, 14 P. L. T. 663, there is no reference in O. 2, R. 2 of the Code to the jurisdiction of the Court trying the claims, and if the plaintiff chose the Court of the Additional Subordinate Judge in the exercise of his powers as Munsif, he merely relinquished a part of his claim within the meaning of the second part of R. 2 to O. 2 of the Code. Here, as he chose a Court where the relief as to ejectment or injunction could not be granted to him, he would be deemed to have omitted to sue for these reliefs. The case relied upon on behalf of the plaintiff viz. Naba Kumar v. Radhashyam Mahish, A. I. R. (18) 1931 P. C. 229 does not help his contention at all. On the contrary, it lends support to the conclusion at which I have arrived. Their Lordships observed in that case that the relief for rent and profits which could have been prayed for in a previous suit for conveyance of properties and arising out of the same cause of action cannot be prayed for in a subsequent suit.

[8] The question then is whether the right for forfeiture could be claimed on the fresh disclaimer in the Small Cause Court suit itself. The learned Subordinate Judge thinks that the present suit is founded on the forfeiture caused by the subsequent disclaimer made in the written statement filed by the defendant in the Small Cause Court suit (vide para. 14 of the plaint). He also observes that "the fact that the S. C. C. suit was preceded by a notice is immaterial in this case. The notice must be deemed to have been waived since plaintiff claimed arrears only in the previous suit."

Therefore, on this finding the service of the previous notice to quit could not now be availed of by the plaintiff. The learned Subordinate Judge, however, thinks that any fresh notice was not necessary "inasmuch as it is a case of forfeiture caused by disclaimer". This part of the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge has been very seriously questioned before us; and I think quite rightly, having regard to the provisions of S. 111 (g) of the Transfer of Property Act. Section 111 (g) says that a lease of immoveable property determines by forfeiture in case the lessee renounces his character as such by setting up a title in third person or by claiming title in himself: but in all such cases it provides that the lessor or his transferee must give notice in writing to the lessee of his intention to determine the lease. Therefore, when there was a fresh disclaimer of title by the defendant it was the duty of the plaintiff to have given him a fresh notice in writing of his intention to determine the lease. There is no evidence in this case of any such notice having been given, and the learned Subordinate Judge was wrong in thinking that no such notice was necessary, he having himself found that the plaintiff could not take advantage of the previous notice to quit because that part of his claim was now closed by reason of the provisions of the Code stated above.

[9] Learned counsel for the respondent has, therefore, raised the most serious question that the defendant was not a lessee but a mere licensee, and therefore no notice for determining the lease was necessary. He contends that the question turns upon the interpretation of the indenture of agreement between the parties which is the document of title and is, therefore, a pure question of law. I have already stated that before the lower appellate Court it was conceded that the finding of the learned Munsif on the point that the deed of agreement created a sub-lease was correct. I have also shown that the finding of the Courts below on the point does not merely rest upon the deed of agreement but also upon the surrounding facts and circumstances of the case. But the question being a mixed question of law and fact and the inference whether the status of the defendant was that of a sub-lessee or that of a licensee: being an inference of law arising on those findings, I am not prepared to hold, as at present advised, that the concession made on behalf of the plaintiff is conclusive. I have, therefore, to examine the question on merits. Primarily, we have to decide the question on the terms of the document itself and it is only where the terms are of an ambiguous character that we can look to other evidence and circumstances bearing on the question. It has been often said : Tell me what the parties have done under the document and I will tell you what the document means." The conduct of the parties, therefore, as to how they themselves treated the agreement in question would be very material. The distinction between a lease and a license is well known. 'License' has been defined in S. 52, Indian Easements Act (5 of 1882) as "a right to do, or continue to do, in or upon the immoveable property of the grantor, something which would, in the absence of such right, be unlawful, and such right does not amount to an easement or an interest in the property."

In other words, a license does not create any interest or property in the estate of the grantcr, and, therefore, a licensee is not entitled to a notice to quit before eviction. On the other hand, a lease as defined in S. 105, Transfer of Property Act, creates an interest in immoveable property, and as I stated above, a notice of the intention to determine the lease is necessary before eviction. The distinction, therefore, in the two cases is one of substance and not of mere words. The only difficulty is to find out this distinction in a given case and sometimes the line of demarcation is very thin. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Glenwood Lumber Co. Ltd. v. Phillips, (1904) A. C. 405 made the following pertinent observation :

"If the effect of the instrument is to give the holder an exclusive right of occupation of the land, though subject to certain reservations or to a restriction of the purpose for which it may be used, it is in law a demise of land itself."

That was a case where under the document a right had been given to cut timber on the land, and the argument was that there was no demise of the land itself but a mere license to cut timber; but this argument did not find favour with their Lordships. Similarly, the Bombay High Court following the above observations of the Judicial Committee, in Sharif Dadumiyaji v. Emperor, A. I. R. (17) 1930 Bom. 165 said as follows :

"The main test for deciding whether a person is a licensee of a property or a lessee is that of exclusive possession. If the effect of the agreement is to give exclusive possession to the holder though subject to certain reservations then it is a lease if the agreement is merely for the use of the property in a certain way and on certain terms while it remains in the possession and control of the owner, it is a license."

These decisions have been followed in various other cases, for instance, Behari Lal v. Chhote, A.I.R. (20) 1933 ALL. 911 and Secretary of State v. Bhupal Chandra Ray, 57 Cal. 655 : A.I.R. (17) 1930 Cal. 739. In the Allahabad cases the document recited that so long as the donee or his sons or heirs continue to carry on the business of the said shop and the sale of goods and merchandise therein, till then the donor or his heirs would allow it to be carried on therein, but whenever the donee or his heirs close the said business and the shop becomes vacant, then the donor or his heirs would re-enter into the possession of the said shop. It also appeared in the facts of that case that the donee had exclusive possession and control of the shop so long as he carried on business thereof. He had also been made responsible for the repairs and it was quite obvious that he had the right to exclude from possession every one else including even the lawful owner, and under these circumstances their Lordships held that it was a demise of the shop itself and not merely a license to carry on the business of the said shop. In the Calcutta case a plot of land which was used as a hat or market was let out for a fixed period and for a fixed sum. The person to whom it was let out had the right to collect tolls in the market and had covenanted to keep the hat clean and not to interfere with the rent of any permanent shop and not to make alterations without the leave of the person who let it out and the former was bound to deliver possession at the end of the term. In spite of the restrictions aforesaid, it was held that the person to whom the land had been let out had sufficient control of the land and the settlement was in the circumstances construed as a lease and not as a license. The cases must of course be of an illustrative character, but keeping the above principles in view, we have to see what the document amounts to in the present case. A copy of the deed of agreement in question has been placed before us. It is termed as as an indenture of agreement and the document recites at various places that the first party (plaintiff) had agreed to transfer the management of the oil pump and the shop existing on the land to the second party (defendant). It is, therefore, argued that prima facie it was a mere transfer of management and was not a transfer of interest in immoveable property. But the document shows that the agreement was to enure indefinitely till the petrol pump existed on the present site. The petrol pump belonged to the Standard Vacuum Oil Co. and not to the plaintiff and the stipulation was that even if the Company transferred the lease of the pump to the second party, even then the second party was liable to pay the first party the monthly premium payable under the agreement till the time the pump continued to exist on the present site. The first party even undertook to render assistance to the second party in obtaining a transfer of the lease of the pump. So far as the shop is concerned it has been found that the plaintiff had removed the materials of the previous shop constructed by him before he let out the land to the defendant. The previous shed was made of tin only and the defendant after he had entered into occupation under the agreement constructed the shed at present standing on the land which is made of bricks and wood. Therefore the premium was in respect of the shop and the land both. Then again under the deed of agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant it is mentioned that all the municipal taxes, petrol taxes, electric charges, income-tax, all the expenses of the management and repairs of the road etc. shall be exclusively paid by the second party with effect from September 1945. The first party appears to have no other interest left except for the payment of the monthly premium of Rs. 20 and otherwise the second party was entitled to the exclusive use and enjoyment of the land. In fact, it has been found that he even changed the name of the business shortly after this agreement and the plaintiff did not object to the same but rather acquiesced in this act of the defendant and continued to get the rent of Rs. 20 per month only. It has been also found that with the express consent of the plaintiff, the defendant got his name registered with the Standard Vacuum Oil Company as a dealer and within a week of the agreement in his favour he began to carry on his business in the name of Mohan and Sons. These findings have been arrived at in detail by the trial Court and the appellate Court has also affirmed these findings which were not seriously questioned and in fact accepted before him. The appellate Court says :

"The subject-matter of the agreement is described at the foot of the agreement as a piece of land and then follows full particulars of that land. It is undisputed that the plaintiff ceased to have all concern with the business with effect from the date of agreement. It is conceded that plaintiff did not invest any capital in the business which was run by the defendant. The entire capital was invested by the defendant himself. Further plaintiff was not to have any concern with the profit or loss is what he described in his evidence in Court as defendant's business. Defendant was certainly not the agent of the plaintiff or an employee under him. The agreement between the parties provided that if defendant so liked he could get the petrol pump itself transferred to his name. This in fact was done soon after the close of the agreement. Even the name of the business was changed by the defendant a week after the agreement. Plaintiff has admitted that he never got the license for selling petrol renewed in his name after the close of the agreement. The original lease in favour of the plaintiff was also made over to the defendant. Plaintiff's allegation in the plaint that defendant was merely a manager cannot therefore be accepted. It is manifest that he has no manner of concern with the business and that the monthly premium payable to him was nothing but rent payable for the premises."

The conduct of the parties itself indicates that the intention was to treat the agreement not as a mere license but as a document creating a lease in favour of the defendant a demise in property because the defendant was entitled to the enjoyment of the property even to the exclusion of the plaintiff so long as the petrol pump stood on the land and the only right which the plaintiff had was to get the monthly premium. In my opinion, the document, therefore, created a demise in property, and the finding of the two Courts below that there was a sub-lease in favour of the defendant is entirely correct. Whatever doubts there may have been on the construction of the document are more than dispelled by the surrounding circumstances of the case and the conduct of the parties. I have, therefore, no hesitation in holding that the decision of the Courts below on the point is justified. That being so, the conclusion is that the defendant was entitled to a notice determining the lease as provided by S. 111 (g), Transfer of Property Act, and that not having been done, the plaintiff's suit in ejectment cannot succeed.

[10] I would accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the learned Subordinate Judge and restore that of the learned Munsif with costs throughout.

[11] Das J.—I must admit that I have been of a divided mind as to the true construction of the indenture of agreement dated 28-8-1945.

[12] The document is described as an indenture of agreement, it does not expressly say anything about transference of any interest in the leasehold, though it talks of management of the shop, transfer of the petrol pump etc., at the foot, it describes the land, as though the description were not that of a property demised but rather of a property over which the right of holding the shop would be exercised. These are circumstances in favour of the view that it is a mere license.

[13] On the other hand, there are the circumstances pointed out by my learned brother; exclusive right of possession, building of a new shop, starting of the business under a new name etc. These are circumstances in favour of the view taken by the Courts below and accepted by my learned brother.

[14] I would myself prefer the test 'whether any interest in the property has been given or not', rather than the test of 'possession'; because a licensee may also possess the property for exercising the right given to him by the grantor. But an exclusive right to possess, as distinguished from mere permissive possession would, I think, turn the scale in favour of a lease, that is, a transfer of interest in the property itself. The power to exclude others including the grantor is hardly consistent with permissive possession, and would indicate a transfer of interest rather than a mere permission to exercise a right. Therefore, I would now yield to the view that on a proper construction the indenture of agreement is a lease rather than a license.

[15] I agree with my learned brother in his conclusions on the bar of O. 2, R. 2, Civil P. C. and the necessity of a notice under S. 111 (g), Transfer of Property Act.

[16] The appeal must, therefore, be allowed with costs, as directed by him.

Partnership Act (1932), S. 69 (3) (a) — Application under S. 8 of the Arbitration Act (1940).

Even a suit for dissolution of partnership and accounting is not barred under S. 69. Where in a title suit by a partner, after a notice to the other partner dissolving the partnership, the defendant files an application in the Court for referring the matter in dispute to arbitration under S. 8 of the Arbitration Act the case stands on a better footing. The application is not barred under S. 69 and is covered by S. 69 (3) (a). A. I. R. (26) 1939 All. 735, Rel. on. A. I. R. (27) 1940 Nag. 78, Dissent. [Paras 6, 7]

C. P. Sinha J.—This is an application in revision on the following facts. There was a partnership business between one Mahendra Lal Kushiary, the present petitioner, and one Gobinda Chandra Chakravarty for the purpose of running a motor business in the name and style of Sarju Motor Company. Later on Gurdeyal Singh, opposite party, agreed to join the partnership business in place of Gobinda Chandra Chakravarty, and a deed of agreement dated 17-3-1948, was executed by the present opposite party. One of the conditions of the agreement was that in case of any dispute or difference between the parties the matter would be referred to arbitration. Subsequently, difference arose between the parties and the petitioner Mahendra Lal Kushiary sent a notice to the applicant on 17-1-1950 dissolving the partnership, and later on he also filed a title suit No. 44 of 1950 in the Court of the Munsif, Hazaribagh Gurdeyal Singh, the opposite party filed an application before the learned Subordinate Judge for referring the matter in dispute to arbitration under the provision of S. 8, Arbitration Act, and the learned Subordinate Judge allowed the application on hearing the parties, and decided to refer the matter to arbitration, and the parties were called upon to suggest names of arbitrators within a time fixed by the Court, and the suit pending before the learned Munsif was stayed.

[2] The present petitioner having felt aggrieved by the order of the learned Subordinate Judge referring the matter in dispute to arbitration filed an application in revision in this Court (Civil Revision No 496 of 1950). This application however, was dismissed on 3-8-1950. Having failed in this Court, the petitioner filed an application under S. 151, Civil P. C. in the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Hazaribagh, for reviewing the order of 12 7-1950, sending the matter to arbitration. The ground of review made out in the application was that as the partnership consisting of the petitioner and the opposite party was not a registered partnership under the provisions of the Indian Partnership Act (IX of 1932), S. 69 of that Act was a bar to the application for sending the matter in dispute to arbitration, and that, therefore, the order of 12-7-1950, passed by the Court below was without jurisdiction. This application in review has been dismissed by the Court below and hence this application in revision to this Court.

[3] It has been argued, as was argued in the Court below, that S. 69 of the Partnership Act was a bar to the application of the opposite party for sending the matter in dispute to arbitration and the order sending the same to arbitration was without jurisdiction. The learned counsel appearing for the opposite party has argued, firstly, that in view of the order in Civil Revision No. 496 of 1950 of this Court. no such application for review of the order of the Court below, dated 12 7-1950, lay in the Court below, and, secondly, that S. 69 of the Indian Partnership Act has no application to the facts of the present case.

[4] It is true that the order, sending the matter in dispute between the parties having been affirmed by the order of this Court in the aforesaid Civil Revision No. 496 of 1950, the decision of the learned Court below dated 12-7-1950, was binding between the parties thereto as it became final when the application in revision against that order was dismissed by this Court, and in that view of the matter it was not open to the petitioner to re-open the matter again. But the matter in regard to the bar of S. 69 of the Partnership Act has been argued by both the parties, and I consider that to decide the case finally, it is necessary to give our opinion in regard to the application or non-application of S. 69, to the facts of the present case.

[5] Section 69 (3) of the Partnership Act lays down:

"The provisions of sub-sections (1) and (2) shall apply also to a claim of set-off or other proceeding to enforce a right arising from a contract, but shall not affect —.

(a) the enforcement of any right to sue for the dissolution of a firm, or for accounts of a dissolved firm, or any right or power to realise the property of a dissolved firm. . ."

The provisions contained in sub-ss. (1) and (2) bar suits in certain circumstances as mentioned in those two sub-sections, but clauses (a) and (b) of sub-s (3) of S. 69, engraft an exception upon the provisions contained in sub-ss. (1) and (2) of S. 69. The language of clause (a) of S. 69 (3) on the very face of it shows that there is no bar to enforce a right to sue for the dissolution of a firm or for accounts of a dissolved firm, or any right or power to realise the property of such a firm, and this view has been upheld in Shibba Mal v. Gulab Rai, I. L. R. (1940) ALL. 26. That was a suit for dissolution of partnership and rendition of accounts. In that case the defendants to the suit, had taken the objection that the provisions of S 69 are a bar to the maintainability of that suit, but their Lordships held that the right of a partner of an unregistered firm to obtain a decree for dissolution of the partnership and for accounts remained unaffected by the provisions of sub-ss. (1) and (2) of S. 69, in view of the proviso contained in sub-s. 3 (a) of S. 69 of the Partnership Act, and they rejected the plea of the defendants in bar of the suit. While disposing of this point, their Lordships made the following observations:

"In our judgment the intention of the legislature is plain. It intended that the rights of the partners of an unregistered firm in regard to dissolution of the partnership and accounting were to remain unaffected by the provisions of Sub-sections (1) and (2) of Section 69 of the Partnership Act."

It is thus clear on the authority of this Full Bench judgment that even a suit for dissolution of partnership and accounting is not barred under the provisions of S. 69, Partnership Act. The present case, however, stands on a better footing inasmuch as no suit had been filed in this case but an application was made to the Court below under the provisions of S. 8, Indian Arbitration Act. In my opinion, therefore, S. 69 of the Act was no bar to the application for sending the matter in dispute to arbitration.

[6] The learned counsel appearing on behalf of the petitioner has cited before us a decision in Chhotelal Nanakram v. Gopaldas Gulabdas, A. I. R. (27) 1940 Nag. 78. This judgment is a judgment by a single Judge of the Nagpur High Court and it is in regard to the application of S. 69 (1), Partnership Act, and his Lordship decided in that case that S. 69 (1) bars a suit by a partner of a firm although the firm may have been dissolved before the suit was filed. That case, however, has not been followed in a later decision and now it can be taken as established that persons who were the partners of a dissolved firm can bring a suit for dissolution of partnership and accounts, and that S. 69 (1) and (2) is no bar to such a suit.

[7] Our attention has been drawn by the learned counsel appearing for the opposite party to a decision in Damodhar Gulabrao v. Kushal Laxman, A. I. R. (30) 1943 Nag. 12 in which the case in Chhotelal Nanakram v. Gopaldas Gulabdas, A. I. R. (27) 1940 Nag. 78, was distinguished, and his Lordship Vivian Bose J. said with reference to A. I. R. (27) 1940 Nag. 78 that he need not consider whether the decision referred to in A. I. R. (27) 1940 Nag. 78, required reconsideration. With very great respect to the learned Judge who decided the case in A. I R. (27) 1940 Nag. 78, I do not feel bound by the decision arrived at in that case. In my opinion, therefore, the provisions of S. 69, are no bar to the maintainability of the application made by the opposite party under S. 8 of the Arbitration Act, and that the same is covered by the provisions contained in the exception-section 69 (3) (a) of that Act.

[8] In the result, the application is without merit and must be dismissed with costs, hearing fee two gold mohurs.

Misc. Judicial Case No. 155 of 1948, D/- 7-3-1951.

(a) Sales Tax—Bihar Sales Tax Act (VI[6]of 1944), S. 2 (c)—Dealer—Meaning of.

Where in spite of the deed of partnership entered into by the assessee with other parties which was more in the nature of an administrative arrangement for supervision of the Factory on the basis of a local directorate subject to certain terms about remuneration to the partners concerned the assessee, who signed the contract with the Government, remained responsible to the Government for the supply of dehydrated meat :

Held that the assessee was a dealer though actual work of production of the dehydrated meat was entrusted to a separate concern. [Para 3]

(b) Sales Tax—Bihar Sales Tax Act (VI [6] of 1944), S. 2 (g)—"Sale"—Meaning.

Where according to the terms of the contract the plant and machineries were provided by the Government, dressed goat-meat was supplied to the assessee by another contractor at a fixed price on certain terms agreed to between the Government of India and that contractor but the assessee himself paid for the dressed meat at a price fixed by the Government and the assessee was entitled to receive payment from the Government of India according to a fixed scale for the dehydrated meat including the cost of containers and packing :

Held that there was a transfer of property for valuable consideration and therefore a "sale". [Para 4]

(c) Sales Tax—Bihar Sales Tax Act (VI [6] of 1944), S. 10 (5)—Wilful default.

Where the assessee bona fide believed that the sale of the dehydrated meat being made to the department of the Government of India was not liable to be charged with sales tax, but after he was informed of the decision of the Government of Bihar to the contrary he promptly applied for registration to the appropriate authorities :

Held that there was no wilful default committed by the assessee within the meaning of S. 10 (5) and the penalty imposed by the Sales Tax authorities ought not to have been levied. [Para 6]

(d) Sales Tax — Bihar Sales Tax Act (VI [6] of 1944), S. 4 (1)—Applicability.

For S. 4 (1) to operate, it is not necessary that the business which the assessee carried on in 1943-44 should be the same business which he started in 1944-45. [Para 5]

S. N. Dutt and S. C. Sinha—for Petitioner ; Government Advocate—for Opposite Party.

Ramaswami J. — In pursuance of an order of the High Court, this reference is made by the petitioner under S. 25 (3), Bihar Sales Tax Act, 1947.

[2] The questions formulated for the determination of the High Court are :

(1) "Whether in the circumstances of the case the assessee was a dealer within the meaning of S. 2 (c), Bihar Sales Tax Act, 1944. (2) whether the assessee was liable to pay sales tax in respect of the quarters ending 31 12-1944 and 31-3-1945, and (3) whether the assessee was liable to pay the penalty."

[3] As regards the first question, it was contended by Mr. S. N. Dutt on behalf of the assessee that according to the agreement dated 23-3 1944, the actual work of production of dehydrated meat in the Digha Factory was entrusted to a separate concern. In support of his argument learned counsel referred us to paras. 7 and 9 of the deed of partnership which is printed at p. 23 of the paper-book. But the argument of the learned counsel is not tenable since on a perusal of all the terms of the deed of partnership it would appear that the agreement was more in the nature of an administrative arrangement for supervision of the Digha Factory on the basis of a local directorate subject to certain terms about remuneration including commission to the partners concerned. The contract which the assessee executed with the Government of India for supply of dehydrated meat has not been printed on behalf of the assessee. According to the statement of the case it appears that the contract was signed by Messrs Amin Brothers who continued to be responsible to the Government of India for supply of dehydrated meat in spite of the circumstance that the assessee had entered into a deed of partnership with other parties. Upon these facts it is clear that the assessee was a dealer within the meaning of S. 2 (c), Bihar Sales Tax Act.

[4] On the second question, Mr. S. N. Dutt stressed the argument that the assessee was a mere labour contractor and he had not entered into any contract with the Government of India for sale of goods within the meaning of S. 2 (g), Bihar Sales Tax Act. As I have mentioned, the contract between the assessee and the Government of India has not been printed but the findings of the Board of Revenue are that according to the terms of the contract the plant and machineries were provided by the Government, dressed goat meat was supplied to the assessee by another contractor at a fixed price on certain terms agreed to between the Government of India and that contractor. It is important to notice that the assessee himself paid for the dressed meat at a price fixed by the Government and that the assessee was entitled to receive payment from the Government of India according to a fixed scale for the dehydrated meat including the cost of containers and packing. The Board of Revenue has found that according to the stipulation of the contract an inclusive price was fixed for process meant to be packed in sealed containers at a prescribed rate. To my mind there is no doubt that there was a transfer of property for valuable consideration and therefore a "sale" within the meaning of S. 2 (g) of the Bihar Sales Tax Act. The contention of the assessee on this point fails.

[5] It was argued on behalf of the assessee that he was not liable to pay sales tax for the quarters ending 31-12-1944 and 31 3-1945 since S. 4 (2) of the Act enacts that the dealer shall be liable to pay tax

"with effect from three months after the commencement of the year immediately following that during which his gross turnover first exceeded Rs. 5000."

In this case it was pointed out that the assessee started the business of manufacturing dehydrated meat at Digha Ghat on 17-4-1944. The Bihar Sales Tax Act received assent of the Governor-General on 29-5-1944 and was published in the Bihar Gazette of 16-6-1944, from which date it came into force. It was argued that under S. 4 (2) of the Act, the assessee was not liable to pay tax in 1944-45 but that he was liable to pay tax only from April 1945, since the gross turnover exceeded Rs. 5000 in 1944 45 and indeed the business commenced in that year. In my opinion the argument of the learned counsel is untenable for the liability upon the assessee is imposed in this case not under S. 4 (2) but under S. 4 (1) of the Act which states :

"Subject to the provisions of Ss. 5 and 6 and with effect from such date as the Provincial Government may, by notification in the official Gazette, appoint, being not earlier than thirty days after the date of the said notification, every dealer whose gross turnover during the year immediately preceding the commencement of this Act exceeded Rs. 5000 shall be liable to pay tax under this Act on sales effected after the date so notified."

It was, however, contended by the learned counsel that the dealer admittedly commenced the business of dehydrated meat on 17-4 1944 and it cannot be said that his gross turnover in 1943-44 exceeded the sum of Rs. 5000 as required by S. 4 (1). In this context definition of the word "dealer" in S. 2 (c) is important. In S. 2 (c) "dealer" is defined to mean

"any person who carries on the business of selling or supplying goods in Bihar, whether for commission, remuneration or otherwise . . . ."

It is the admitted case that the assessee was carrying on business in Bihar from before and that he had been registered for the year 1943-44 under the Bihar Sales Tax for the business he had been carrying on in Ranchi. Learned counsel argued that the business which the assessee had carried on in 1943-44 should be the identical business of dehydrated meat in order that the provisions of S. 4 (1) may operate. But there is no warrant for construing the word "dealer" in any such manner. For the definition of the word "dealer" in S. 2 (c) is wide and unqualified—"any person who carries on the business of selling and supplying goods in Bihar . . . .". For S. 4 (1) to operate it is not necessary that the business which the assessee carried on in 1943-44 should be the same business of dehydrated meat which he started in Digha Ghat in 1944-45. In my opinion the assessee was liable under S. 4 (1) read with S. 2 (c) to pay sales tax in respect of the two quarters in question.

[6] On the question of penalty, one case of the assessee stands on a better footing. It was pointed out by the learned counsel that there was a long correspondence between the Government of India and the Bihar Government as regards the liability to sales tax of dehydrated meat. From letter no. 13, printed at page 27 of the paper book, it appears that the Government of India requested the Bihar Government that the entire output of the factory should be exempted from the sales tax on the ground that the factory was a Central Government property and was producing dehydrated meat exclusively for the defence service. The correspondence was continued for some time but on 24-10-1945 the Government of India intimated to the assessee that Bihar Government had expressed their inability to exempt sales to the Food Department from Bihar Sales Tax Act. After this intimation was received the assessee applied to get himself registered to the Sales Tax authorities. It was urged by the learned counsel that the assessee bona fide believed that the sale of the dehydrated meat being made to the department of the Government was not liable to be charged with sales tax. After he was informed of the decision of the Government of Bihar he promptly applied for registration to the appropriate authorities. Learned counsel also referred to a letter dated 22-12-1944, addressed by the Sales Tax Officer to the assessee, to the effect that meat was exempt from sales tax and the business need not be registered under the Bihar Sales Tax Act (vide Annexure A, printed at p. 5 of the paper book). Upon these facts it is clear that there was no wilful default committed by the assessee within the meaning of S. 10 (5) of the Act and the penalty imposed by the Sales Tax authorities ought not to have been levied. I would therefore answer this question in favour of the assessee.

[7] Since the assessee has failed as regards the other two questions I hold that he should pay costs of this reference. Hearing fee Rs. 250.

Misc. Judicial Case No. 37 of 1949, D/- 1-3-1951.

Income-tax Act (1922), S. 33 — Decision of appeal by appellate Tribunal without setting aside order of remand.

The assessee firm was assessed to income-tax for the year 1945-46 on a total income which included three sums of cash-credits which appeared in the accounts of the partners. The Income-tax Officer treated these cash amounts as secreted profits of the firm and assessed them as such. On appeal the Appellate Assistant Commissioner of Income-tax held that the question of the cash credit should be re-examined after a scrutiny of the goods, accounts and the books in general. The appellate Tribunal set aside the findings of the Appellate Assistant Commissioner in regard to the said amount claimed as cash credit by the assessee. But the Tribunal at one place in their judgment when disposing of the appeal observed thus: "As the examination of the accounts is the subject matter of remand order passed by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner, we do not wish to express any opinion on that point:"

Held that although there was some anomaly created by the observation made by the tribunal in regard to the remand order passed by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner yet in view of their definite and categorical finding that the amount was not cash credit as claimed by the assessee but secreted profits, the anomaly was not such as to vitiate the decision of the Tribunal. [Para 1]

Anno. Income-tax Act, S. 33, N. 1.

Baldeva Sahay, B. N. Jain and Tarkeshwar Prasad —for Petitioner; S. N. Dutta — for Opposite Party.

Sarjoo Prosad J.—This is a reference made under S. 66 (2) of the Income-tax Act by the Income-Tax Appellate Tribunal, Allahabad Bench, under the directions of this Court. The assessee is a firm called Jitanram Nirmalram. The firm was assessed to income-tax for the year 1945-46 on a total income of Rs. 3,12,331. This amount included three sums of cash-credits which appeared in the accounts of the partners. They are as follows: a sum of Rs. 1,46,126 given by the partner Ramchandram, a sum of Rs. 55,871 by the partner Lachminarain and a sum of Rs. 73,121, by the partner Vishnu Prasad. The Income-tax Officer treated these cash amounts as secreted profits of the firm and assessed them as such. On appeal the Appellate Assistant Commissioner of Income-tax held that the sum of Rs. 2,75,178 may have been the sale proceeds of family ornaments as claimed by the assessee. The concluding part of his order is in the following terms:

"As the I. T. O. has not mentioned the defects in the goods accounts and has not properly scrutinised them and even though the additions made by the I. T. O. cannot be maintained, the case should go back to the I. T. O. for re-examination of the goods accounts and the books in general. Hence this portion of the order of the I.T.O. will be set aside. The cash credit addition must go and the I. T. O. will re-examine the position by reference to the account books in the light of the facts and figures mentioned in paras. 27 to 29 above."

It may be stated here that paras. 27 to 29 of his order relate to the consideration of the point as to whether the profits shown by the assessee were prima facie ridiculously low and this point again the Appellate Assistant Commissioner was considering in connection with the argument of the Income-tax Officer rejecting the contention of the assessee in regard to the cash credit amount. Against the order of the Appellate Assistant Commissioner there was an appeal to the Tribunal under S. 33 (2) of the Income-tax Act mainly on the ground that the Appellate Assistant Commissioner was wrong in holding that the cash credits of Rs. 2,75,178 did not represent secreted income as held by the Income-tax Officer. The Appellate Tribunal set aside the findings of the Appellate Assistant Commissioner in regard to the said amount claimed as cash credit by the assessee and allowed the appeal of the department. The Tribunal held as follows:

"Taking into account all the facts and circumstances of the case and disbelieving the story of the receipt of the ornaments through the partition by the members of the family, we hold that the cash credits in question remain un-explained and the assessee's explanation about them is false. We further hold that they are secreted profits of the business and are liable to be added to the income of the firm. We, therefore, reverse the findings of the Appellate Assistant Commissioner on this point and affirm the findings of the Income-tax Officer in this respect."

It is on these facts that a reference was called for on two points formulated by this Court. They are :

"(1) Whether the Appellate Tribunal was justified in law and in the circumstances of this case in deciding the appeal without setting aside the order of remand passed by the Assistant Commissioner of Income-tax by which he directed the Income-tax Officer to examine the goods accounts.

(2) Whether the Appellate Tribunal was justified in giving a finding as to whether Rs. 2,75,178 represented secreted profits from business assessable in 1945-46 before the completion of examination of the accounts as directed by the remand order of the Assistant Commissioner of Income-tax."

The second point is really involved in the first point. In order to understand the implication of the points formulated, it should be mentioned that the Tribunal at one place in their judgment when disposing of the appeal observed thus:

"As the examination of the accounts is the subject matter of remand order passed by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner, we do not wish to express any opinion on that point; but there appears to be certainly much force in the remarks of the Income-Tax Officer that even by an addition of the cash credits in question amounting to Rs. 2,75,178, the percentage of the net profits of the appellant does not go upto more than 5.3% and the gross profits to more than 6.3.%

It is contended on behalf of the assessee that the Tribunal having expressly observed that they wanted to give no opinion on the point of the examination of the accounts which was the subject-matter of the remand order passed by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner they have erred in law in disposing of the appeal. The direction of the Assistant Commissioner was that the question of the cash credit should be re-examined after a scrutiny of the goods accounts and the books in general and so long as it had not been done, which was the real purport of the remand order with which the Tribunal did not propose to interfere, it is urged that the decision of the Tribunal on the question was not in accordance with law. In other words, the real point at issue between the parties is whether the judgment of the Tribunal in deciding about this question of the cash credit was in accordance with law in view of its observation that it did not propose to express any opinion on the subject-matter of the remand order passed by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner. There is no doubt that prima facie there is force in this contention of the assessee. But a closer examination of the question makes it clear that the Tribunal did expressly hold that the explanation of the assessee in regard to these cash credit figures was false and that they were secreted profits of the business and therefore liable to be assessed as the income of the firm. This finding they have arrived at after a full consideration of all the materials bearing on the point. The examination of the books of account as directed by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner would not, in my opinion, advance the matter very far because even taking the best view in favour of the assessee all that it might come to is that the accounts are genuine. Even then it was open to the Tribunal to come to a finding that these are secreted profits which could not be sufficiently explained by the examination of the accounts, specially when the explanation of the assessee otherwise has been found to be false. In my opinion no useful purpose would be served directing that the decision of the Appellate Tribunal should be set aside and that the matter should be reheard by the Tribunal on this question because the Tribunal having considered the material bearing on this point would not be expected to come to a different finding. In my opinion, therefore, although there is some anomaly created by the observation made by the tribunal in regard to the remand order passed by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner yet in view of their definite and categorical finding that this amount of Rs. 2,75,178 was not cash credit as claimed by the assessee but secreted profits, the anomaly is not such as to vitiate the decision of the Tribunal. The reasons which have been given by the Tribunal for coming to that finding appear to me otherwise sound. An appeal to the Tribunal did lie as against any order passed by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner and it was within the competence of the Tribunal to pass such orders as they thought fit on the appeal which came up for consideration before them. Therefore it was entirely within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal to decide this question as to whether the sum of Rs. 2,75,178 was secreted profits of the business assessable during the period or it was cash credit as claimed by the assessee. For these reasons I hold that the finding of the Tribunal on the point is not erroneous and the Tribunal was justified in coming to such a finding. The points, therefore, formulated for our decision have to be answered in the affirmative. The department is entitled to its costs of this reference. Hearing fee Rs. 250.

(a) Arbitration Act (1940), S. 30 — Award — Extent of finality — Power of Court to set aside.

The law as to how far finality attaches to the decision of an arbitrator may be summarised thus; The award if baldly stated without giving any reason for it, cannot be assailed even if it be against fact or repugnant to law. In other words, the award is not open to judicial review. But if a reference to arbitration be made generally and not specifically, and the arbitrator enunciates a proposition of law and states his own view of the law as a ground of his award, such an award is open to attack in a court of law and is liable to be set aside if there be an error of law apparent on the face of it. So also, if the arbitrator construes a document and gives his own construction or interpretation of the document as a reason for the award, it is open to the Court to examine the reason and set aside the award if the error in the construction is apparent on the face of the award. If, however, a reference is made specifically and a dispute relating either to fact or to law is submitted to the arbitrator for his decision, his award cannot be challenged even if there be an error of fact or law, or both, apparent on the face of the award. LAKSHMIKANTA JHA, C. J.: This is an appeal by the defendant (the Union of India) in a suit instituted by the plaintiff-respondent for the enforcement of an award given by an arbitrator appointed under an arbitration clause in an agreement between the parties which provided for settlement of all disputes arising between them.

(2) The Central Public Works Department invited tenders for the manufacture and supply of four crores of bricks on the 23rd September, 1945, for what is known as the Sindri Fertiliser project. Seth Prem Chand Satram Das, the plaintiff in the present suit, was one of the persons who offered to manufacture and supply bricks at certain rates. His tender was accepted by the Superintending Engineer, Bihar Central Circle, by his letter dated the 1st November, 1945, and he was given a contract for the supply of 1 1/2 crores of bricks at his tender rates. A deed of agreement was executed and signed by the plaintiff and the Additional Chief Engineer, New Delhi, on behalf of the appellant, and a delivery schedule was appended showing the number of bricks to be supplied by the plaintiff month by month from January to May, 1946.

(3) The case of the plaintiff is that he performed his part of contract and kept bricks in readiness for supply according to the schedule appended to the contract. But for certain reasons the bricks were not removed from the kiln sites, though they were manufactured and made ready for delivery, as required by the delivery schedule, and this caused, according to the plaintiff, serious dislocation in the manufacture of bricks. His case is that he had to acquire 10 bighas of land at the rate of Rs. 200/- per bigha which included the cost of preparing and levelling the land for the stacking of the bricks of which delivery could not be taken. It is not disputed that the plaintiff was paid, at the contract rate, the full price of the bricks which he was ordered to manufacture, but his case is that he suffered loss on various counts by reason of the defendant's failure to remove the bricks according to the agreement. He therefore submitted his claims under various heads and submitted a bill to the Chief Engineer for the reimbursement of the losses suffered by him. The Chief Engineer refused to make any payment on account of any loss. Thereupon the plaintiff applied for arbitration according to the arbitration clause of the agreement. It appears from the Additional Chief Engineer's letter that he appointed Mr. Dixon, the Superintending Engineer of the Circle, as the arbitrator and the plaintiff was asked to submit his case to the arbitrator on the date to be fixed by him. The plaintiff accordingly submitted his claims in writing to Mr. Dixon, for his decision, and preferred his claims under eighteen heads. A sum of Rs. 1,65,893/- was claimed by the plaintiff before the arbitrator under different heads and a further sum was also claimed by way of interest at 6 per cent., per annum for two years; in all Rs. 2,01,371/- was claimed by the plaintiff before the arbitrator, including interest. No objection was filed in writing on behalf of the appellant, but the Executive Engineer appearing before the arbitrator on behalf of the Central Public Works Department objected to the claims orally. Mr. Dixon, after hearing the parties, awarded a sum of Rs. 1,20,560/9/- as against the plaintiff's claim of Rs. 2,01,371/-, by his order dated the 1st May, 1949, and directed the amount to be paid on or before the 1st June, 1949, failing which interest at 6 per cent per annum from the 1st June, 1949, was to be paid by the appellant.

(4) The plaintiff filed the present suit for enforcement of the award and prayed that the award be accepted and a decree passed in terms of the award. The suit was contested and the objection of the Union was only in respect of claims Nos. 3, 4, 6, 8, 13 and 17. The award regarding claim No. 6 relating to sale tax was set aside, but the rest of the award was affirmed. With this modification the learned Subordinate Judge directed a decree to be made in terms of the award.

(5) The dispute before us is now confirmed only to claims Nos. 3, 4, 8, 13 and 17, which are as follows:

"'Claim No. 3: Payment for the purchase of an additional ten bighas of land for stacking bricks. Rs. 1285 (i.e. Rs. 2000/- less Rs. 715/- already paid).

'Claim No. 4': Payment on account of additional wages paid to labourers because of non-availability of ration and cloth Rs. 37,215/-10-0.

'Claim No. 8': Payment for the loss of 47 lacks of kuchcha bricks which were destroyed by rain: Rs. 40,537/-

'Claim No. 13': Payment for loss sustained as the result of brick fields not being freed for lease to intending lessees and suspension for brick manufacturing business — Rs. 25,000/-.

'Claim No. 17': Payment of interest @ 6 per cent per annum for 2 years on account of delay in settling dues."

(6) The contention of Mr. Lal Narain Sinha, for the Union, is that the award in respect of all these five items is illegal and ought to be set aside because the error in law is apparent upon the face of the award. He, however, concedes that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree according to the award for the claims in respect of which there is no illegality in the award apparent on the face of it. He does not want us to remit the award to the arbitrator for reconsideration in case we are satisfied that there is an error apparent on the face of the award in respect of any of the claims. Nor is it necessary to do so because the award in respect of each claim is self-contained and separable. Even if the award in respect of any claim be held to be bad, the rest of it can be maintained without any prejudice to either party. The point for our consideration, therefore, is whether the award is bad in law in respect of any of the five claims mentioned above.

(7) Domestic tribunal was not unknown to India. Statutory recognition was given to it during the British rule and now the whole law on the subject has been incorporated in the Indian Arbitration Act, 1940. With the growth of trade in India it has become almost a regular practice with the businessmen to insert an arbitration clause in almost every agreement providing for settlement of all disputes by an arbitrator. Whenever a dispute is submitted to an arbitrator, his decision becomes final. The arbitrator is constituted the sole and final judge of all questions both of law and of fact. The decision of an arbitrator, though sacrosanct, can be challenged for his "judicial misconduct", which does not necessarily imply moral turpitude, but may consist "in making a mistake in law, and letting it be visible on the face of his award": 'Saleh Mahomed v. Nathoomal', 54 Ind. App. 427 at p. 430). The test for the determination of judicial misconduct of the arbitrator has been laid down in number of cases.

(8) In 'Hodgkinson v. Fernie', (1857) 3 C. B. (N. S.) 189: 140 E. R. 712, which is a leading case on the point, Williams, J. stated the grounds on which an award can be successfully assailed. In that case the allegation of the plaintiff was that his ship had been run down owing to the negligent navigation of the defendant's ship. At the trial a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for damages. The amount of damages was referred to be assessed by an arbitrator. The arbitrator awarded a lump sum. The defendant sought to show by affidavit that the arbitrator had included an item which ought to have been rejected. It was held that the award could not be interfered with because there was no error on the face of the award. Williams, J. stated the law thus:

"The law has for many years been settled, and remains so at this day, that, where a cause or matters in difference are referred to an arbitrator, whether a lawyer or a layman, he is constituted the sole and final judge of all questions both of law and fact ..... The only exceptions to that rule are, cases where the award is the result of corruption or fraud, and one other, which though it is to be regretted, is now, I think, firmly established, viz., where the question of law necessarily arises on the face of the award, or upon some paper accompanying and forming part of the award. Though the propriety of this latter may very well be doubted, I think it may be considered as established".

(9) 'In Champsey Bhara & Co. v. Jivaraj Balloo Spinning & Weaving Co., Ltd.', 50 Ind App 324, which was a case under the Indian Arbitration Act, 1899, Lord Dunedin, on a review of the decisions of the English courts, stated the law thus:

"An error in law on the face of the award means, in their Lordships' view, that you can find in the award or a document actually incorporated thereto, as for instance a note appended by the arbitrator stating the reasons for his judgment, some legal proposition which is the basis of the award and which you can then say is erroneous".

At another place he stated:

"The question of whether an arbitrator acts within his jurisdiction is, of course, for the court to decide, but whether the arbitrator acts within his jurisdiction or not depends solely upon the clause of reference. It is, therefore, for the Court to decide in his case whether the dispute which has arisen is a dispute covered by R. 13 of the Association. It clearly is so, because it is undoubtedly a dispute arising out of or in relation to a contract made subject to the rules and regulations of the Cotton Trade Association. Now that clause refers to the arbitrator the whole question whether it depends on law or on fact, with the exception only of dispute as to quality".

The principle enunciated in this case was followed and reaffirmed by the Privy Council in 'Saleh Mahomed v. Nathoomal', 54 Ind App 427. It is not profitable to examine other cases relevant to the point because the case law bearing on the question was examined by the Houses of Lords in 'F. R. Absalom, Ltd. v. Great Western (London) Garden Village Society, Ltd.', 1933 A. C. 592. The learned law Lords on a review of the case law bearing on the point stated the law in clear and unambiguous terms. Lord Russell of Killowen observed at page 607:

"It is, I think, essential to keep the case where disputes are referred to an arbitrator in the decision of which a question of law becomes material distinct from the case in which a specific question of law has been referred to him for decision. I am not sure that the court of Appeal has done so. The authorities make a clear distinction between these two cases, and, as they appear to me, they decide that in the former case the court can interfere if any when any error of law appears on the face of the award, but that in the latter case no such interference is possible upon the ground that it so appears that the decision upon the question of law is an erroneous one".

In the same case Lord Wright enunciated the law thus:

"The rule in truth applies to the ordinary case where, in the words of Lord Dunedin in 'Champsey Bhara & Co. v. Jivraj Balloo Spinning & Weaving Co. Ltd.', (1923) A C 480, at p. 489), the submission refers 'to the arbitrator the whole question whether it depends on law or on fact'. To be contrasted with such cases there is the special type of case where a different rule is in force, so that the court will not interfere even though it is manifest on the face of the award that the arbitrator has gone wrong in law. This is so when what is referred to the arbitrator is not the whole question, whether involving both fact or law, but only some specific question of law in express terms as the separate question submitted; that is to say, where a joint of law is submitted as such, that is, as a point of law, which as all that the arbitrator is required to decide, not fact being, quoad that submission, in dispute".

(10) The law as to how far finality attaches to the decision of an arbitrator may be summarised thus: The award if baldly stated without giving reason for it, cannot be assailed even if it be against fact or repugnant to law. In other words the award is not open to judicial review. But if a reference to arbitration be made generally and not specifically, and the arbitrator enunciates a proposition of law and states his own view of the law as a ground of his award, such an award is open to attack in a court of law and is liable to be set aside if there be an error of law apparent on the face of it. So also, if the arbitrator construes a document and gives his own construction or interpretation of the document as a reason for the award, it is open to the Court to examine the reason and set aside the award if the error in the construction is apparent on the face of the award. If, however, a reference is made specifically and a dispute relating either to fact or to law is submitted to the arbitrator for his decision, his award cannot be challenged even if there be an error of fact or law, or both, apparent on the face of the award: see 'Hodgkinson v. Fernie', (1857) 3 C. B. (N. S.) 189: 140 E. R. 712, 'British Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Co., Ltd. v. Under ground Electric Rly. Co., of London Ltd.', (1912) A C 673, 'Government of Kelantan v. Duff Development Co., Ltd', (1923) A C 395, 'Champsey Bhara & Co. v. Jivraj Balloo Spinning and Weaving Company, Limited', 50 Ind App 324, 'Saleh Mahomed Umer Dossal v. Nathoomal Kessamal', 54 Ind App 427 and 'F. R. Absalom, Ltd. v. Great Western (London) Garden Village Society, Limited', (1933) A C 592.

(11) Bearing in mind the principles already enunciated, we have to examine the legality of the award with reference to the arbitration clause and other relevant clauses of the agreement and see for ourselves whether there is any error in law apparent on the face of the award. In order to appreciate the argument at the bar on the question raised before us it is necessary to quote here in extenso the arbitration clause of the agreement which runs as follows:

"14. Except where otherwise provided in the contract all questions and disputes relating to the meaning of the specification and instructions herein before mentioned and as to quality of materials or as to any other question, claim, right, matter or thing whatsoever in any way arising out of or relating to the contract, specification, instructions, orders, or these conditions, or otherwise concerning the supplies whether arising during the progress of delivery or after the completion or abandonment thereof shall be referred to the arbitration of the Superintending Engineer of the Circle for the time being in the manner provided by law relating to arbitration for the time being in force who after such investigation as he may think proper shall deliver his award which shall be final, conclusive and binding on all parties to this contract".

'Claim No. 3.'

The dispute in respect of claim No. 3 involves a question arising out of or relating to the contract. It was, therefore, within the competence of the arbitrator to take cognizance of the point in question. He considered the argument on either side and recorded his finding in these terms:

"I hold that Rs. 200/- per bigna was a reasonable price, the claim of the contractor for Rs. 2000/- less Rs. 715/- (already paid) is therefore awarded".

(12) It does not appear that there is any error apparent on the face of the award. The arbitrator has held without assigning any reason in support of his award that the contractor is entitled to Rs. 2000/- less Rs. 715/-. Therefore, the award cannot be interfered with.

(13) The arbitrator, while dealing with the argument on behalf of the contractor on this point, referred to the argument advanced on behalf of the parties with respect to claim No. 1 in which reference has been made to the agreement. It does not appear that he has referred to any term of the agreement as a matter of construction to fix the liability of the appellant. He seems to have referred to the agreement to understand the nature and origin of the dispute, and in so doing he has not committed any error of law. But even assuming that the arbitrator construed the agreement and has based his award on the construction of it, it does not appear that he committed any error. The appellant was in ordinary course of business expected to remove the bricks according to the schedule. The contractor was compelled to acquire the land for the stacking of the bricks on account of the non-removal of the bricks by the appellant. Therefore, the award on this point is unassailable. The order of the learned Subordinate Judge is, therefore, confirmed and the award upheld.

'Claim No. 4'.

(14) On account of certain restrictions local labour was not available to the contractor. He had to import coolies from the Central Provinces and the United Provinces for the manufacture of bricks and had to incur extra cost for procuring supply of food for the coolies. It appears that there was certain correspondence between the contractor and the Central Public Works Department in this connection, and the arbitrator seems to be of the view that the responsibility for making available controlled rations for the coolies was accepted by the Central Public Works Department. On account of this and other reasons the arbitrator decided that the appellant is liable to pay to the contractor Rs. 30,000/- to make good the loss which the contractor suffered. There is nothing in the agreement to show that the appellant was under any contractual obligation to supply rations for the coolies at controlled rates. In fact the arbitrator himself found that the appellant was not bound to compensate the contractor on this account. His finding is:

"From the point of view of contractual obligations therefore the department was not bound to compensate the contractor for any losses on this account".

In view of this finding the arbitrator misdirected himself in law in holding further that:

"there was a moral and implied obligation on the part of the C. P. W. D. to see that the contractor was given the necessary facilities to purchase rations at the controlled rates, and that this should have been arranged prior to arrival of the contractor's men."

and awarding compensation. The arbitrator's jurisdiction was to fix contractual and not moral liability. The illegality, therefore, is apparent on the face of the award and it is open to us to set aside the award under this head. It is accordingly set aside.

'Claim No. 8'.

(15) The contractor preferred a claim for the price of 47 lacs of kuchcha bricks which had been destroyed by rain. His case was that the destruction of these kuchcha bricks resulted from the jamming of the kilns as a result of a breakdown in the brick removal arrangements which was the responsibility of the department. The Executive Engineer, on behalf of the appellant, maintained that the removal of bricks from kiln area was not a contractual obligation and that, in any case, only 45 lacs of bricks had been destroyed. The arbitrator on a consideration of the arguments on either side recorded his finding thus:

"I hold that the contractor is entitled to compensation and award payment for 36 lacks of bricks at 8/8 per cent i.e. Rs. 30,600/-".

There is no illegality on the face of the award. Therefore, it cannot be assailed. The award in respect of this claim is, therefore, good and is accordingly maintained.

'Claim No. 13'.

(16) The contractor claimed damage for the loss in his business arising on account of the non-removal of the bricks by the appellant from the kiln area within a reasonable time. The arbitrator was satisfied on the merits of the case that the contractor was unable to manufacture any bricks and supply the same to his customers because the approaches to land surrounding his kilns were jammed with stacks of Government bricks, and his finding is "I hold that the contractor is entitled to compensation on this matter and award payment to him of Rs. 15,000/-." From the finding of the arbitrator it is clear that he has fixed the liability without giving any reason in support of his view. Therefore, there is no error of law apparent on the face of the award and it cannot be assailed.

'Claim No. 17'.

(17) The arbitrator has allowed interest from the 31st March, 1947 to the 20th April, 1949, i.e. for a period of 24 months and 20 days, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. The contractor did not include any claim for interest for this period in his bill originally submitted to the Chief Engineer, Central Public Works Department. The claim was preferred before the arbitrator for the first time during the progress of the arbitration proceeding, and the Executive Engineer, appearing on behalf of the Union, does not seem to have submitted to the jurisdiction of the arbitrator to decide this question. In the circumstances it cannot be said that the claim for interest was one of the matters referred to arbitration. The arbitrator, therefore, in my opinion, had no jurisdiction to entertain this claim and the award in this respect must accordingly be set aside.

'Miscellaneous Appeal No. 253 of 1950.'

(18) This appeal arises out of suit No. 34 of 1949. It was heard by us along with Miscellaneous Appeal No. 252 of 1950, which arises out of suit No. 27 of 1949. Both the suits were heard together by the trial court and are governed by the same judgment. We have also heard these two appeals together, but for the sake of convenience this appeal is dealt with separately.

(19) The plaintiff, Seth Thawardas Pherumal, entered into an agreement with the Additional Chief Engineer, New Delhi, under which the plaintiff agreed to supply 2 1/2 crores of bricks to the Central Public Works Department for the Sindri Fertiliser project. The terms of this agreement are substantially the same as in the other suit. Owing to differences between the parties, the dispute was referred to Mr. Dixon, Superintending Engineer for his decision under the terms of the arbitration clause of the agreement which are identically the same as those of the other already quoted. The contractor claimed Rs. 4,76,138/12/- plus interest at 6 per cent for 16 months, that is, a total sum of Rs. 5,38, 003/- under different heads. But the arbitrator allowed Rs. 2,35,346,/6/- only under his award dated the 8th May, 1949. The contractor thereupon filed the present suit for the enforcement of the award. The appellant objected to the award on various grounds. The learned Subordinate Judge overruled the objections of the appellant and accepted the award in its entirety and passed a decree in terms thereof. The award has been contested before us with respect to claims Nos. 2, 5, 8 and 17 only, which are as follows:

'Claim No. 2': Payment for loss sustained due to closing of Kiln No. 3..... Rs. 8,443/12/-.

'Claim No. 5': Payment for 88 lacs of kuchcha bricks destroyed by rain..... Rs. 75,900/-.

'Claim No. 8': Payment on account of additional wages paid to labourers because of non-availability of rations and coth..... Rs. 51,495/-.

'Claim No. 17': Payment of interest on money blocked..... Rs. 27,665/-.

'Claim No. 2'.

(20) The contractor claimed Rs. 8443/12/- for the loss sustained due to closing of kiln No. 3. His case was that the Executive Engineer wrote to him a letter to the effect that he would not pass any bricks coming out of this kiln. The Executive Engineer on the other hand, contended on behalf of the appellant that the letter could not be interpreted to mean an order to close the kiln. The arbitrator on the construction of the Executive Engineer's letter held as follows:

"I hold that the Executive Engineer's letter was tantamount to an order to close the kiln which in my opinion was not justified as it was not the kiln that was at fault. I, therefore, award that the contractor be paid the cost of making the additional kiln, i.e. Rs. 6400/-."

(21) The Executive Engineer's letter has not been placed before us. Mr. Lal Narain Sinha was unable to show that the interpretation of the arbitrator was wrong. We cannot, therefore, interfere with the award with respect to this claim. It is accordingly upheld.

'Claim No. 5.'

(22) Claim No. 5 in this appeal is similar to claim No. 8 of Miscellaneous appeal No. 252 of 1950 which we have upheld on the ground that there was no illegality upon the face of the award. But in the present case the award with respect to this claim cannot be supported because it is based upon an erroneous interpretation of clause 6 (additional) of the agreement and the error in the construction is apparent on the face of it. Clause 6 of the agreement is to the effect that:

"the department will not entertain any claim for idle labour, or for damage to unburnt bricks due to any cause whatsoever."

The arbitrator on the interpretation of this clause has held:

"This clause is not, in my opinion, meant to absolve the department from carrying out their part of the contract. It is impossible not to admit this without offending the rudiments of commonsense reasoning".

The language of this clause is general and subject to no limitations and is not open to the construction put by the arbitrator. Therefore, even if there was any contractual obligation on the part of the appellant to remove the bricks from the kiln area and the damage was due to non-removal thereof, the contractor is precluded by the said clause from claiming any damage on that account. The award is, therefore, bad on the face of it. It is accordingly set aside.

'Claim No. 8.'

(23) This claim corresponds to claim No. 4 in Miscellaneous Appeal No. 252 of 1950 which I have disallowed. For the reasons given therein, the award in respect of this claim is set aside.

'Claim No. 17.'

(24) Claim No. 17 of this appeal corresponds to claim No. 17 of Miscellaneous Appeal No. 252 of 1950, which has been disallowed for the reasons given therein. For the same reasons the award in respect of this claim is disallowed.

(25) In the result, the appeals are allowed in part. In appeal No. 252 the decree of the lower court will be modified by excluding claims Nos. 4 and 17, and in appeal No. 253 the decree of the lower court will be modified by excluding claims Nos. 5, 8 and 17. In the circumstances, the parties will bear their own costs in each case.

Nathu Singh and another, Appellants, v. Rohin Singh and others, Respondents.

Letters Patent Appeals Nos. 29 & 32 of 1948, D/- 15-11-1950.

Tenancy Laws—Bihar Tenancy Act (8 of 1885), S. 112-A — Holding of raiyat at fixed rate under Kabuliat — Reduction of rent under S. 112-A — Validity of — Possession as occupancy raiyat before execution Kabuliat if continues after execution.

Where the tenancies are the holding of raiyats of fixed rates under Kabuliats executed by them S. 112-A does not apply and the order of reduction of rent passed under that section is without jurisdiction. The efect of the execution of the Kabuliats is to bring a new tenancy into being, viz., the tenancy of a raiyat at fixed rates. The contention that before the execution of these kabuliats the raiyats were already in possession as occupancy raiyats and that by the execution of these kabuliats and the acceptance thereby of fixed rents there was no merger of the original occupancy raiyati interest with the new interest created is not correct. For there is no question of the previous tenancy merging with the tenancy so created. It is open to an occupancy raiyat to transfer his interest. It is equally open to him to surrender it. There is no reason why by entering into a new contract he cannot extinguish the interest altogether. A I R (14) 1927 Cal 846; A I R (9) 1922 Cal 287 (2); AIR (5) 1918 Cal 426, Disting. (Paras 1, 4)

Further, the fact that the predecessor-in-interest of the landlord being under a mistaken impression that he was bound by the order under S. 112-A realised the rent at reduced rate does not amount to a new contract between the parties and cannot prevent the landlord from realising in subsequent years the rent to which he is legally entitled. REUBEN, J: These appeals, both by the defts. are directed against a decision of Shearer, J., reversing the concurrent decisions of the Courts below in the relevant suits. They arise out of suits for rent filed by the respondents, who are common to both the appeals, against the defts. The landlord sought to recover arrears of rent for the years 1350 to 1353 fasli at the rent specified in the Kabuliats (Exs. 2 & 2/a) executed by the defts. in his favour in the years 1927 & 1928. The tenancies are agricultural tenancies. The defence taken was that the rent of these tenancies had been reduced under the provisions of S. 112-A, Bihar Tenancy Act. This defence was accepted by the lower Courts but the decision was reversed by Shearer, J., on the finding that the tenancies were the holdings of raiyats at fixed rates & therefore the orders passed under S. 112-A were without jurisdiction.

(2) Five points were urged before us: one, that the point that the tenancies were 'sharahmoayyan raiyati' tenancies was raised for the first time in the Court of the single Judge; secondly, that the right of occupancy raiyati had already been acquired by the defts. before the kabuliats in question were executed & they, therefore, continued to be occupancy raiyats after the exectuion of the kabuliats; thirdly, that a previous decision in a rent suit brought by the predecessor-in-interest of the respondents operates as 'res judicata' in these cases; fourthly, that the predecessor-in-interest of respondents granted receipts to the defts. on realisation of rent at the reduced rate & thus created a new contract between the parties; & fifthly, that the learned single Judge erred by reversing a finding of fact.

(3) Point No. 1: There is no substance in this objection. The tenancies are described in the plaints 'Istimrari Mokarrari' without any specific interest of a tenure-holder. It appears to have been argued on behalf of the plffs. before the Munsif that the tenancies were tenures. This is usually the case with a tenancy which is described as 'Istimrari Mokarrari.' The contention raised before the Munsif appears to have been in the nature of the interpretation of the two kabuliats & no objection on this ground seems to have been raised, when, in the first appellate Court, it was argued on behalf of the plffs. that the tenancies were really 'sharahmoayyan raiyati tenancies. It has been contended before us that the matter is not entirely one of interpretation, that in order to determine whether a tenancy is that of a raiyat or of a tenure-holder questions of fact have to be gone into. So far, however, as the facts relating to these tenancies are concerned there is no dispute whatever, either as regards the area or the rent or the purpose for which the tenancies were created.

(4) Point No. 2: This is the point on which main reliance has been placed. Contention is that before the execution of these kabuliats the defts. were already in possession as occupancy raiyats & that by the execution of these kabuliats & the acceptance thereby of fixed rents there was no merger of the original occupancy raiyati interest with the new interest created. In support of this contention reference was made to Midnapore Zemindary Co. Ltd. v. Sadhumoni Dasi', 54 Cal 681, 'Sarbeshwar Patra v. Bijay Chand Mahtab', 49 Cal 280 and 'Lakhi Charan Saha v. Hamid Ali', 27 C L J 284. In 49 Cal 280, it was held that a 'Sharahmoayyan raiyat', can acquire occupancy rights & thus claim protection under the provisions of Section 160, B. T. Act. In the other two cases the question was as to the existence of "protected interest", in the first case under S. 160, B. T. Act & in 27 Cal L Jour 284, under the provisions of the Revenue Sales Tax Act of 1859. The provisions of these sections relate to tenants who have occupancy rights, & in the decisions relied on it was not held that the right of an occupancy raiyat persisted. On the contrary, in 27 Cal L Jour, 284, their Lordships appear to draw a distinction between a raiyat holding at fixed rates & an occupancy raiyat & expressly considered the question whether the latter can retain the privileges of an occupancy raiyat after he becomes a raiyat holding at fixed rates. The point in question was protection under S. 160, Bengal Tenancy Act. This privilege is accorded to occupancy rights & this is the point that was found in the decision cited. There is nothing in these decisions to support the contention that there was no "merger." The use of the term "merger" seems to be incorrect. The effect of the execution of the kabuliats was to bring a new tenancy into being, viz., the tenancy of a raiyat at fixed rates; there was no question of the previous tenancy merging with the tenancy so created. It is open to an occupancy raiyat to transfer his interest. It is equally open to him to surrender it. There seems to be no reason why by entering into a new contract he cannot extinguish the interest altogether. As regards the right of occupancy, that would be governed by the provisions of Ss. 19 & 20. Bihar Tenancy Act. This point must, therefore, be decided against the appellants.

(5) Point No. 3: This point was rightly given up before the learned single Judge. The previous decisions relied on relates only to one tenancy. The only document relating to which consists of the copy of the decree. The pleadings & judgment are not incorrect.

(6) Point No. 4: This point has been sufficiently dealt with in the judgment of the learned single Judge. Stress has been laid on the receipts because it is said that they contain express references to the order under S. 112-A. The references, in my opinion, make no difference. All that these references amount to is that the predecessor-in-interest of the plaintiffs being under a mistaken impression that he was bound by the order under S. 112-A realised the rent at reduced rate. This cannot amount to a new contract between the parties & cannot prevent the landlord from realising in subsequent years the rent to which he is legally entitled.

(7) Point No. 5: As I have said already no question of fact was really in dispute. The question is one entirely of interpretation. This point therefore fails.

(8) On these grounds I would dismiss this appeal with costs.

(9) RAMASWAMI, J: I agree.

REUBEN AND RAMASWAMI, JJ.

Mrs. J. L. Quadros, Appellant v. Adeline Teresa Quardros and others, Respondents.

Letters Patent Appeal No. 15 of 1948, D/- 17-11-50.

(a) Succession Act (1925), Ss. 82, 87, 302 — Construction of will — Intention of testator — Contradictory clauses in will to be reconciled — Direction of Court for sale of properties sought — 'Held' on construction that direction could be given.

At the commencement of his Will the testator stated: "I give my mother 'J.' a life interest in all my immovable properties including leasehold properties and investments." Later on there was a direction that six items of immovable properties be sold and 'on each of my eight children attaining majority, one-eighth of the sum realised by sale of these six mouzas shall be paid to her or him. The interest accruing from the said sale proceeds during my mother's life time shall be enjoyed by her exclusively." One of the married daughters of the testator by an application claimed that she was entitled to a direction from the Court that the properties be sold by the executrix and she be given her share out of the sale proceeds. The executrix contested the application on the ground that the Court could not direct a sale of the properties or distribution of the sale proceeds so long as she was alive as she had a life interest in the said properties and she was given absolute discretion over the sale of the properties, and further the application was not maintainable on the ground that the administration of the estate was concluded and the executrix was in the position of a trustee.

'Held' (1) that as there had not been a complete administration of the estate of the testator the application for direction was maintainable under S. 302, Succession Act. (Para 7)

(2) that on the proper construction of the Will and after reconciling any possible contradiction between the various clauses, the real intention of the testator was that the executrix should sell the mauzas and the sale proceeds should be invested, that the interest drawn from the investment should be enjoyed by the mother but that each of the children, on his or her attaining majority, should be paid the capital sum to which he or she is entitled, irrespective of the question whether the executrix was alive or not at that time. (Paras 4, 6)

(3) that the daughter was accordingly entitled to the direction prayed in her application. (Para 6)

(b) Succession Act (1925), S. 87 — Construction of Will— Intention of testator.

It is a primary rule of construction of a Will that the intention of the testator must be gathered 'ex-visceribus testamenti.' All the parts and provisions of a Will are to be construed in relation to each other, and so as to form one consistent whole and operate together, and contradictory clauses should if possible reconciled accordingly. The Court should thus consider the whole instrument together. A I R (12) 1925 P C 105, Rel. on. (Para 3)

Anno: Suc. Act, S. 87, N. 1.

(c) Will — Construction of — Will making provision for children subject to prior life interest — Presumption.

In construing a will or settlement which makes a provision for children subject to a prior life interest, the Court must presume in favour of that construction by which the children will take a vested interest at twenty-one or on marriage (1885) 10 App. C. 422, Rel. on. (Para 5)

(d) Succession Act (1925), S. 302 — Administration not complete so long as direction in will is not complied — Executor when becomes trustee.

So long as the direction in the will has not been complied with, it is not possible to hold that there is a complete administration of the estate of the testator. The question when the executor becomes a trustee depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. If the administration is complete, if the executor is 'functus officio' with regard to any of the assets and retains them in his possession he becomes clothed with the character of a trustee of those assets. For instance, as soon as the executor has assented to a legacy he becomes a trustee of the subject-matter of the legacy for the legatee. RAMASWAMI, J: The question to be decided in this appeal is whether upon the proper construction of a will executed by one Mr. J. A. Quadros on 20-2-1937, the respondent is entitled to a direction from the Court that certain properties should be sold by the executrix & the respondent given her share out of the sale proceeds.

(2) It is the admitted case that, on 20-2-1937, Mr. J. A. Quadros executed the will in question. Mrs. Adeline Reid is the third child of the testator & when the will was executed ,she was aged fourteen years. She has since married & has now two children, the elder of whom is seven years of age. On her behalf, it is alleged that Mrs. J. L. Quadros, who was the executrix appointed under the will, has not carried out the direction of the testator that certain properties should be converted into cash & one-eighth of the sum realised by the sale should be paid to each of his children on his or her attaining the age of twenty-one years. The executrix contested the application on the ground that the Court cannot direct a sale of the properties or distribution of the sale proceeds so long as she was alive. It was maintained that by the will the executrix was given a life interest in all the immovable properties left by the testator & she was given absolute discretion over the sale of the properties. Shearer, J., held upon the construction of the will that the respondent was entitled to a direction that the mauzas should be sold by the executrix & that she was entitled to a share of the sale proceeds. The learned Judge accordingly allowed the application.

(3) The question at issue in this appeal depends upon the construction of the material terms of the will executed by Mr. J. A. Quadros. At the commencement of the will, the testator states:

"I give my mother Mrs. Julia L. Quadros a life interest in all my immovable properties including leasehold properties & investments."

There is a direction later on to the following effect:

"I also direct that (a) Tauzi No. 59, Mauza Rampur Taliqua, (b) Tauzi No. 59/29 Mauza Bhagwangama, Rampur Taliqua, (c) Tauzi No. 616, Mauza Bhikanpur, (d) Tauzi No. 4736, Mauza Moinuddinchuk of which I am the sole proprietor, & also (e) Tauzi No. 4586, Mauza Nagar, Pargannah Colgon & (f) Tauzi No. 796 C, Mauza Lakhraj, Mauza Chicksi, Pargana Phulbari, Thana Paliganj, district Patna of which last two I am an 8 annas & five annas share-holder respectively be sold & the net sale proceeds be invested & form part of my estate along with the other monies & investments mentioned above except the sale proceeds of my share in Touzi No. 796-C Mauza Lakhraj; Mauza Chicksi; Parganah Phulbari; Thana Paliganj, District Patna; which I leave to my mother absolutely. That the remaining 8 annas share in Touzi No. 796-C Mauza Lakhraj, Mauza Chicksi, Pargana Phulbari; Thana Paliganj; District Patna is exclusively the property of my mother Mrs. Julia L. Quadros & the sale proceeds thereof shall be hers absolutely. That Tauzi No. 306-1 Mouzh Dadpur Pakuria Baurgaon be sold, and the sale proceeds thereof, I leave to my mother absolutely. On each of my eight children attaining majority, one-eighth of the sum realised by sale of these six mauzas shall be paid to her or him. The interest accruing from the said sale proceeds during my mother's life time shall be enjoyed by her exclusively."

On behalf of the appellant, Mr. R. S. Chatterji presented the argument that the will clearly provided that Mrs. J. L. Quadros was to be granted a life interest in all the immovable properties & it was manifest that the intention of the testator was to make Mrs. J. L. Quadros the 'karta of the family" & give her complete control over the provision for maintenance of the wife & children of Mr. Quadros. It was also contended that the disposition in favour of the children was merely contingent & cannot prevail over the definite direction in the will that the mother should be given a life interest in all the immovable properties. In my opinion, the argument on behalf of the appellant is not tenable. For it is a primary rule of construction that the intention of the testator must be gathered 'ex-visceribus testamenti' that all the parts & provisions of a will are to be construed in relation to each other, & so as to form one consistent whole & operate together, & contradictory clauses should if possible be reconciled accordingly as the Court should consider the whole instrument together. In 'Venkatadri Appa Rao v. Parthasarathi Appa Rao', 52 I A 214, the Judicial Committee referred with approval to the statement of law made by Lord Wensleydale in 'Roddy v. Fitzegerald', (1858) 6 H L C 823 to the following effect:

"These rules are perfectly plain & clear. The first duty of the Court expounding the will is to ascertain what is the meaning of the words used by the testator. It is very often said that the intention of the testator is to be the guide, but that expression is capable of being misunderstood, & may lead to speculation as to what the testator may be supposed to have intended to write, whereas the only & proper inquiry is, what is the meaning of that which he has actually written? That which he has written is to be construed by every part being taken into consideration according to its grammatical construction & the ordinary acceptation of the words used, with the assistance of such parol evidence of the surrounding circumstances as is admissible, to place the Court in the position of the testator."

In the present case, there is no material repugnancy between the relevant clauses in the will, namely, (1) that the mother Mrs. Julia L. Quadros is given a life interest in all the immovable properties, & (2) "On each of my eight children attaining majority, one eighth of the sum realised by sale of these six mauzas shall be paid to her or him."

(4) Learned Counsel has referred to the subsequent clause that "The interest accruing from the said sale proceeds during my mother's lifetime shall be enjoyed by her exclusively." But, in my opinion, any possible contradiction between the various clauses may be reconciled: & the real intention of the testator is apparent that the executrix should sell the mauzas & the sale proceeds should be invested, that the interest drawn from the investment should be enjoyed by the mother but that each of the children, on his or her attaining majority, should be paid the capital sum to which he or she is entitled.

(5) Even if it be assumed for a moment that the clauses in the will are ambiguous or conflicting the respondent would be entitled to the direction asked for, on the operation of another principle. For it is settled by high authority that in construing a will or settlement which makes a provision for children subject to a prior life interest, the Court must presume in favour of that construction by which the children will take a vested interest at twenty-one or on marriage. The rule is stated thus in Williams on 'Executors', Edn. 12 p. 805, Vol. II:

"In construing a settlement or Will, which makes a provision for children subject to a prior life interest, the Court leans strongly in favour of that construction by which the children will take a vested interest at twenty-one or marriage, whether they survive the tenant for life or not: & if the instrument is incorrectly or 'ambiguously' expressed, or if it contains 'conflicting' & contradictory clauses, so as to leave in a degree uncertain the period at which, or the contingency upon which, the shares are to vest, the rational presumption is that the child acquires a vested & transmissible interest at the period when it is most needed, viz., at twenty-one, if a son, or on marriage or at that age, if a daughter."

In 'Edward Thomas Wakefield v. William Hamilton Maffat', (1885) 10 A. C. 422: lands were conveyed by a marriage settlement upon trust for husband & wife successively for life, & after the death of the survivor "to levy out of the said lands & premises the sum of £3,000 to be divided to & among all the children of the said intended marriage, save & except such child & children as under the limitations aforesaid shall succeed to the enjoyment of the lands & premises hereby conveyed in equal shares & proportions as tenants in common & not as joint tenants, the share of such child or children as shall be a son or sons to be paid to him or them upon his or their respectively arriving at the full age of twenty-one years, & the share or shares of such of them as shall be daughters to be paid upon their respectively arriving at their full age of twenty-one years, or day or days of marriage, whichever shall first happen: Provided always that such marriage during minority shall be had by & with the consent & approbation of the parents or the survivor of them: with interest for the same by way of maintenance at the rate of £6 by the hundred to be computed from the day of the death of the survivor of the parents: with benefit of survivorship to the survivors or survivor of such children if any of such children shall die before his, her or their share or shares shall become payable unmarried & without leaving issue as aforesaid, it being the true intent & meaning of these presents that none of the children of the said intended marriage, who under the limitations herein contained shall become entitled to an estate in possession in any part of the lands & premises hereby conveyed shall be entitled to any part of the said sum."

A son attained twenty-one & died in the lifetime of his father. Upon these facts, it was held by the House of Lords, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland, that there being no words indicating a clear intention to make the vesting of children's shares contingent on their surviving both parents, the rule laid down in 'Emperor v. Rolfe', (1748-9) 1 Ves. Sen. 208 applied, & the son took a vested interest in his share on attaining twenty-one.

(6) In the present case, upon proper construction of the will, it must be held that, upon each of the children attaining majority, one-eighth of the sum realised by the sale of the mauzas should be paid to her or him irrespective of the question whether the executrix was alive or not at the time. The respondent was accordingly entitled to the direction given by the learned Judge of this Court.

(7) The argument was also presented on behalf of the appellant that the application was not maintainable under S. 301, Succession Act, on the ground that the administration of the estate concluded & the respondent was really in the position of the trustee. In support of this argument, learned Counsel referred to 'Nandkishore Lal v. Pasupati Nath', 7 Pat 396 & 'In the goods of Sarnath Sanyal', AIR (36) 1949 All 93. In my opinion, these authorities are not of much assistance to the appellant for they proceed on the assumption that there has been a complete administration of the estate of the deceased in each case & the executor had become 'functus officio.' But it cannot be held upon circumstances admitted or proved in the present case, that there has been a complete administration of the estate of Mr. J. A. Quadros. It is important to notice that there is a specific direction in the will that the executrix should sell the mauzas specified & out of the sale proceeds, shall pay one-eighth share to each of the eight children on their attaining the age of twenty-one years. So long as the direction in the will has not been complied with, it is not possible to hold that there was a complete administration of the estate of the testator. The question when the executor becomes a trustee must be answered with reference to the circumstances of each particular case. If the administration is complete, if the executor is 'functus officio', with regard to any of the assets & retains them in his possession he becomes clothed with the character of a trustee of those assets. For instance, as soon as the executor has assented to a legacy, he becomes a trustee of the subject-matter of the legacy for the legatee. As observed by Lewin

"An executor is regarded in some sense as a trustee, but he cannot, like a trustee, be discharged, even by the Court from his 'executorship.' When the funeral & testamentary expenses, debts, & legacies have been satisfied, & the surplpus has been invested upon the trusts of the will, the executor then drops that character & 'becomes a trustee in the proper sense, & may then be discharged from the office like any other trustee."

This passage has been quoted with approval in 'Dhanabakkiyammal v. Thangavelu Mudaliar', 50 Mad 956. In 'Taran Singh v. Ramratan Tewari', 31 Cal 89, also the Court observed:

"The position & duties of an executor in this country are not very well understood, & considerable confusion exists as to duties of the executor in the administering the estate. The duties of the executor are to administer the estate of the deceased only so far & so long as to enable him to carry out the terms of the will of which he is executor. After the property has ceased to be the estate of the deceased & has become the property of the residuary legatee under the will, the executor as such has no authority to manage the estate on his behalf."

This case was followed in a subsequent decision in 'Sankar Nath v. Biddutlata Devi', 28 C L J 271.

(8) For these reasons, I hold that the respondent is entitled to a direction from the Court under S. 302 of the Act. There appears however, to be a slight mistake in the will, for, upon a careful perusal thereof, it is apparent that each of the children would be entitled to one-eighth of the sum realised by the sale 'not of the six' but of the five mauzas, namely (1) Tauzi No. 59, Mauza Rampur Taliqua, (2) Tauzi No. 59/29 Mauza Bhagwangama, Rampur Taliqua, (3) Tauzi No. 616, Mauza Bhikanpur, (4) Tauzi No. 4736, Mauza Maoinuddinchuk & (5) Tauzi No. 4586, Mauza Nagar, Parganah Colgon. In view of the admitted fact that out of the eight children one, namely, Julia Gertrude Quadros, died during the lifetime of the testator, the respondent will be entitled not to one-seventh share as claimed but to one-eighth share of the sale proceeds of the five mauzas which have been specified. It is necessary that the executrix should sell the five properties specified within a period of six months from this date or within such further time as may be granted on a proper application being made in this behalf to the Court of the D. J., of Bhagalpur.

(9) This appeal under the Letters Patent is accordingly dismissed with costs. Hearing fee three gold mohurs.

Sarjoo Prasad J. — These two applications in revision are directed against an order dated 8-8-1949, of Mr. P. K. Nag, as an Additional Election Commissioner of Muzaffarpur.

[2] The order in question arises out of an election petition presented by three unsuccessful candidates against three returned candidates, namely, the applicant in Civ. Revn. No. 679 of 1949, Jamuna Prasad Tripathi, Ramdhari Prasad (since dead) and Jagat Prasad Singh, the respondent opposite party in Civ. Revn. No. 773 of 1949, in connection with the last District Board election held in May and June, 1947, in respect of police station Muzaffarpur— Kamtaul-Kanti constituency. The respondent Ramdhari Prasad having died subsequent to the presentation of the election petition, a fresh bye-election was held in respect of the vacancy so caused, and his name was expunged from the election petition. The election petition, therefore, is now concerned only with the election of the returned candidates Jamuna Prasad Tripathi and Jagat Prasad Singh, the surviving respondents named in that petition.

[3] The election petition raised various grounds of objection to the return of the candidates concerned. It would be unnecessary to refer to all the other grounds except those on which the election petition succeeded before the Election Commissioner.

[4] The first objection against the respondent Jamuna Prasad Tripathi who is the petitioner in Civ. Revn. No. 679 of 1949 was that the respondent was a member of a joint family which used to be contractors under the District Board during election, and, as such, the said respondent Jamuna Prasad Tripathi was not eligible for election to the District Board. Jamuna Prasad Tripathi contested on the ground, firstly, that he was separate from the other members of his family, namely, his father and brothers, and secondly, that in any case the members of his family were not contractors under the District Board, and, consequently no objection could be raised as to his eligibility to the election as a member of the said Board. The Election Commissioner after a consideration of the evidence came to a definite finding that the respondent

Jamuna Prasad Tripathi was a member of the joint family consisting of himself, his father and his brothers, and that his plea of separation was false. He also found that there was evidence to show that leases had been obtained of the District Board road-side lands by the father and the brothers of the respondent, and although these leases expired, the lessees thereunder had been holding over, and the District Board had not taken possession of the lands in question after dispossessing the said lessees. He accordingly held that and respondent 1 being a member of the joint family with his father and brothers, he was directly interested in such contracts, and, as such, he was not eligible for election under R. 3 (b), District Board Electoral Rules, 1937.

"contractual relationship existed between the father and brothers of respondent 1 and the District Board at the time when the nomination paper was filed by respondent 1"

[5] The learned counsel appearing for the applicant before us contends that this finding of the Election Commissioner that the father of the respondent or his brothers were lessees in respect of the road-side lands belonging to the District Board did not in any manner bring him within the mischief of the said rule. In order to appreciate the point, it would be useful to quote the rule in question.

[6] It provides:

"No person shall be eligible for election if he is in the employment or pay of the district board or of any local board or union committee or union board subordinate to that district board or who has directly or indirectly any share or interest in any contract with or under the district or local board or union committee or union board."

The relevant provision with which we are concerned in this case is whether the respondent had "directly or indirectly any share or interest in any contract with or under the District Board," Mr. Lal Narain Sinha appearing for the respondent petitioner before this Court urges that the word "contract" used in the rule cannot refer to leases which are really transfers of property. He says that the Election Commissioner found that it could not be proved by the petitioners who filed the election petition that any member of the family of respondent 1 was a contractor in the District Board so far as constructions of roads etc., were concerned, and that the meaning of the word "contract" given in the rule must be confined to such class of contracts relating to construction or roads etc., referred to above. It is true the Election Commissioner has held that the petitioners in the election petition were unable to prove such contracts ; but it appears to me that the view taken by the Election Commissioner as to the interpretation of the rule is on the whole correct. The language of the rule is sufficiently wide to cover a case of contractual relationship arising out of leases as well, or for the matter of that out of any other kind of contract. The comprehensive intention of the rule seems to be particularly emphasised by the expression:

"No person shall be eligible for election if he has directly or indirectly any share or interest in any contract."

After all, transfer of property also is in the nature of a contract between the parties, and there seems to be no justification for holding that the application of the rule should be restricted by the narrow interpretation which is sought to be put upon it by learned counsel appearing for the applicant. Even assuming that the interpretation of the rule given by the Election Commissioner was erroneous, it could be only an error of law not affecting his jurisdiction to decide the matter.

[7] Of course, it is now well settled that it is open to this Court to interfere in revision with the order of an Election Commissioner appointed under the District Board Rules. I may refer in this connection to a Full Bench decision of this Court in Mt. Dirji v. Sm. Goalin, 20 Pat. 373: (A. I. R. (28) 1941 Pat. 65 F. B.). In that case a question arose whether a Commissioner appointed under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1923 was a Court, and whether his order could be revised under S. 115, Civil P. C. It was held that the Commissioner under the Act is constituted an independent tribunal, and his function is to judge and decide and not merely to enquire and advise, and in judging and deciding the matters before him, he has to proceed judicially and not arbitrarily, and that he satisfied all the main tests which one has to apply for determining whether the tribunal is a Court or not. That being so, it was held that any final order passed by him was open to revision by this Court under S. 115, Civil P. C. The question, however, relating to an Election Commissioner directly arose for consideration in another subsequent case reported in Abdul Razak v. Kuldip Narain, 22 Pat. 577: (A. I. R. (31) 1944 Pat. 147). In this case there was a difference of opinion between Meredith J. as he then was, and Chatterji J. and the case was then referred for decision to another learned Judge, Manohar Lall J. It appears that all the learned Judges who dealt with the case at different stages were unanimously of the view that the Election

Commissioner referred to in the Bihar District Board Electoral Rules, 1937, is a Court and a Court subordinate to the High Court within the meaning of S. 115, Civil P. C. That being so, there can be no question that it was open to us to revise this order of the Election Commissioner if there were any scope for interference under S. 115 of the Code. It is contended by Mr. Lal Narain Sinha, the learned Government Pleader, that this error of law resulting in an erroneous construction of R. 3, District Board Electoral Rules, affected the jurisdiction of the Election Commissioner. In my opinion, this is, as I have said, not a tenable contention. It was open to the Election Commissioner to construe the rule in question and it was a matter entirely within his jurisdiction to decide about it. Therefore, even if he had decided the matter wrongly it could not be said that he had no jurisdiction to decide it in that manner. I have already pointed out that as at present advised, I see no reason to differ from him in the view which he has taken as to the construction of R. 3, and I hold that his decision is correct and is not open to interference.

[8] The next ground of attack in the election petition was that there were various irregularities committed by the officer in charge of the election and it also enumerated various corrupt practices resorted to by the returned candidates in securing their election. In dealing with these objections in issue 4, the learned Commissioner has sought to classify them under two groups.

[9] Within the first group he deals with the irregularities committed by the officers in charge of the election which were alleged to have materially affected the result of the election. He examined the evidence regarding the allegations made in respect of such irregularities, and he came to the conclusion that there were some irregularities due to carelessness and lack of discretion on the part of the officers in charge of the election; but such irregularities or carelessness did not affect the result of the election as contemplated in R. 69, Bihar District Board Electoral Rules, 1937, and the election, therefore, could not be held to be invalid on any of the grounds mentioned in group one aforesaid.

[10] In the second group he deals with corrupt practices resorted to by the returned candidates and their agents which would come under Part I of the Schedule to the Bihar District Board Election Petitions Rules, 1939. This appears to be the most serious part of the objection taken against the election of the candidates returned. In that group the main grounds of attack, inter alia, were that (1) a large number of women were hired to personate the absentee women voters and to vote for the latter in favour of the respondents, and (2) a number of persons were engaged by the respondents to personate as absentee voters and dead voters and to vote for such persons in favour of the respondents. These were serious charges constituting corrupt practices on the part of the returned candidates or their agents.

[11] The learned Government Pleader appearing for the respondent, Jamuna Prasad Tripathi, contended that the election petition did not set forth full particulars of the corrupt practices alleged by the petitioners in their election petition as against each of the respondents or their agents. I have examined the election petition and I find on the whole that they do contain the particulars required. But even if there was any vagueness in those particulars, it was open to the respondents to ask for further particulars, if any. It does not appear that they took any serious objection on that ground and there has been obviously no prejudice to the applicant. I, therefore, see no force in this contention advanced on his behalf in this Court.

[12] The Election Commissioner after examining very carefully the evidence adduced in proof of the alleged corrupt practices came to the conclusion that several hired women other than the real voters had been allowed to vote for the actual voters in favour of the Congress candidates meaning the two respondents in the election petition. He also found that there was definite proof that several votes cast in the name of dead persons were cast in favour of the respondent, Jamuna Prasad Tripathi, and only two in favour of the other respondent, Jagat Prasad Singh. In course of his discussion of the evidence on the point he observed that the packages containing the votes polled in two of the booths could not be traced, and there was no guarantee that the corrupt practices, referred to above, were the only corrupt practices committed in the interest of the candidates returned. In summing up his findings under issue 4, the Election Commissioner found these facts against both the returned candidates. He, therefore, held that these corrupt practices committed in the interest of the returned candidates came within R 16 (1) (b) District Board Election Petitions Rules, 1939, and accordingly the election of the returned candidates had to be declared void. He also found that the corrupt practices in question were not of a trivial nature and could not be brushed aside.

[13] In regard to the respondent applicant, Jamuna Prasad Tripathi, he held that he was personally responsible for the corrupt practices in question which were to his knowledge and at his connivance but, in so far as Jagat Prasad Singh is concerned, he held that the corrupt practices were resorted to without his knowledge and connivance, and his case came within R. 16 (2) of the Rules. He accordingly found that the election of this respondent was not void. I shall have to refer to the case of the respondent, Jagat Prasad Singh, when I come to deal with Civ. Revn. No. 773 of 1949 which is directed against this part of the order of the Election Commissioner.

[14] It is contended by the learned Government pleader appearing for the respondent, Jamuna Prasad Tripathi, that there was nothing definite to connect this respondent with the corrupt practices in question. He argued that the mere fact that some votes cast in the name of deceased voters were found in his ballot box or that some women happened to personate for certain other women voters did not necessarily imply that the petitioner was directly concerned in the matter, and that there was no definite material on which the Election Commissioner could hold that the petitioner, Jamuna Prasad, could be directly connected with the corrupt practices in question. I am afraid in view of the findings of the Election Commissioner, I cannot accept this contention. To quote his own words, the Election Commissioner found as follows:

"As regards Babu Jamuna Tripathi I am unable to accept such a view. He did not rest satisfied with what might have been done by the Congress party whose nominee he was to secure his election. He was acting and supervising the election and was visiting each polling booth on every day. The corrupt practices have been resorted to in Kamtaul and Siraia polling booths in which locality this particular candidate resides. When he was in close touch with the election it cannot be assumed that the hiring of men to vote for dead persons and women to vote for absentee women voters could have been done without his knowledge. There could be hardly any direct evidence of the fact that he had knowledge of these corrupt practices and the same must be inferred from the facts and surrounding circumstances..... From the evidence and circumstances of the case and active interest that was taken by this returned candidate I find that all these corrupt practices found to have been resorted to were certainly within the knowledge of B. Jamuna Tripathi and were done with his connivance if he himself was not the originator of the plan."

In view of this finding which certainly cannot be challenged before us in revision, it seems difficult to uphold the contention of the learned Government Pleader that the election of the respondent, Jamuna Prasad Tripathi, did not come directly within the mischief of R. 16 (1).

[15] Mr. Lal Narain Sinha also suggested, though faintly, that the corrupt practices involved did not materially affect the result of the election because the respondent, Jamuna Prasad, was returned by an overwhelming majority of votes. This argument does not arise in construing R. 16 (1) (b) of the Election Petitions Rules. All that is required under that rule is that the corrupt practice in question must have been committed in the interest of the returned candidate in which case his election must be held to be void.

[16] I am, therefore, of opinion that there is no substance in the application filed on behalf of the applicant, Jamuna Prasad Tripathi, in Civ. Revn. No. 679 of 1949 which accordingly fails and must be dismissed with costs; hearing fee three gold mohurs.

[17] Civ. Revn. No. 773 of 1949. — I shall now turn to Civ. Revn. No. 773 of 1949 which as I have said, is directed against that part of the order of the Election Commissioner in which he found that the election of Jagat Prasad Singh was not void in view of sub-r. (2) of R. 16. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the facts. The petitioner in this case is one of the persons who filed the election petition challenging the election of Jagat Prasad Singh. Mr. P. R. Das who appears for the petitioner contends that the order of the Election Commissioner is clearly wrong and without jurisdiction. He relies upon the findings of the Election Commissioner where he held that the corrupt practices under Part I of the Schedule to the District Board Election Petitions Rules, 1939, had been committed in the interest of both the returned candidates. He also relies upon the finding that the corrupt practices complained of could not be brushed aside as of a trivial nature, and then he contends that having regard to these findings the Election Commissioner had no jurisdiction to act under sub-r. (2) of R. 16.

[18] The contention of Mr. Das rests upon a construction of R. 16, and, therefore, it would be useful to quote the rule in full:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this rule, if, in the opinion of the Election Commissioner —

(a) the election of a returned candidate has been procured or induced, or the result of the election has been naterially affected, by any corrupt practice, or

(b) any corrupt practice specified in Part I of the Schedule to these rules has been committed in the interests of a returned candidate; or

(c) the result of the election has been materially affected by the improper acceptance or rejection of any nomination or by reason of the fact that any person nominated was not qualified or was disqualified for election, or by the improper reception or refusal of a vote or by the reception of any vote which is invalid, or by any non-compliance with the provisions of th

Act or of the rules framed under the Act in respect of the election; or by any mistake in the use of any prescribed form; or

(d) the election has not been a free election by reason of the large number of cases in which bribery or undue influence has been committed;

the election of the returned candidate shall be void.

(2) If the Election Commissioner finds that the returned candidate has been guilty by an agent of any corrupt practice specified in Part I of the Schedule to these rules but further finds that the candidate has satisfied him:

(a) no corrupt practice was committed at the election by the candidate and the corrupt practices found by the Election Officer to have been committed were committed contrary to the orders, and without the sanction or connivance, of the candidate;

(b) that the candidate took all reasonable means for preventing the commission of corrupt practices at the election;

(c) the corrupt practices found by the Election Commissioner to have been committed were of a trivial and limited character or took the form of customary hospitality which did not affect the result of the election; and

(d) in all other respects the election was free from any corrupt practice on the part of the candidate or any of his agents, then the Election Commissioner may find that the election of the returned candidate is not void."

It is quite clear from the above that whereas in sub-r. (1) of R. 16 the word "or" has been used in respect of each of the various clauses, it is to be noted the word "or" is significantly absent in the various clauses of sub-r. (2) of R. 16. Mr. Das accordingly submits that the various clauses in sub-r. (2) must be taken in conjunction with each other. The learned Commissioner having definitely found that the corrupt practices complained of were not "of a trivial and limited character or took the form of customary hospitality which did not affect the result of the election" as required by R. 16 (2) (c), he contends that all the elements necessary to give the candidate the benefit of sub-r. (2) and in order to take him out of the mischief of sub-r. (1) did not exist. Therefore, the first finding of the Election Commissioner that the election was void must stand. Mr. Das further submits that this is not a mere error of law but an error of law which affects the ambit of his jurisdiction, and, therefore open to revision by this Court. He relies upon a decision reported in Harihar Prasad v. Gopal Saran, 14 Pat. 488: (A. I. R. (22) 1935 Pat. 385) where it has been held that if the High Court should find that the lower Court has made a mistake as to the extent of its jurisdiction, it may then interfere, and this is particularly so when the lower Court in determining the ambit of its own jurisdiction considers legislative enactments. Having once found that the election of the respondent Jagat Prasad Singh, also came under R 16 (1) (b) of the rules, the learned Election Commissioner had to declare that the election was void of this candidate as well, unless the candidate could invoke to his aid sub r. (2) of that rule which as discussed above he could not. If all the various clauses of sub-r. (2) are taken conjunctively it is quite clear that one of the conditions contemplated by cl. (c) of that rule has been definitely found to be against the candidate returned, and that being so sub-r. (2) could not come into operation. Consequently, the Election Commissioner could not be deemed to act within his jurisdiction in coming to a finding that the election of Jagat Prasad Singh was not void and this was a matter which really affected the ambit of his jurisdiction. There is apparently much substance in this contention of Mr. Das.

[19] The question, therefore, arises whether these various clauses of sub-r (2) of R 16 of the Election Petitions Rules have to be read conjunctively as contended for by Mr. Das Mr. Mahabir Prasad appearing for the respondent opposite party after some discussion conceded that the construction put upon the rule that the various clauses of sub-r. (2) had to be read conjunctively was a correct construction. He also conceded that the misconstruction of the rule made by the Election Commissioner in spite of his own findings did affect his jurisdiction in pronouncing upon the validity of the election. He, however, contended that there was no definite finding that the corrupt practices complained of were with the knowledge of or at the connivance of the candidate or his agent.

[20] On a perusal of sub-r. (1) of R. 16, it appears that where the election of a returned candidate has been procured or induced by any corrupt practice, the election is void. Such a corrupt practice may be of either variety mentioned in Part I or Part II of the Schedule to the rules. On the findings we are concerned with cl. (b) of sub-r. (1) of R. 16 which provides that where any corrupt practice specified in Part I of the Schedule to these rules has been committed in the interest of a returned candidate, the election of the returned candidate shall be void. Therefore, cl. (b) of sub-r. (1) refers to corrupt practices of Part I variety. Now, in Part I of the Schedule we find various kinds of corrupt practices specified but in each one of these instances it is to be noticed that it must be either by the candidate or his agent or by any other person "with the connivance of the candidate or his agent." So far as Jagat Prasad Singh is concerned, there is a definite finding by the Commissioner in his favour to the effect that the Election Commissioner was satisfied that these corrupt practices were resorted to without his knowledge and connivance. The question then arises whether he can even then take advantage of an election in which corrupt practices have been committed in his interest provided they were committed with the knowledge or connivance of his agent which, as I have said, is an essential factor in all the various instances specified in Part I of the Schedule to the rules. On that point, there does not appear to be any definite finding arrived at by the Election Commissioner. Our attention has been drawn to a part of the judgment wherein the Election Commissioner held as follows :

"Exhibit 6 shows that the Secretary of the District Congress Committee who was acting as polling agent for the respondents filed a petition before one of the Presiding Officers of Sirisia polling station and the agent Kailash Behari of the petitioners was given last warning that he would be turned out if he would challenge the women voters any further."

In this Ex. 6 it appears that the Secretary of the District Congress Committee described himself as a polling agent only of one of the respondents, namely, Jamuna Prasad Tripathi, and not of the respondent Jagat Prasad Singh as well. Therefore, the value of this finding is greatly shaken by this error of record which has crept in the judgment of the Election Commissioner. We were also referred to another portion of the judgment wherein it is pointed out that Jagat Prasad Singh took no active part but that he was all along in Bochaha Booth, and that the Congress party was doing the work for him. So he did not even come to Muzaffarpur, Sirsia and Kamtaul polling booths where these corrupt practices were resorted to. It is argued that the Congress party was really conducting the election on behalf of both the respondents who had been set up by the party, and therefore, it must be held that the Secretary of the Congress party was the agent of both the candidates. It is no doubt true that the law of agency in election cases goes much further than the ordinary law of principal and agent. There may be no direct proof of an actual appointment of an agent. A man may be proved to be an agent of a candidate on the various facts and circumstances leading to such an inference in a particular case; but the trouble in this case is that there is no definite finding that the corrupt practices in question were resorted to with the knowledge or connivance of any agent of Jagat Prasad Singh. At one stage I was inclined to think that the case should be remitted to the Election Commissioner for disposal after a finding on the point whether the corrupt practices of Part I variety referred to in cl. (b) of R. 16 (1) were with the knowledge of Jagat Prasad's agent, if any. But it seems to me that no useful purpose will be served now by sending the case back on remand at such a late stage, the election in question having taken place in May and June, 1947.

[21] As at present advised I am inclined to agree with the contention of Mr. Das that the various clauses in sub-r. (2) of R. 16 have to be read conjunctively, and that all the conditions enumerated in those clauses must be found to exist before a returned candidate can take advantage of sub-r. (2). This distinction is clearly brought out by the fact that in sub-r. (1) the various clauses are made disjunctive by the use of the word "or" which is absent in sub r. (2) where all the clauses are connected one after the other by a semi-colon and finally with the conjunction "and" linking up the last cl. (d) of that sub-rule Sub rule (2) is obviously an exception to sub-r. (1) and this exception must be rigorously found before a returned candidate can take any advantage of it. This exception in sub-r. (2) can have no application at all where the returned candidate is himself found guilty of the corrupt practices of the Part I variety referred to in R. 16 (1) (b) and R. 16 (2) of the rules. It can only come into play where the candidate himself is innocent but his agent is guilty or has knowledge of or connived at the corrupt practices in question. It is in that case alone, if all the conditions mentioned in the various clauses of the sub rule are found to exist, that the successful candidate can be exonerated and his election upheld otherwise he cannot take advantage of the election vitiated by those practices. Such an interpretation is in consonance with public policy and the real intention of the rules to keep inviolate the purity of these elections. I agree with the view of the Election Commissioner in so far as he held that :

"The rules, however, as framed do not seem to tolerate any moral turpitude on the part of the returned candidate in obtaining his election. The rules do not seem to like that the local bodies be filled with persons of questionable and doubtful honesty and integrity. That is why R. 16 appears to be so strict in the matter of corrupt practices resorted to in the interest of a returned candidate to his knowledge and with his connivance by his workers."

But I do not agree with him in his application of sub-r. (2) of R. 16 to the case of Jagat Prasad Singh. I, however, think, as I have said, that the case does not at this stage call for any interference in revision on our part specially when there is no clear finding against Jagat Prasad, the respondent opposite party, that the corrupt practices in question were brought about with the knowledge or connivance of his agent. The Secretary of the Congress Committee may or may not have been his agent but at any rate Ex. 6 does not show that he was the polling agent of Jagat Prasad Singh as wrongly appears to have been assumed by the learned Election Commissioner. That being so, I would dismiss this application also but in the circumstances without costs.

[22] In the result both the applications fail, and the order passed by the Election Commissioner stands.

[23] Das J.— I agree to the orders proposed to be passed by my learned brother, and would state, very briefly my opinion on the questions raised and the reasons therefor.

[24] Civ. Revn No 679 of 1949 : Jamuna Prasad Tripathi.—I do not think that it is necessary to decide in this case the question of the meaning of the word "contract" occurring in R. 3 (b), District Board Electoral Rules, 1937, and I wish to guard myself against expressing any final or concluded view that the word "contract" in the rule means something more than an agreement enforceable by law and includes a transfer of property or any interest in property, e. g. a lease or a sale. It may be doubted if a person is disqualified for election merely because he has taken a lease of or purchased some property from the District Board. If the decision of the Election Commissioner had rested only on the interpretation put upon R. 3 (b) aforesaid, and it was found that the interpretation was wrong, it might, I think, be said with some force that the error of law related to the extent of the jurisdiction of the Election Commissioner to declare the election void.

[25] But there is the clear finding of the Election Commissioner that Jamuna prasad Tripathi knew and had connived at corrupt practices of the kind specified in item 3 of Part I of the Schedule to the District Board Election Petition Rules, 1939 His election was thus void under R. 16 (1) (b). As long as that finding stands — and nothing has been stated before us which would entitle us to go behind that finding — there can be no interference with the order of the Election Commissioner.

[26] Civ. Revn.No. 773 of 1949 : Jagat Prasad Singh.— I agree with my learned brother that the four cls. (a) to (d) in R. 16 (2), District Board Election Petitions Rules, should be read conjunctively, and the learned Election Commissioner made an error of law in thinking otherwise. I also agree that such an error would attract the operation of S. 115, Civil P. C., as it related to the extent of jurisdiction of the Election Commissioner.

[27] I am not satisfied, however, that the finding of the learned Election Commissioner, so far as Jagat Prasad Singh is concerned, is a finding that corrupt practices of the kind specified in Part I of the Schedule were committed, so as to make his election void under R 16 (1) (b). Though the learned Election Commissioner considered and put the case of both the returned candidates together, while giving his finding about the corrupt practices resorted to at the election he clearly found that Jagat Prasad neither knew nor connived at those corrupt practices. Therefore, to make the election of Jagat Prasad viod within the meaning of R. 16 (1) (b), it would be necessary to find that the corrupt practices were resorted to, at least, by or with the connivance of the agent ; for by the definition of item 3 of Part I of the Schedule (with which item we are concerned) such connivance is essential to distinguish corrupt practices of Part I variety from those of Part II variety. Such a finding is absent, or at least not clearly expressed ; and in view of the error of record regarding Ex. 6, to which my learned brother has referred, it is not possible to spell out such a finding against Jagat Prasad from what the learned Election Commissioner has said on the point of corrupt practices.

[28] Thus, the Election Commissioner has substantially come to a correct conclusion about the election of Jagat Prasad, though he was in error about R. 16 (2).

A. F. A. D. No. 2460 of 1947, D/- 16-8-1950.

(a) Tenancy Laws—Bihar Tenancy Act (VIII [8] of 1885), S. 182 — Applicability – Homestead in different but contiguous village—Section applies.

Section 182 applies in the case of a raiyat who holds his homestead land in one village and has agricultural land in another, provided the lands in the two villages are either adjacent or in close proximity. The tenant, therefore, cannot be ejected as a mere tenant-at-will and he has the protection given to his homestead land in the same manner as the protection which he enjoys with reference to the lands he holds in the right of occupancy, although the two lands are in different villages: Case law discussed. [Paras 12, 14]

(b) Tenancy Laws – Bihar Tenancy Act (VIII [8] of 1885), S. 182 – Scope of.

Section 182, Bihar Tenancy Act, does not create a homestead land into an occupancy holding. This provision merely extends to it in the absence of local custom or usage the provisions of the Act appliable to the land held by a raiyat. If a raiyat has occupancy holding with occupancy rights, the incidents of the tenancy of his homestead would be regulated accordingly. This, however, does not mean that his homestead is an occupancy holding. [Para 13]

(c) Tenancy Laws - Bihar Tenancy Act (VIII [8] of 1885), S. 182 - Homestead land — Meaning of.

The homestead land is prima facie the land where the home of the agriculturist is situated and in which he resides. It may be that the agriculturist has lands at some distance from the homestead land, but he cultivates his agricultural land by going to it for that purpose from his homestead land. There is, therefore, necessarily some connection between his agricultural land and homestead land. [Para 8]

A. N. Lal—for Appellants; Brahmdeo Narain and P. Jha - for Respondents.

Imam J.—The plaintiffs are the appellants and they have appealed against a decision of the Subordinate Judge of Gaya, who reversed the decision of the fourth additional Munsif of Aurangabad. The appellants had filed a suit for the ejectment of the defendants from plot No 121 in tauzi No. 4932 with an area of .04 acres. It was the case of the plaintiffs that this land was gairmazrua malik and that on a private partition amongst the landlords plot No. 121 had fallen to the plaintiffs' takhta. Their further case, as argued before the trial Court, though not in their plaint, was that the defendants were inducted on to the land to render service and that when they ceased to render service, they were liable to be ejected from the plot in question. The plaintiffs and the pro forma defendants were co sharer landlords to the extent of two annas eight pies in tauzi No. 4932. The pro forma defendants supported the case of the plaintiffs. By the expression the defendants' in this judgment, I do not include the pro forma defendants.

[2] The facts found by the lower appellate Court are that the defendants are settled raiyats of village Nirmal Bigha, which is contiguous to village Tendua, in which plot No. 121 is situated, that the defendants were not inducted on to the land to render service to the plaintiffs, that defendant 1 has been cultivating the land on batai in village Tendua for the last fifteen years or so, and that the defendants have been living in the house on plot No. 121 for the last three generations.

[3] On the questions of law, the lower appellate Court was of the opinion that as defendant 1 had taken settlement of land in village Tendua at a later date than plot No. 121, it was debatable as to whether the defendants could acquire occupancy right in plot No. 121. Relying upon the decision of the Calcutta High Court in Bhikariram Bhagat v. Maharaj Bahadur Singh, A. I. R. (3) 1916 Cal. 60 : (43 Cal. 195), it was of the opinion that although the defendants were settled raiyats of village Nirmal Bigha and had acquired occupancy rights there, the provisions of S. 182, Bihar Tenancy Act, came to their aid with regard to plot No. 121 in village Tendua which was their homestead land, and the incidents of its tenancy were regulated by the provisions of the Bihar Tenancy Act applicable to lands held by a raiyat. In the opinion of the lower appellate Court, it made no difference that the homestead land was in village Tendua while the lands held in occupancy were in Nirmal Bigha a contiguous village. It rejected the contention of the plaintiffs that S. 182 of the Act could only be applied if the raiyat holds the homestead land in the same village as the land held by him as a raiyat. The lower appellate Court referred to several decisions of this Court, to which reference will be made, but was of the opinion that none of them actually dissented from the decision of the Calcutta High Court in Bhikariram Bhagat v Maharaj Bahadur Singh, A I. R (3) 1916 Cal 60 : (43 Cal. 195). It accordingly held that the defendants could not be ejected and that the plaintiffs' suit must be dismissed.

[4] In this Court, this appeal came up for hearing before Das J. who was of the opinion that the appeal should be heard by a Division Bench.

[5] On the findings, it must be assumed that the defendants were settled raiyats of village Nirmal Bigha and has acquired occupancy right therein. It must also be assumed that village Nirmal Bigha is contiguous to village Tendua where plot No. 121 is situated. It is necessary then to examine in the first instance the provisions of the Bihar Tenancy Act contained in Ss. 182 and 21. Section 182 reads as follows:

"When a raiyat holds his homestead otherwise than as part of his holding as a raiyat, the incidents of his tenancy to the homestead shall be regulated by local custom or usage and subject to local custom or usage by the provisions of this Act applicable to the land held by a raiyat."

It is clear on the findings that the defendants were raiyats and that they held the land, plot No. 121, as their homstead otherwise than as part of their holding. The question is as to how the incidents of their tenancy to the homestead shall be regulated. There is no question of custom or usage in this case as none has been pleaded or proved. Therefore, the incidents of their tenancy to the homestead will be regulated by the provisions of the Bihar Tenancy Act applicable to the land held by them as raiyat. On a plain reading of the section, the position comes to this that the defendants were raiyats and held lands as raiyats while they possessed the homestead land, plot No. 121. Section 182 speaks nothing of the homestead land being held by the raiyat in the same village as the raiyati land held by him. It has been held again and again that

S. 182, should be given a liberal interpretation, the main purpose of its provisions being to afford some protection to the raiyat with reference to the homestead. The argument on the other hand that the raiyati land held by the raiyat must be in the same village as his homestead land is, I think, largely based on the wording of the provisions of S. 21, Bihar Tenancy Act. Sub-cl. (1) of that section says that a settled raiyat of a village shall have the right of occupancy in all lands for the time being held by him as a raiyat in that village. Sub-clause (2) need not be specifically referred to, but it is noticeable that in that clause also the words "in that village" appear. It was suggested that because a person may be a settled raiyat of a village within the meaning of S. 20 of the Act and that he could thereby acquire a right of occupancy in all lands held by him in the same village as a raiyat, therefore S. 182 of the Act must necessarily refer to such a person having homestead in the same village as the land held by him. In my opinion, S. 182 of the Act does not create a holding, nor does it confer any particular status to the person who holds homestead land. It merely sets out a protective measure to the holder of homestead land if he is raiyat, and the protection given is in the absence of custom or usage, what would be applicable under the Act to the land held by such a person as a raiyat. Mr. Aditya Narain Lal has relied upon certain observations of Sinha J. in Mahadeo-ashram Prosad v. Parikha Choudhury, A. I. R. (32) 1945 Pat. 428 : (24 Pat. 366). The real point decided in that case was as to whether S. 26A, Bihar Tenancy Act, was applicable to the transfer of a homestead land. In considering this main question, his Lordship referred to an observation of Rampini J. in Golam Mowla v. Abdool Sowar, 13 C. L. J. 255 : (9 I. C. 922) to the following effect :

"Even though the defendant is not a raiyat in respect of this piece of bastu land in dispute between the parties, still under S. 182, the provisions of this Act applicable to land held by a raiyat are applicable to this particular piece of land, in other words, he has, under S. 21, a right of occupancy in this piece of bastu land as well in the agricultural land in village of which he is a settled raiyat."

Sinha J. as to this observed :

"I am not sure whether the learned Judge has not stated the result of the application of S. 182 a little too broadly. Section 182 does not say in so many words that a raiyat, holding his homestead otherwise than as a part of his holding as a raiyat, shall acquire in the homestead all the rights, and be subject to all the liabilities, that he has as a raiyat in his holding. If it had said that, certainly the homestead would have constituted a separate raiyati holding with all the incidents of such a holding. What S. 182 lays down, in my opinion, inter alia, is that a raiyat shall not be ejected from his homestead, so long as he continues to be a raiyat of some land in the village; for example S. 182 does not have the effect of making the raiyat liable for payment of rent for the homestead portion on the same terms as he holds his raiyati land, though in this case, as in other cases, the land is belagan."

Emphasis is laid on the words "so long as he continues to be a raiyat of some land in the village." The facts of the case, however, make it clear that the question of land in different villages did not arise and his Lordship was not considering as to what is the proper construction to be given to the provisions of S 182 in circumstances such as appear in the present case. It may be noticed at this stage that although their Lordships in Mahadeoashram Prosad v. Parikha Choudhury, A. I. R. (32) 1945 Pat 428 : (24 Pat. 366) held, though Sinha J did so hesitatingly, that S 26A, Bihar Tenancy Act, was applicable to a transfer of homestead land, the Full Bench of this Court in Harinaram Singh v. Babui Mohari, A. I. R. (36) 1949 Pat. 413 : (30 P L T 403 F. B.) took definitely a contrary view.

[6] Mr. Lal then referred to the case of Bishnath Singh v. Mt. Bibi Ayesha, 11 P. L. T. 107 : (A. I. R (17) 1930 Pat 224). In this case, however, the lands were in the same village and the question, which is for our present consideration, did not come up for consideration.

[7] Mr. Lal then referred to the case of Ganga Singh v. Chairman District Board, Patna, A. I. R. (6) 1919 Pat. 108 : (50 I C. 8) where their Lordships said of the decision of the Calcutta High Court in Kripanath v. Sekh Anu, 4 C. L. J. 332 : (10 C. W. N. 944), that that decision was very far-reaching and may under suitable conditions require further judicial consideration in this Province. Their Lordships of the Calcutta High Court in the said decision said that it was not required by S. 182, Bihar Tenancy Act, that a tenant in occupation of homestead land should be a raiyat in the village in which the homestead land is situated. In the case before their Lordships the defendants held culturable lands in the immediate vicinity of their homestead but situated in a different village, but that would not in their opinion prevent the application of the provision of S. 182 of the Act. The learned Judges were Rampini and Moohkerjee JJ. (late Sir Ashutosh Mookherjee). The view of these eminent Judges cannot be easily brushed aside.

[8] Mr. Brahmdeo Narain, on the other hand, has asked us to construe S. 182 in such a way as not to make the reading of it leading to absurdities. He urged that the word 'homestead' in S. 182 must necessarily mean land from which the tenant cultivates his land, that is to say that the tenant uses the homestead land for the purpose of his residence and that land is either adjacent to the land which he cultivates or in close proximity to it. The word 'homestead' could not possibly be read to mean land on which the tenant has a house in which he resides and from which he does not do his cultivation. If what he suggested is to be the true meaning of the word homestead, then obviously in the largest number of cases, such land would be either adjacent or in close proximity to the land which the tenant actually cultivated. He first referred to the case of Pogode v. Rajoo Dhopee, 22 W. R 511. Although this decision was before the Bengal Tenancy Act was enacted, it seems to me that the observations made by Markby J. in the case are relevant. The land was described as bastoo land, which his Lordship explained as lands upon 'which houses stand, inhabited by persons engaged in agriculture and are adjacent to the lands which the raiyats who inhabit those houses cultivate and that it would appear that they are held of the same landlord as the lands which are cultivated. His Lordship further observed that distinction has frequently been drawn between the houses in a town and what are called homestead lands of raiyats engaged in agriculture, and the general rule laid down is that although Act X [10] of 1859 did not apply to the former, yet it applied to the latter. The homestead land, it seems to me, is prima facie the land where the home of the agriculturist is situated and in which he resides. It may be that the agriculturist has lands at some distance from the homestead land but he cultivates his agricultural land by going to it for that purpose from his homestead land. There is, therefore, necessarily some connection between his agricultural land and homestead land.

[9] The next case referred to by Mr. Brahmdeo Narain is Dina Nath v. Sashi Mohan, 31 I. C. 16 : (A. I. R. (3) 1916 Cal. 730), a decision of the Calcutta High Court of a Bench consisting of Sir Ashutosh Mukherji and Newbould J. Their Lordships relied upon several cases including the decision of Rampini J. in Kripa Nath v. Saikh Anu, 4 C. L. J. 332: (10 C. W. N. 944) for the proposition that in order to make S. 182 applicable it was not essential that the homestead should be in the same village or be held under the same landlord as the holding of the raiyat.

[10] In the case of Pratap Chandra v. Biseswar Paramanick, 9 C. W. N. 416 the, position was that the raiyat was holding agricultural land under one landlord and the homestead land under another.

[11] In Harihar v. Dinu Bera, 16 C. W. N. 536 : (10 I C 139), the position was that the raiyat was holding his agricultural land in one village and his homestead land in another village and under different landlords. Sir Ashutosh Mookerjee and Teunon JJ. were definitely of the opinion that the provisions of S. 182, Bengal Tenancy Act applied.

[12] It seems to me, therefore, that the tendency of the Calcutta High Court has been to apply the provisions of S. 182, Bengal Tenancy Act, in the case of a raiyat who holds his homestead land in one village and has agricultural land in another, provided the lands in the two villages are either adjacent or in close proximity. In Bengal, there has been an amendment in 1928 of S. 182, Bengal Tenancy Act, where it has been made perfectly clear that its provisions would apply whether the holding of a raiyat was within the same village as his homestead or in another village contiguous to that. I take it that the amendment was in conformity with the case law as to be found in Bengal. Mr. A. N. Lal frankly conceded that he had not found a single case from Calcutta taking a contrary view to that which has been expressed in the cases of that Court, which I have already referred to, nor a single decision of this Court taking specifically a different view.

[13] Mr. A. N. Lal, however, relied on the Full Bench decision of this Court in Harinarain Singh v. Babur Mohari, A.I R. (36) 1949 Pat. 413 (30 P. L. T. 403 F. B), to show that it was held by their Lordships that the provisions of S. 26A, Bihar Tenancy Act, has no application to transfer of homestead lands. It seems to me, however, that the provisions of S. 182, Bihar Tenancy Act, do not create a homestead land into an occupancy holding. These provisions merely extend to it in the absence of local custom or usage the provisions of the Act applicable to the land held by a raiyat. If a raiyat has occupancy holding with occupancy rights, the incidents of the tenancy of his homestead would be regulated accordingly. This, however, does not mean that his homestead is an occupancy holding. Section 26A refers to the case of a transfer of an occupancy holding or a portion of it together with right of occupancy therein. It seems to me that the decision of their Lordships in the Full Bench case does not affect the question which we have to consider in the present case.

[14] Having regard to the view taken by the Calcutta High Court and giving to S. 182 its true interpretation, although its words are wide, it seems to me that the decision of the Court below, in law, was correct when it took the view that the defendant could not be ejected as he was not a mere tenant-at-will. He had the protection given to his homestead land in the same manner as the protection which he enjoyed with reference to the lands he held, in Nirmal Bigha,

[15] Having regard to the view which I take in the case, it is unnecessary to say anything on the other question of law referred to by the lower appellate Court, namely as to whether the lands held by the defendant in village Tendua acquired after PLOT NO. 121 could give him the protection afforded by S. 182, Bihar Tenancy Act.

[16] I would accordingly dismiss this appeal with costs.

[17] Sarjoo Prasad J. — I entirely agree. As the question is of some importance, I would like to add a few remarks. The application of S. 182, Bihar Tenancy Act, to cases where the homestead of the raiyat lies in one village and his raiyati lands in another village has always raised perplexing problems. The cursus curiae of the Calcutta High Court seems to be in favour of the view that whether the homestead of the tenant lies in one village and his raiyati lands in another, or whether these two kinds of holdings are held under different landlords, S. 182, Bengal Tenancy Act will apply to protect the interest of the tenant. In other words, the incidents of his raiyati land will regulate the incidents of his homestead. So far as this Court is concerned, there has been no direct decision upon the point, and in one or two cases where the point did not directly arise, this Court was reluctant to accept the whole effect of the Calcutta view. One of the leading cases of the Calcutta High Court on the point is the decision in Kripanath v. Seikh Anu, 4 C. L. J. 332 : (10 C.W.N. 944), the judgment having been delivered by Rampini J. himself, a reputed authority on land tenures, with which Mookherjee J. another eminent Judge, also agree. The decision of these eminent Judges, as my learned brother has observed cannot be lightly brushed aside. In Ganga Singh v. Chairman District Board, Patna, A.I.R. (6) 1919 Pat. 108 : (50 I. C. 8), the homestead as well as the raiyati holdings were in the same village, but when the attention of their Lordships was drawn to the decision of the Calcutta High Court in Kirpa Nath v. Seikh Anu, 4 C L.J. 332 : (10 C.W.N. 944), they observed that that decision was very far reaching and may under suitable conditions require further judicial consideration in this Province. To a similar effect is the observation made by Sinha J. in Mahadeoshram Prasad v. Parikha Chouhury, 24 Pat. 366 : A. I. R. (32) 1945 Pat. 428. As I said the two cases of this Court, where the observations were made, were cases in which the raiyati holding as also the homestead were situated in the same village. If the observations made by Rampini J. in Kirpa Nath v. Seikh Anu, 4 C.L.J. 332 : (10 C.W.N. 944), are intended to mean that although the homestead holding and the raiyati lands of the raiyat are widely apart, situated in distant villages and one having no connection with the other, and yet the raiyat could be entitled to the benefit of S. 182, then probably the decision might require some modification. But, in my opinion, the solution of the problem lies in the meaning of the expression 'homestead' as has been rightly suggested by Mr. Brahmdeo Narain for the respondents. The word 'homestead' must mean the homestead land of the tenant in the neighbourhood of the raiyati land, or in other words in the vicinity of the raiyati land from where the raiyat carries on his agricultural operations in respect of the raiyati land. If that finding is there, as the finding in this case is, that the cultivation of the raiyati lands by the tenant in village Nirmal Bigha is carried on from village Tendua, where the homestead lands are situated, then in that case S. 182, Bihar Tenancy Act, must apply to protect the interest of the tenant. That is why the position appears to have been made clear by the amendment of the Bengal Tenancy Act in 1928, as pointed out by the Calcutta High Court in Indra Chand v. Tinkari Ghose. A I. R. (37) 1950 Cal. 170. The amendment there, as my learned brother has shown, is to the effect that if the homestead land is in any village "contiguous" to the village where the raiyati lands lie, the incident of his homestead will be governed by the incident of his tenancy. In my opinion, the term "homestead" although not actually defined in the Bihar Tenancy Act, carries the same implication.

(a) Contract Act (1872), S. 73 — Contract for sale of goods—Late delivery—Goods sold by purchaser —Damages for late delivery—Measure of.

Where in a contract for sale of goods, the goods are delivered late, the measure of damages is the difference between the market price on the due date of delivery and on the day of actual delivery, as given by S 73, Illus (e). But this test is subject to the main section that the purchaser must prove loss or damage caused to him. Where, however, the purchaser sells the goods after the late delivery, the mere difference in price on the relevant dates is not sufficient to establish the loss. The measure of loss in such a case is the difference between the market price on the due date and the price actually obtained by sale of the goods. Where the fact of sale is established but the sale price is not proved, the purchaser is not entitled to any damages: 1911 A. C.

(b) Railways Act (1890), S. 77 — Notice under—Notice relating to non-delivery combined with non-delivery due to loss or destruction—Held, sufficent compliance with S. 77.

If it is the law that it is not open to a person to give notice until he is certain on the point whether it is a pure case of non-delivery or of non-delivery due to loss or destruction, it might become too late for him to give such notice at all, for the knowledge might come to him much more than six months after the goods were delivered for transport. Where, therefore, a person combines both these notices in one notice given at a stage when it is not possible for him to decide whether it is a pure case of non-delivery or the other, the notice is sufficient under S. 77 to entitle him to sue for non-delivery due to loss or non-delivery: A. I. R. (36) 1949 Pat. 410, Ref. [Para 11]

Anno. Railways Act, S. 77, N. 1.

N. C. Ghose and P. K. Bose—for Appellant; Rajkishore Prasad, Shambhu Saran, Shivanugrah Narayan and Rajkishore Prasad — for Respondents.

Reuben J.— These two appeals are directed against a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Patna, in Money Suits Nos. 1 and 11 of 1944, which were tried analogously by him. The appellant was the defendant in both the suits.

[2] The suits were for the recovery of damages for short delivery and for loss due to delay in the delivery of two consignments of Indian cotton piece goods made over to the B. B. and C. I. Railway at Ahmedabad on 10-4-1943 for transport to and delivery at Bigha Ghat on the O. T. Railway. In the ordinary course, these consignments should have arrived at Digha Ghat in the first week of May. Actually they arrived on 8-11-1943. The consignee finding them to be in a damaged condition, took open delivery on 23-11-1943. Shortages were found in both the consignments, Rs. 696 in Money Suit No. 11 of 1944 and Rs. 227 in Money Suit No. 1. The plaintiffs claim these amounts on account of the short delivery, and, on account of loss due to late delivery. They base their claim on the difference between the market prices of cotton piece goods on the date when the consignments should have been delivered and on the date when they were, in fact, delivered. The Subordinate Judge has held that, during this period, there was a depreciation in the price of 25 per cent. of the value on the date when the goods should have been delivered. He has decreed the suits accordingly.

[3] The appellant does not challenge the decrees so far as they relate to short delivery. As regards delay in delivery, two points are urged on his behalf:

(1) that the appellant was sued as the owner of the O. T. Railway and, under the provisions of S. 80, Railways Act, the plaintiffs are not entitled to a decree against him without proof that the O. T. Railway Administration was responsible for the delay, and

(2) that the plaintiffs have not proved that they have suffered loss by reason of the delay in delivery and, in any case, the evidence given by them is insufficient to prove the amount of damages they should get.

On behalf of the plaintiffs a third point is pressed, that the decrees appealed from are decrees against the Governor General in Council as owner of the B. B. and C. I., the E. I. and the O. T. Railways, that the appeals have been filed by him only in the capacity of the owner of the O. T. Railway, and that, therefore, the decrees are final so far as the other two Railways are concerned.

[4] It will be convenient to take up the second point first. The other two points can be dealt with together afterwards.

[5] The provision for compensation when there is a breach of contract is made by S. 73, Contract Act. I reproduce the relevant portion:

"When a contract has been broken, the party who suffers by such breach is entitled to receive, from the party who has broken the contract, compensation for any loss or damage caused to him thereby, which naturally arose in the usual course of things from such breach, or which the parties knew, when they made the contract, to be likely to result from the breach of it.

* * * * * *

Explanation.—In estimating the loss or damage arising from a breach of contract, the means which existed of remedying the inconvenience caused by the non-performance of the contract must be taken into account."

There follow a number of illustrations. Illustration (e) exactly covers the present case. According to it, the test adopted by the Subordinate Judge namely, the difference between the market prices on the due day of delivery and on the day of actual delivery, is correct; this is subject however, to the main provision of the section which I have reproduced above. From the portion of the citation which I have placed in italic, it is clear that the plaintiff must prove loss or damage. Ordinarily the mere difference in price on the two relevant dates is sufficient to establish this fact. In the present case, it is urged that it is not sufficient because it is admitted by the Munim of the plaintiffs (P. W. 1) that the goods were sold. The witness admits, further, that particulars of the sales are to be found in the account books of the plaintiffs, but those account books have not been produced and no particulars of the sales have been given. It is possible it is urged, that, on the prices obtained, no loss was suffered by the plaintiffs; or, at least, it is possible that the sales were at prices exceeding the market prices in November and that the loss incurred was considerably less than that shown by a comparison of the market prices on the respective dates. On behalf of the appellant, reference has been made to Jamal v. Moolla Dawood, Sons & Co., 43 I. A. 6: (A. I. R. (2) 1915 P. C. 48) as an authority that the price actually obtained by the plaintiffs by selling these goods is irrelevant for the purpose of ascertaining the damages to be given to them in a suit for breach of contract. That was a case of a contract for the sale of negotiable securities and their Lordships of the Judicial Committee, in stating the point for consideration were careful at p. 10 of the report to specify this fact. They found that the retention of the shares after the breach had occurred was a speculation of the plaintiff. As such, it was his speculation and, since the other party could not be penalised for any loss he might suffer thereby, it could not claim any profit he might get by means of that speculation. The decision was followed as an authority in a case similar to the present one in G. I. P. Rly. v Jugul Kishore, 52 ALL. 238: (A. I. R. (17) 1930 ALL. 132). With respect I would suggest that the correct principle was laid down by the Judicial Committee in Wertheim v. Chicoutimi Pulp Co., (1911) A. C. 301 : (80 L. J. P. C. 91). In that case the plaintiff sought to recover damages for late delivery at 27 sh. 6 d. a ton, the difference in the market price on the due date and on the date of actual delivery. It appeared, however, that he had sold the goods at 65 sh. a ton involving a loss to him, as compared with the price on the due date of only 5 sh. a ton. It was contended on his behalf that the rule on which he based his claim was

> "the well established and indisputable measure of damages for delay in breach of contract in delivery of goods."

Their Lordships pointed out that, if his reasoning was accepted, the result would be that, whereas if the goods had been delivered in time his profit would have been 32 sh. per ton, he should now get damages according to the above formula in addition to the profit made by the sale at 65 sh. per ton, making a total profit to him of 54 sh. 6 d. per ton, the result being that the plaintiff would get a profit at 22 sh. 6d. more per ton than if the contract had never been broken at all. Their Lordships, therefore, accepted the contention for the defence and allowed damages only at 5 sh. a ton. In the present case, there is nothing to suggest that there was any holding back of the goods by way of speculation. Hence, the rule laid down in Wertheim v. Chicoutimi Pulp Co., (1911 A. C. 301 : 80 L. J. P. C. 91) would apply, and the price at which the goods were sold not having been proved, the plaintiffs are not entitled to any damages.

[6] Further, even accepting the rule which has been followed by the Subordinate Judge, it seems to me that there is insufficient evidence to establish the rate at which damages should be allowed. The evidence on the point falls into three classes. There is the evidence of two witnesses who come from Ahmedabad from which place the goods were despatched and where the mills which supplied the goods were situated. These witnesses know nothing about the prices at Patna. They only tell us about the rate of prices in Ahmedabad, and the general result of their depositions is that, between May and November of that year, the prices fell about 25 to 35 per cent. Secondly, there is the evidence of three witnesses belonging to Patna, one of them an employee of the plaintiffs and the other two employees of other firms in Patna. Their evidence is very general and they depose that the price of the cotton piece goods fell about 50 per cent. during this period. They do not depose particularly about the price of cotton piece goods of the sort with which we are concerned. In view of this fact and also because of the failure of the plaintiffs to produce their account books showing the entries relating to the sale of the cotton piecegoods in question, the Subordinate Judge found himself unable to accept the evidence of these witnesses. Thirdly, there are some account books of the plaintiffs and of two other firms at Patna. Only a very few entries in these books, eight in all, have been marked as exhibits—I say advisedly "marked as exhibits" and not "proved". The Subordinate Judge rejected the entries in the books of the plaintiffs, because the books were produced very late. As regards the books of the other two firms, he pointed out that the entries did not relate to the same sorts of cloth and, further, he was not prepared to believe that, during this period, the prices fell as much as 50 per cent. It has been pointed out to us that two of the entries in those books, namely Exs. 3 (d) and 3 (e) relate to dhotis No. 2470 which is one of the different varieties of cloth forming a part of the consignments with which we are concerned. Exhibit 3 (d) relates to sale of two pairs of dhotis in May 1943 at Rs. 8-10-0 per pair and Ex. 3 (e) to sale in November 1943 of one pair of dhotis at Rs 3-8-0 a pair. To my mind, two individual transactions like this are insufficient to establish what were the ruling market prices. Even if I accepted these entries as reliable, therefore, I would not accept them as evidence for this purpose Looking at the deposition of Sheo Narain Lal (P. W. 2), however, I find that the transactions have not been properly proved. The witness depo-es:

"These entries in the credit books of the firm are in my pen and in the pen of Beni Madho marked Exs. 3 (b) and 3 (c)."

[The portion in italics appears from the record to be a mistake for "Exhibits 3 (b) to 3 (e)".]

The mere existence of these entries in the account books in the handwriting of a particular person is not sufficient to prove that there were really such transactions. What the witness says is insufficient to establish that he has any personal knowledge of these particular transactions and can vouch that such transactions took place. The same is the case with the entries in the account book of the firm of Babulal Narain Prasad, which Mahabirji Kalawatia (P. W. 3) proves to be in the handwriting of Lakhan Lal Gumasta. We find this also in the case of the entries in the books of the plaintiffs, which Shyam Sunder Agrawala (P. W. 1) proves to be in the handwriting of Ramjiwan Ram and of Sarju Prasad. It is for this reason that, when mentioning these entries above, I said that they had been "marked as exhibits".

[7] In the absence of satisfactory evidence regarding market prices in Patna, the learned Subordinate Judge has inferred the probable drop in prices at Patna from the drop in prices during the corresponding period at Ahmedabad. That drop, as I have mentioned above, was between 25 to 35 per cent. It is hardly necessary to state that this reasoning is purely conjectural. There is no logical connection between the price at Ahmedabad and those at Patna. There are many factors which determine what the price of a particular commodity at a particular place will be, and it may well happen that, owing to local factors, the prices at Patna may have gone up, although those at Ahmedabad went down. The conclusion arrived at by the learned Subordinate Judge, therefore, cannot be supported.

[8] On the authority of Erroll Mackay v. Kameshwar Singh, 59 I. A. 398: (A I. R (19) 1932 P. C. 196), it has been contended on behalf of the respondents that the prices at Ahmedabad, and not those at Patna formed the proper criterion for assessing the damages payable in this case. That decision related to an entirely different set of circumstances. The claim for damages arose out of a failure by a vendor to supply at Purnea 200 mds. of indigo seed. Under S. 73, Ill. (e), Contract Act, damages were recoverable at the difference between the contract price and the price for which the purchaser might have obtained a like quantity of indigo seed at Purnea on the due date for delivery. Evidence showed that there was no market for indigo seed at or near Purnea, and that Cawnpore, 300 or 400 miles from Purnia, was the central market for indigo seed to which growers at Purnea and purchasers resorted. It was in these circumstances that it was held that the damages should be based upon the market price at Cawnpore. Here, Ahmedabad is merely the wholesale market from which the plaintiffs obtained the goods in question. The goods were purchased by them for resale at Patna or in its neighbourhood. The wholesale or even the retail prices at Ahmedabad are, therefore, irrelevant.

[9] This brings me to points 1 and 3. To understand them, it is necessary to refer to the provisions of Ss 77 and 80, Railways Act, which are reproduced below:

77. A person shall not be entitled to a refund of an overcharge in respect of animals or goods carried by railway or to compensation for the loss, destruction or deterioration of animals or goods delivered to be so carried unless his claim to the refund or compensation has been preferred in writing by him or on his behalf to the railway administration within six months from the date of the delivery of the animals or goods for carriage by railway.

80. Notwithstanding anything in any agreement purporting to limit the liability of a railway administration with respect to traffic while on the railway of another administration, a suit for compensation for loss of the life of, or personal injury to a passenger, or for loss, destruction or deterioration of animals or goods where the passenger was or the animals or goods were booked through over the railways of two or more railway administrations, may be brought either against the railway administration from which the passenger obtained his pass or purchased his ticket, or to which the animals or goods were delivered by the consignor thereof, as the case may be, or against the railway administration on whose railway the loss, injury, destruction or deterioration occurred."

[10] Two sets of notices purporting to be under S. 77 were issued in this case. One set was issued on 28-7-1943 and directed to the three Railways concerned, namely, the B. B. & C. I., the E. I. and O. T. Railway Administrations. The second set was issued on 28-12-1943 and was directed to the O. T. Railway Administration alone. It has been held that under S. 77, notice is not necessary in cases relating to pure non-delivery but is required where non delivery is due to loss or destruction: vide Jaisram Ramrekha v. G. I. P. Rly Co, 8 Pat. 545: (A. I. R. (6) 1929 Pat. 109) and Dominion of India v. Hazari Lal, A. I. R. (36) 1949 Pat. 410: (30 P. L. T. 280 F. B.). On behalf of the appellant, it has been argued that the first set of notices was for pure non-delivery, and that the notices were unnecessary. It is pointed out that the claim in these suits is for short delivery which has been attributed in the plaint to tampering, that is, theft thus requiring a notice under S. 77 and for loss due to fall of prices which has been held to be a claim for deterioration within the meaning of S. 77. It is these claims, it is said, that are covered by the second set of notices and, therefore, the suits lay against the O. T. Railway alone.

[11] At first sight, the contention on behalf of the appellant seemed plausible, but, on examining the matter more closely it is found to have no substance. It should be pointed out, first of all, that a notice under S. 77 must be given within six months from the date of the delivery of the goods for carriage by railway. Therefore, the notice that was given in December 1943 was not a notice under S. 77. Coming to the notice given in July 1943, it runs substantially as follows:

"The said consignment has not been delivered to my clients in spite of demands and various correspondence, and great loss has been caused to my clients.

There has been unreasonable delay in delivery of the consignment and the market value of the goods has gone down by 50 per cent. and is still going down.

My clients have been advised to submit that the delay cau ed is unreasonable and they are entitled to all loss due to the depreciation in value of the goods and in case of non-delivery to the purchase price."

This is clearly a notice relating to depreciation due to fall in prices. It is also a notice that sufficiently covers non-delivery due to loss or destruction. At that stage, it was not possible for the plaintiffs to say whether it was a pure case of pure non-delivery or was non-delivery due to loss or destruction. If it is the law that it is not open to the plaintiff to give notice until he is certain on the point, it might become too late for him to give such notice at all, for the knowledge might come to him much more than six months after the goods were delivered for transport. In fact, in Dominion of India v. Hazari Lal, A.I.R. (36) 1949 Pat. 410 : (30 P. L. T. 280 F. B.), it is suggested by Manohar Lall J. that for safety a notice under S. 77 should be given even when the claim relates to pure non-delivery. The notices given in July 1943, therefore, were sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to a decree against all the three Railways concerned.

[12] It is this fact, which was pointed out by me during course of the argument, that suggested the point that has been urged on behalf of the plaintiffs-respoodents. It is stressed on their behalf that the plaints in these suits are directed against "the Governor-General of India in Council, New Delhi, representing the State Railways," and that it is in this form that the defendant is described in the decrees in both the suits. It is argued from this that the decrees must be taken to be decrees against all the three Railways and that since the appeal has been filed by the Governor-General as owner of the O. T. Railway alone, it must be taken that the decrees are final as against the other two Railways. We must not allow ourselves to be misled by the description of the defendant in the plaints and in the decrees. The cases must be looked to as a whole. It is evident from the giving of the second set of notices that the plaintiffs thought a further notice was necessary. This second notice was addressed to the O. T. Railway alone and, the plaints did not mention the particular Railways against which the plaintiffs were proceeding. The Governor-General, apparently under the same impression, appeared in the suits as the owner of the O. T. Railway alone and filed a written statement in this capacity. The suits proceeded on the basis that they related to the O. T. Railway alone. This is shown by the judgment of the Subordinate Judge, which states in express terms that the suits are against the Governor-General in Council as owner of the O. T. Railway. When he decreed these suits, therefore, he decreed them only against the O. T. Railway. The description of the Governor-General in the decrees as representing the States Railways has by itself no meaning. In order to understand the term, it is necessary to go back to the judgment which makes it clear that the decrees are decrees in respect of the O. T. Railway alone.

[13] If I had held that the decrees under appeal are decrees in respect of the B. B. & C. I., and the E. I. Railway also, I would have felt justified in varying the decrees in favour of those two railways in exercise of this Court's powers under O. 41, R. 4, Civil P. C. In this connection, a reference has been made on behalf of the respondents to Chokalingam Chetty v. Seethai Ache, 55 I. A. 7: (A.I.R. (14) 1927 P. C. 252) and Nathuni Ram v. Secy. of State, A I. R. (21) 1934 Pat. 589 : (154 I. C. 171). These are both decisions under O. 41, R. 20, and decide that, where one of the holders of a decree has not been joined as respondent to the appeal and the time limited for appealing has elapsed, he is no longer "interested in the result of the appeal" and cannot be added as a party to the appeal under O. 41, R. 20. The question arose in those decisions when the appellant was seeking to press his appeal against persons who had not been impleaded. The problem does not arise when all that the Court proposes is to exercise its power under O. 41, R. 4, and to pass an order in favour of, and not against a person who is not a party to the appeal.

[14] This brings me back to the first point, namely, the contention of the appellant, as owner of the O. T. Railway, that he is not responsible for the loss due to fall in prices unless it is shown that the O. T. Railway Administration was responsible for the delay. The point is of academic interest in view of my finding that the plaintiffs have failed to establish that they are entitled to any damages on this account. I may merely note briefly that this contention is not open to the appellant in view of an admission made by his Advocate in the Court of the Subordinate Judge that "the defendant is liable for the late delivery" (I am citing from the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge.) The liability of the O. T. Railway Administration depended on certain facts, namely, that the delay occurred while the goods were in the custody of the O. T. Railway Administration. When the appellant's lawyer made this admission, he must be taken to have made an admission of this necessary fact, and the appellant must be treated at this stage as bound by that admission. In the order-sheet of the learned Subordinate Judge dated 10-6-1946, with reference to a petition filed by the plaintiffs for the delivery of certain documents, the Subordinate Judge disallowed the petition, observing :

"In my opinion these documents could have been necessary, provided the defendant company would have asserted that there was no negligence or misconduct on the part of the Railway in dealing with the consignment. In the present suit, I find as is also admitted by the learned Advocate for the defendant that there was late and short delivery of the goods consigned to the plaintiff."

This shows that, even at an earlier stage, this position was taken up by the Advocate for the appellant. Had he contended that under S. 80, the appellant was not liable it might have been open to the plaintiffs to take steps to bring the appellant on the record as representative of the other two Railways also. In these circumstances, it would not be fair at the appellate stage to permit the appellant to disclaim liability on this ground.

[15] In the result, I would allow these appeals to the extent indicated, namely, that the decrees will be set aside so far as they relate to damages for late delivery. The principal amount of the decrees will, therefore, be Rs. 696 in Money Suit No. 11 and Rs. 227 in Money Suit No. 1. The appellant will get his costs in this Court proportional to his success. In accordance with S. 82, Civil P. C., it will further be directed that the decrees in these suits be satisfied within three months from today.

Lal Narain Sinha and K. B. N. Singh — for Appellants ; Ramchander Singh, L. K. Sinha and N. Chatterji — for Respondents.

Ramaswami J.—This appeal is presented against an order of the Subordinate Judge of Gaya refusing to grant an injunction restraining the respondents from proceeding with a reference under the Bihar Bakasht Dispute Settlement Act (XIII [13] of 1947).

[2] Plaintiffs 1 and 2 alleged that they had taken raiyati settlement of bakasht land from defendant 2nd party at a fixed rate of rent; that subsequently they sold the land to plaintiffs 3 to 18 by registered sale deeds. But defendants 1st party made a false claim to the land alleging that they had taken a previous oral settlement from the malik. Apprehending that there would be a breach of the peace, the Sub-divisional Magistrate started proceedings under S. 145 and made an interim order of attachment under S. 145 (4), Criminal P. C. Defendant 1st party then applied to the District Magistrate for making a reference under Bihar Act XIII [13] of 1947. On 5-9-1949, the District Magistrate after hearing the parties referred the dispute to a Board constituted under S. 3 of the Act. The plaintiffs alleged that since there was no dispute between the landlord and tenant the reference made by the District Magistrate was ultra vires and illegal. The plaintiffs, therefore, asked for a declaration to this effect and prayed for a permanent injunction restraining the defendants from proceeding before the Arbitration Board. The principal defendant objected to the issue of temporary injunction on the ground that the plaintiffs had made a fraudulent claim to the land in collusion with the landlord, that the dispute was in substance a dispute between the landlord and tenant with respect to bakasht land, that the reference made by the District Magistrate was legal and valid. The principal defendant maintained that the Board was legally constituted under the Act and the civil Court had no jurisdiction to restrain the Board from proceeding with the case.

[3] In support of this appeal Mr. Lal Narain referred to O. 39, R. 2, Civil P. C., which is to the following effect :

"In any suit for restraining the defendant from committing a breach of contract or other injury of any kind, whether compensation is claimed in the suit or not, the plaintiff may, at any time after the commencement of the suit, and either before or after judgment, apply to the Court for a temporary injunction to restrain the defendant from committing the breach of contract or injury complained of, or any breach of contract or injury of a like kind arising out of the same contract or relating to the same property or right."

[4] Learned counsel argued that the reference made by the District Magistrate under S. 3 of the Act was without jurisdiction and illegal. Learned counsel said that the plaintiff would suffer great injury if the Board should hold that the defendant 1st party were in possession and in consequence the Magistrate should deliver to them possession of the attached land. But the respondents object that the plaintiffs are in collusion with the landlord and that the dispute before the Board really involved a question between the landlord and tenant with respect to possession of bakasht land. I am not satisfied at this stage that the plaintiffs have shown a prima facie case on this disputed question of fact. On the contrary, the lawful exercise of a right vested in a person cannot be legally restrained by the Court under O. 39, R. 2. It cannot be said that by prosecuting the reference before the Board constituted under the Act the respondents are Committing a breach of contract or "other injury of any kind" as enacted in O. 39, R. 2, Civil P. C.

[5] Apart from the provisions of the Code, it is true that the High Court has inherent jurisdiction to restrain a person from prosecuting a case before another tribunal in exceptional cases. But there is authority for the opinion that the jurisdiction should be exercised with great caution and only on ample evidence that the action is vexatious and oppressive. On behalf of the appellant Mr. Lalnarain Sinha contended that the High Court may not order the Board to stay the proceeding but only restrain the respondent from prosecuting it. But as the same result is obtained and the effect is to interfere with proceedings in another jurisdiction this power should be exercised with great caution to avoid even the appearance of undue interference with another Court. The question then arises in what circumstances and upon what principle should the Court act in exercising its jurisdiction to stay another action between the parties and for substantially the same relief. The answer is that the Court will exercise jurisdiction where the circumstances are such as to satisfy it that continued prosecution of both the proceedings should be oppressive or vexatious. In Cohen v. Rothfield, 1919-1 K. B. 410 at p. 416 : (88 L. J. K. B. 468), two parties having cross claims arising out of the same transaction for substantially the same relief one commenced an action in England and the other an action in Scotland. The Court of Appeal held that in such a case the Court will not restrain the plaintiff in either action from proceeding with his action unless it is satisfied that the continued prosecution thereof would be oppressive or vexatious; and that it was incumbent on the party seeking to restrain the other to show that the proceeding he complains of is oppressive or vexatious and that the party instituting it can gain no advantage therefrom. At p. 416, Eve J. states :

"To restrain a man from proceeding with an action which prima facie he has a right to bring and prosecute is, as was pointed out by Fletcher Moulton L. J. in In re Connolly Brothers, (1911) 1 Ch. 731 at p. 746 : (80 L. J. Ch. 403) a very serious thing, but it is not disputed that there is jurisdiction to make the order, the basis of the jurisdiction being that it is a jurisdiction in personam and has nothing to do with any conflict between the tribunals: Bushby v. Munday, (1821) 5 Mad. 297 at p. 307: (21 R. R. 294)."

[6] In Logan v. Bank of Scotland, (1906) 1 K. B. 141: (75 L. J. K. B. 218) Sir Gorell Barnes States the same principle:

"In my opinion, however, the jurisdiction of the Court to stay proceedings on the ground of vexation should be exercised with great care; indeed, I find that Cotton L. J. in McHenry v. Lewis, (1882) 22 Ch. D. 397 at p. 406 : (52 L. J. Ch. 325) of the report, said : 'In the first place, it is a jurisdiction which one ought to exercise with extreme caution. Stopping in the middle of a suit a plaintiff from going on, when he has a right of action as against the defendant, is a jurisdiction which has to be exercised with very considerable caution.' "

[7] It cannot be disputed that the Arbitration Board is vested with judicial powers under the Act and the proceedings before it are of judicial nature. On principle, a tribunal exercises judicial power if it decides a question of legal right in a lis inter partes involving either a finding of fact or the application of fixed rule or principle of law or involved with both. Reference should be made to R. v. Local Government Board for Ireland, (1910) 2 Ir. R. 349 at p. 373 where Palles, C. B states:

"To erect a tribunal into a 'Court' or jurisdiction so as to make its determinations judicial, the essential element is that it should have power, by its determination within jurisdiction, to impose liability or affect rights. By this I mean that the liability is imposed or the right affected by the determination only, and not by the fact determined, and so that the liability will exist, or the right will be affected, although the determination be wrong in law or in fact. It is otherwise of a ministerial power. If the existence of such a power depends upon a contingency, although it may be necessary for the officer to determine whether the contingency has happened, in order to know whether he shall exercise the power, his determination does not bind. The happening of the contingency may be questioned in an action brought to try the legality of the act done under the alleged exercise of the power. But where the determination binds, although it is based on an erroneous view of facts or law, then the power authorizing it is judicial."

[8] In my opinion, the proceedings before the Board constituted under Act XIII [13] of 1947 are of judicial nature and no injunction can be issued to restrain such proceedings since it is not prima facie shown that the continued prosecution of those proceedings would be vexatious or involve injustice to the appellant.

[9] For these reasons I should dismiss this appeal with costs.

Misc. Appeal No. 210 of 1950, D/- 30-8-1950.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 39. R. 2 — Injunction to disturb status quo, if should be granted.

Where in a suit for specific performance of a contract of lease of certain property the plaintiff prayed for an interim injunction restraining the first defendant from executing any lease in favour of the second defendant, who was in possession of the property during the pendency of the suit:

Held that though the Court had power to pass an order for injunction in terms wider than those prayed for resulting in the disturbance of the first defendant's possession, an order for injunction should not be passed in order to disturb the status quo when the plaintiff had no right to immediate possession. [Para 7]

Anno. C. P. C., O. 39, R. 2, N. 2.

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 39, R. 2 — Prima facie case made out — Temporary injunction, if must follow.

The fact that a prima facie case has been made out by showing that there is a fair question for trial, does not necessarily mean that a temporary injunction must follow restraining the contracting defendant from dealing with the property. Whether an order of injunction should or should not issue will depend on the facts of the case, and the Court must also consider the questions of irreparable or serious injury and balance of convenience. [Para 9]

Anno. C. P. C., O. 39, R. 2, N. 2, Pts. 3 to 6.

(c) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 39, R. 2 — Suit for specific performance—Defendant, if can be restrained pending litigation, from using property.

It cannot be the law that in a suit for specific performance the plaintiff is entitled to ask, during the pendency of the litigation, that the defendant in whom the legal title still vests should be restrained from using the property. [Para 10]

Anno. C. P. C., O. 39, R. 2, N. 4, Pt. 8.

Mahabir Prasad, Awadh Behari Saran and Awadh Kishore Pd. — for Appellants; P. R. Das, K. K. Verma, P. N. Gour and Govt. Advocate — for Respondents.

Das J.— This is an appeal from an order of the learned Subordinate Judge of Sasaram, dated 1-6 1950, rejecting a prayer for an ad interim injunction, under the provisions of O. 39, Civil P. C., against the defendants in the action, namely, (1) the State of Bihar and (2) Messrs Dalmia Jain & Company Ltd. The form of the order of injunction which the appellant, plaintiff in the action, asked for was in these terms (I am quoting the prayer portion of the petition for interim injunction):

"It is, therefore, prayed that your honour may be pleased to restrain defendant 1 from executing any lease in favour of defendant 2 during the pendency of the suit."

[2] The facts leading up to the suit and the prayer for interim injunction are these: There is a hill known as Murli Hill (the upper portion being known as upper Murli hill and the lower portion as lower Murli hill) within the sub division of Sasaram in the district of Shahabad. The hill contains lime stone etc. On 1-4-1928, the Secretary of State for India (the then competent authority) granted two leases to the Kutchwar Lime and Stone Company Ltd. (hereinafter to be referred to as Kutchwar) in respect of the two portions of the hill in question for a period of twenty years, for the purpose of quarrying lime stone, and converting the same into lime etc. In 1933, Kutchwar went into voluntary liquidation. On 30-9-1933, Kutchwar through their managing agents and liquidators, purported to transfer the leases to one Mr. Bose, subject to the sanction of the Board of Revenue, but in the meantime appointed Bose as their local agent. The Board of Revenue refused to sanction the proposed transfer of the leases. On 25-1-1934, the Kalyanpur Lime Works Ltd. (hereinafter to be referred to as the appellant) wrote to the Collector of Shahabad and applied for leases in respect of both upper Murli hill and lower Murli hill. On 27-3-1934, the Government of Bihar in the Revenue Department appeared to have sanctioned the proposal to forfeit the two leases held by Kutchwar, and on 31-3-1934, the Board of Revenue approved the proposal to grant leases for quarrying lime stone to the appellant. The relevant letter is printed at p. 17 of the paper book, and shows that the proposal to grant leases in favour of the appellant was approved :

"On the existing terms and conditions as set forth in Chap. V, Bihar and Orissa Waste Lands and Minerals Concession Manual, on the understanding that after the lease is executed the question of royalty will be re-examined by the Board provided it is well understood that any reduction, if made, would be a matter of grace."

It is stated that on 15-4-1934, the appellant got possession, and the appellant started operations on 15-5-1934. On 18-7-1934, the Board of Revenue, by a formal resolution, forfeited the leases in favour of Kutchwar. On 24-9-1934, Kutchwar filed a suit against Government. The suit was dismissed by the Subordinate Judge. There was an appeal to this Court, and on 25-4-1935, this Court issued an injunction restraining Government from granting leases to the appellant. On 7-2-1936, this Court decreed Kutchwar's suit. There was an appeal to the Privy Council which was dismissed on 9-11-1937 (see Secy of State v. Kuchwar Lime and Stone Co. Ltd, 65 I.A. 45 : (A.I.R. (25) 1938 P.C. 20).) In the meantime certain contempt proceedings were instituted by Kutchwar against Government and the appellant, though the appellant was not a party to the suit which Kutchwar had brought in 1934. In the contempt proceedings, this Court held on 9-10-1936, that both Government and the appellant had been guilty of contempt of Court, see Kuchwar Lime & Stone Co. Ltd. v. Secy. of State, 16 Pat. 159 : (A. I. R. (24) 1937 Pat. 65 S. B). The appellant alleged that as a result of this decision in the contempt proceedings, it had to give up possession which it had got in 1934. Against the decision in the contempt proceedings, there was an appeal to the Privy Council. On 31-10-1938, the Privy Council held that there was no contempt, see S. N. Bannerjee v, Kuchwar Lime & Stone Co. Ltd., 17 Pat. 770 : (A.I.R. (25) 1938 P.C. 295). After this decision, the appellant applied for restitution, that is, to be restored to possession. This application for restitution was dismissed by this Court on 11-5-1939. The matter again went to the Privy Council, and the Privy Council affirmed the decision of this Court on 30-7-1941 see S. N. Bannerjee v. Kuchwar Lime & Stone Co. Ltd, 21 Pat 243 : (A.I.R. (28) 1941 P.C. 128). On 31-3-1948, Kutchwar's leases expired. On 10-8-1949, two leases were granted to Messrs. Dalmia Jain & Company Ltd. (hereinafter to be referred to as Dalmias) for a period of one year only. On 21-11-1949 the present suit was instituted by the appellant against the State of Bihar and Dalmias.

[3] It was alleged in the plaint that the period of the leases in favour of Kutchwar having expired on 31-3-1948, the State of Bihar entered into possession. The appellant then asked the State of Bihar to execute leases in its favour and thus perform the agreement which had been entered into between the appellant and Government in 1934. The State of Bihar did not pay any heed to these requests. A notice was then served under S. 80, Civil P. C., and Dalmias were also served with a notice informing them of the existence of the agreement between the appellant and the State of Bihar. The draft leases which had been agreed to and settled between the parties in 1934, were annexed to the plaint. On these allegations, the appellant sued for specific performance of the contract entered into in 1934. Of the various dates mentioned with reference to the cause of action, the important date was 2-6-1949, when the appellant was informed that the State of Bihar was going to execute leases in favour of Dalmias.

[4] The plaint asked for the following reliefs:

"1. A decree for specific performance of contract in terms of the agreement and as claimed hereinbefore with a direction that defendant 1 through his authorised agent do execute the necessary documents for completing the title of the plaintiff for twenty years' lease.

2. Possession of the properties aforesaid be delivered to the plaintiff by evicting the defendants or such of them as may be in possession.

3. Defendant 1 may be restrained by an order of injunction from executing any lease in favour of defendant 2.

4. A decree for compensation to be ascertained in further proceedings.

5. Any other or further relief to which the plaintiff may be entitled."

On 28-4-1950, the appellant applied for a temporary injunction, the terms whereof I have already stated, and on 1-6-1950, the learned Subordinate Judge rejected the application.

[5] The learned Subordinate Judge found in favour of the appellant on the question of a prima facie case, and expressed himself as follows :

"On a perusal of the papers and the judgment of the previous litigations, there can be no manner of doubt that the plaintiff has got a fair question to raise, and if he has got a fair question to raise, then this Court would like to express the view that the plaintiff has got a prima facie case."

On the other two questions of balance of convenience and irreparable injury, the learned Subordinate Judge held against the appellant.

[6] We have been addressed at great length by learned counsel for the parties on the question of a prima facie case, as also on the other questions involved. It is, I think, unnecessary to state again the principles which have to be kept in mind in granting or refusing to grant temporary injunctions under the provisions of O. 39, Civil P. C. These principles have been stated and re-stated in several decisions of this Court vide, Brajendra Nath v. Kashibai, 24

Pat. 656 : (A. I. R. (33) 1946 Pat. 177) and Subodhgopal Bose v. Province of Bihar, A. I. R. (37) 1950 Pat. 222 : (31 P. L. T. 100). On the question of title, we are in agreement with the learned Subordinate Judge, and hold that the appellant has raised a fair question for trial. The two principal points which were urged before us on behalf of the respondents in this connection were : (1) that there was no concluded agreement on behalf of the State of Bihar, and (2) that the suit was barred by time. We have been taken through the pleadings of the parties and the correspondence of 1934 between the appellant and Government. The learned Advocate-General, who appeared for the appellant in this case, drew our attention to Para. 12 of the written statement of the State of Bihar which, according to the learned Advocate-General, amounted to an admission of the case of the appellant. On the question of limitation, Mr. P. R. Das appearing for respondent 2, referred to Art. 113, Limitation Act and relied on the decision in Mani Singh Mandhata v. Nawab of Murshidabad, 46 I. A. 60 : (A. I. R. (5) 1918 P. C. 180). He further contended that the claim for compensation, in any view, was barred under Art. 115, Limitation Act. The learned Advocate-General has, on the contrary, contended that the suit for specific performance which his client has brought, is of the nature contemplated by S. 18, Specific Relief Act, and the period of limitation will run from the date when performance of the contract was refused after the lessor had re-entered possession on the expiry of the leases in favour of Kutchwar. There has been some discussion before us as to what the expression "imperfect title" means in S. 18, Specific Relief Act. Mr. Das has contended that the expression merely means inchoate title, where something remains to be done to complete title, such as confirmation of a court sale, etc. His contention is that a distinction must be drawn between "imperfect title" and "absence of title." He has contended that in 1934 Government had no right or title to grant a lease, because the leases in favour of Kutchwar were still running. Therefore, Mr. P. R. Das has argued that S. 18, Specific Relief Act, has no application; moreover, he contends that the suit as framed was not a suit of the nature contemplated by S. 18, Specific Relief Act. In my view, it is unnecessary to decide these questions at this stage. These are questions which will fall for decision at the trial. It is sufficient to state that in view of the pleadings of the parties and the correspondence which had passed between the appellant and the State of Bihar, there is a prima facie case in the sense that the appellant has raised a fair question for trial. I desist, therefore, from expressing any opinion on the questions mooted before us in this connection.

[7] The more important points, for the decision of this appeal, are what I am going to state presently. It is not disputed that Dalmias were in possession by virtue of the leases which they obtained on 10-8-1949, and that they are still in possession after the expiry of the leases this month. It is also not disputed that if the State of Bihar grants any lease now to Dalmias, during the pendency of the litigation, it would be hit by the doctrine of lis pendens. Dalmias who are a party to the suit, would be bound by any decision given. The appellant has, therefore, the security of lis pendens. It is also reasonably clear that by granting a temporary injunction in the terms in which it has been asked for, the possession of Dalmias, or of the State of Bihar through any of its agents, or of anybody else cannot be disturbed. In the course of arguments we put to the learned Advocate-General the question as to the benefit his client would get or what irreparable injury he would be saved from, if we granted the injunction in the terms asked for. The learned Advocate-General said that no question of disturbing the possession of anybody arose; but the granting of a lease would complicate matters and embarrass his client. He placed very strong reliance on the decision in Promotha Nath v. Jagannath Kishore, 17 C. L. J. 427 : (16 I. C. 359), and contended that, though the appellant might have the security of lis pendens, yet the Court would always grant an injunction to prevent an apprehended breach of contract. He drew our attention to the provisions of R. 2, O. 39, Civil P. C., which states, inter alia, that in any suit for restraining the defendant from committing a breach of contract or other injury of any kind, the plaintiff may, at any time after the commencement of the suit, apply to the Court for a temporary injunction to restrain the defendant from committing the breach of contract. The argument of the learned Advocate-General is: Here is a case where there was an enforceable contract between the appellant and the State of Bihar; the State of Bihar is going to break that contract by granting leases to Dalmias; therefore, the Court must step in and stop the apprehended breach of contract. The learned Advocate-General has placed very strong reliance on the dictum of Turner L. J. in Hadley v. London Bank of Scotland, (1865) 3 De. G. J. & Sm. 63 : (12 L. T. 747), quoted at p. 430 in Promotha Nath v. Jagannath Kishore, 17 C. L. J 427 : (16 I. C. 359). Turner L. J., stated as follows :

"I have always understood the rule of the Court to be that if there is a clear valid contract for sale, the Court will not permit the vendor afterwards to transfer the legal estate to a third person although such third person would be affected by lis pendens."

It was observed by Mookerjee J., that the rule enunciated above was not in consistent with the settled doctrine of the balance of convenience of the parties. To understand this observation of Mookerjee J., it is necessary to state the facts of that case. In that case, a contract was alleged to have been made with the plaintiff by the father of the infant defendant, and subsequent to the death of the father, the contract was affirmed by the mother and guardian of the infant. A suit was instituted to enforce the contract, and seven days later an application was made under R. 2, O. 39, Civil P. C., for an injunction to restrain the defendant from dealing with the property during the pendency of the litigation. An obvious distinction between that case and the case before us at once presents itself. No third party was in possession at the time when the litigation was pending, and the purpose or object of the temporary injunction was to prevent the introduction of such a third party in that case. In the case before us, a third party was already in possession by virtue of a valid lease. That third party continues in possession, rightly or wrongly. There has been some argument before us if Dalmias are merely holding over after the expiry of their leases, or are merely trespassers. I do not think that that question can be decided on the materials before us. But I think that it is sufficient to state that Dalmias are in possession and if we grant the injunction in the terms asked for, the possession of Dalmias or, for the matter of that, of the State of Bihar or of its agents cannot be disturbed. The learned Advocate-General has said that we are not bound by the terms in which the prayer for injunction has been made, and if we are satisfied that an order of injunction should be passed in wider terms, there is nothing to prevent us from passing such an order. We may have the right to pass an order of injunction in terms wider than those asked for; but the question is whether this is a case in which an order of injunction should be passed in order to prevent an irreparable injury. In cases of the kind referred in Promotha Nath v. Jagannath Kishore, 17 C. L. J. 427 : (16 I. C. 359), the main purpose of the order of injunction was to maintain the status quo, in order to avoid embarrassment or complication by the introduction of a third party. But what is the real purpose of the prayer for injunction in the case before us? It is obvious that the real purpose of the prayer for injunction is not to maintain the status quo. but to change the status quo. In the course of his argument, the learned Advocate-General stated that if Dalmias continued in possession after an order of injunction restraining the State of Bihar from granting a lease to Dalmias, Dalmias would be trespassers in the eye of law and might even be guilty of contempt. I do not think that an order of injunction should be granted in order to disturb the status quo. There cannot be any doubt that the appellant has no right to immediate possession, and the appellant's title would accrue after the contract has been specifically performed. In referring to English decisions on the subject, one must bear in mind that the English doctrine of an equitable estate, on a contract for sale, does not apply in India, and the law of India does not recognise such equitable estates.

[8] For the reasons given above, I do not think that the principle laid down in Promotha Nath v. Jagannath Kishore, 17 C. L. J. 427 : (16 I. C. 359) applies in the present case. The other decision on which the learned Advocate-General relied is Subba Naidu v. Haji Badsha Sahib, 26 Mad. 168 : (13 M. L. J. 13). There also the facts were entirely different, and the question considered was the distinction between a permanent injunction granted under the Specific Relief Act and a temporary injunction granted under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[9] Then, there is another aspect of the matter. The stopping of quarrying of lime stone will not only cause loss to respondent 2, but may cause harm to the State. I do not think that the appellant has any right to come to Court and say that the quarrying operations be put an end to during the pendency of the litigation. The circumstance that the appellant has a prima facie case, does not necessarily mean that an order of injunction must follow. This point has been dealt with at great length in Brajendra Nath v. Kashibar, 24 Pat. 656 : (A. I. R. (33) 1946 Pat. 177), a decision to which I was a party. I think that the learned Advocate-General is putting his case too high when he contends that where a prima facie case has been made out by showing that there is a fair question for trial, a temporary injunction must follow restraining the contracting defendant from dealing with the property. Whether an order of injunction should or should not issue will, in my opinion, depend on the facts of the case, and the Court must also consider the questions of irreparable or serious injury and balance of convenience. I do not think that there is any such irreparable or serious injury from which the appellant is required to be saved by an order of injunction in the present case.

[10] We have also been addressed on the question whether the appellant can be sufficiently compensated by money in respect of any loss suffered before specific performance of the contract. The learned Advocate General has drawn our attention to S. 12, Expln. and ss. 54 and 56, Specific Relief Act. He has also drawn our attention to s. 19, Specific Relief Act, which says that any person suing for the performance of a contract may also ask for compensation for its breach, either in addition to or in substitution for such performance. Personally, I do not see any reason why the appellant cannot be compensated by money for any loss he may suffer, provided the appellant is entitled to compensation in addition to specific performance, under the law, as to which I express no opinion at this stage. If, as I have already stated, there is no question of stopping the quarrying operations during the pendency of the suit for specific performance, the question of compensation will remain whether an order of injunction is or is not passed. It cannot surely be urged that in a suit for specific performance the plaintiff is entitled to ask, during the pendency of litigation, that the defendant in whom the legal title still vests should be restrained from using the property If the plaintiff were so entitled, then in a suit for specific performance the defendant would be required to vacate the property which he had contracted to sell or lease. That surely cannot be the law.

[11] In the course of the argument some suggestions were made for expediting the hearing of the suit. It was stated before us that the issues had been settled and as the points at issue depended mainly on documentary evidence, the parties desired to give very little oral evidence. We consider that this is a fit case in which the rights of the parties should be determined as soon as possible. We would, accordingly, direct that the learned Subordinate Judge should intimate to the parties at once that the suit would be taken up for hearing within one week, or as soon thereafter as may be possible, of the re-opening of the civil Courts after the Puja holidays. The learned Subordinate Judge should fix a peremptory date and proceed with the trial as expeditiously as possible. In order to obviate any apprehended difficulties in ascertaining the amount of lime stone extracted from time to time by the party in possession, we direct that the defendant in possession must produce in Court monthly returns of limestone extracted, so that it may be easy to ascertain the profits made in case the appellant succeeds in establishing his legal right to compensation.

[12] Subject to the directions given above, I would dismiss this appeal, and would further direct that each party must bear its own costs of this appeal.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 344, 561A and 439— Stay of criminal proceedings pending civil suit— Prosecution instituted by Government — Considerations.

The discretion to be exercised by the High Court in ordering stay of criminal proceedings pending a civil suit between the same parties and involving the same questions cannot be crystallized into a hard and fast rule, and must, to a large extent, depend on circumstances of each case. One point of importance is whether the criminal complaint has been filed before or after the civil suit. If it is filed afterwards, the intention to prejudice the civil litigation which is only a matter of inference, can be suspected. But it is very difficult to draw any such inference in the case of public prosecution. In the case of prosecution instituted at the instance of the Government it is impossible to accept the argument that there is any intention on the part of the Government to prejudice the trial of the civil suit. [Para 4]

[2] In consequence of an industrial dispute between the management of the Gaya Cotton and Jute Mills Limited and the workers represented by the Gaya Cotton and Jute Mills Labour Union, an industrial tribunal was constituted by the Government for adjudication of the said dispute. The tribunal constituted made an award on 4-9-1948, which was duly published in the Bihar Gazette. By a subsequent Government notification the award was made binding for the period up to 18 6-1949. It was alleged that in spite of the publication in the Gazette the management failed to implement the award. The Assistant Commissioner of Labour, therefore, made a criminal complaint before the District Magistrate of Gaya for prosecuting the applicant, who is the Managing Director of the Company, under S. 29, Industrial Disputes Act. The Government of Bihar had previously authorised the Assistant Commissioner of Labour to file the complaint.

[3] The criminal complaint is dated 27.4-1949, but the District Magistrate of Gaya took cognizance of it on 18-5-1949. On 17th of May the applicant instituted a suit in the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Gaya, alleging that the constitution of the tribunal and the making of the award were illegal and ultra vires and that the tribunal had no jurisdiction to make the award. It was also averred in the complaint that the Governor of Bihar had no jurisdiction to appoint the tribunal.

[4] In support of this rule, Mr. Tarkeshwar Nath argued that the principal issue in both the proceedings was whether the award of the industrial tribunal was valid and intra vires. Learned counsel pointed out that notice under S. 80 was sent on 8-3-1949, which date is prior to the institution of the criminal complaint by the Assistant Commissioner of Labour at the instance of the Government of the State. Learned counsel referred to Mt. Phuleshra Kuer v. Emperor, 1 P.L.T. 697: (A I.R. (7) 1920 Pat. 816 : 22 Cr.L.J. 489) and Banambar Chhotra v. Nata Behera, 6 P. L. T. 348 : (A. I. R. (12) 1925 Pat. 193 : 26 Cr. L. J. 286) in support of his argument that the criminal proceedings should be stayed pending the decision of the civil suit. On behalf of the State Government, Mr. Shambhu Prasad Singh referred to Hirday Narain Singh v. Emperor, A.I.R. (16) 1929 Pat. 500 : (30 Cr. L. J. 1101), Bhagirath Bhagat v. Ram Narain, A. I. R. (17) 1930 Pat. 194 : (30 Cr. L. J. 1144) and Bhagwat Prasad v. Ram Kishun Ram Sonar, A. I. R. (17) 1930 Pat. 351 : (31 Cr. L. J. 766) for the proposition that it is undesirable for the High Court to interfere with the pending criminal proceedings unless in an exceptional circumstance. In my opinion, the discretion to be exercised by the High Court in ordering stay of criminal proceedings cannot be crystallized into a hard and fast rule, and must, to a large extent, depend on circumstances of each case. One point of importance is whether the criminal complaint has been filed before or after the civil suit. If it is filed afterwards, the intention to prejudice the civil litigation which is only a matter of inference, can be suspected. But it is very difficult to draw any such inference in the case of public prosecution. In Jehangir Pestonji v. Framji Rustomji Wadia, 30 Bom. L. R. 962 : (29 Cr. L. J. 1053), Mirza J. points out the distinction between public and private prosecution. At p. 965 the learned Judge states that the "test seems to be whether the prosecution is public or private. Where it is public, the Court, as a rule, in the exercise of its inherent jurisdiction, would not stay criminal proceedings. Where it is private, as in the present case, there would not be the same reluctance on the part of the Court to interfere with criminal proceedings."

In the present case, it is apparent that the prosecution was instituted at the instance of the Government, and it is impossible to accept the argument that there is any intention on the part of the Government to prejudice the trial of the civil suit. There is another circumstance also to be considered. In the present case the trial Court has refused to exercise discretion in favour of the applicant who has moved for stay of the criminal proceedings. In criminal revision the High Court cannot interfere with the order, since, on the material, it is not possible to hold that the learned Sessions Judge has, in exercise of his jurisdiction, acted in a manner which is unjudicial. As Jackson J. observed in C. Ramiah v. N. Ramiah, 50 Mad. 830 : (A. I. R. (14) 1927 Mad. 778 : 28 Cr. L. J. 812), there is no invariable rule as against staying of criminal proceedings pending issue of the civil suit:

"Each case must be considered on its own merits and the only general rule that can be adumbrated is that every Court should be left as far as possible to dispose of the cases on its file with the utmost expedition. This rule is in the interest of not only of public administration but also of private persons involved in criminal proceedings; for no one wishes to have a criminal charge kept hanging indefinitely over his head. If authority were required for the above proposition, there is the Patna ruling: 'It is the policy of the law to go on immediately with the enquiry.' Ram Saran Singh v. Nikhind Narain Singh, A. I. R. (12) 1925 Pat. 619 : (26 Cr. L. J. 1179), which is founded on Sheikh Bahatar v. Nobadali, A. I. R. (11) 1924 Cal. 634 : (26 Cr. L. J. 65). Another Patna ruling on which the petitioner relies Mt. Phuleshra Kuer v. Emperor, 62 I. C. 185 : (A. I. R. (7) 1920 Pat. 816 : 22 Cr. L. J. 489) proceeds on the assumption that there may be manifest and irreparable injuries done in the criminal Court, but, with all respect, I do not think that such an assumption can properly be made when the integrity of the Court is not impugned. It must be assumed that in either Court justice will be done and which Court precedes the other is merely a question of convenience."

[5] Upon the facts of the present case, I am unable to hold that exceptional ground has been made for the stay of the criminal proceeding. For these reasons this rule must be discharged. The application is accordingly dismissed.

Misc. Judicial Case No. 139 of 1950, D/- 8-9-1950.

(a) Contempt of Courts Act (1926), S. 1—Contempt of Court, what amounts to.

Where a consent order, passed in an application by one party for the issue of a writ of mandamus restraining the other from taking possession from the former except in due course of law, provided that the latter will take possession only after the purchase to which the latter claimed to be entitled had been legally completed, and vacated the interim order of injunction:

Held that taking of possession by the latter before the purchase was legally completed did not amount to contempt of Court as in the consent order there was an undertaking given by the latter to the former but there was no undertaking given to the Court. [Para 12]

Anno. Contempt of Courts Act, S. 1, N. 3.

(b) Constitution of India, Art. 226—Writ of mandamus when can be issued.

A party who has entered into an agreement with another party and is illegally dispossessed by the other in breach of the agreement cannot ask the High Court for a writ of mandamus as the aggrieved party can get an effectual and adequate remedy by an ordinary action in the civil Court. [Para 26]

(c) Constitution of India, Art. 226—Writ of mandamus—Nature of.

The grant of a writ of mandamus is, as a general rule, a matter for the discretion of the Court and is not a writ of right. [Para 26]

Sir Sultan Ahmad, P. R. Das, A. S. Ismailee, S. M. Siddique and Balbhadra Prasad Singh — for Petitioner; K. K. Varma, Hari Kishore Thakur, K. Deyal, T. Nath and Advocate-General — for Opposite Party.

Reuben J. — On the petition of the Light Railway Company filed on 28-6-1950, a rule has been issued on the opposite party to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue against them restraining them from interfering with the possession of the Company over the properties and management of the Bihar Bukhtiarpur Light Railway. There is also a rule against the District Board of Patna (opposite party 3), Mr. Khaderan Singh, Chairman of the District Board (opposite party 4), and Mr. H. Subberwal, ex-Head Accounts Officer of the Light Railway Company (opposite party 5) to show cause why they should not be committed for contempt of Court. At the same time, an ad interim injunction was issued restraining the opposite party from interfering with the possession of the Light Railway Company. It being asserted on behalf of the District Board that dispossession had already taken place before the issue of the injunction, a further rule has been issued on the District Board of Patna and Mr. Khaderan Singh, on a petition filed by the Light Railway Company on 19-7-1950, to show cause why a mandatory injunction shall not issue against them directing them to restore possession of the Light Railway to the petitioning Company.

[2] The Light Railway was established about the year 1901 under the provisions of the Bengal Tramways Act, 1883 (Bengal Act III [3] of 1883). By Notifn. No. 100R dated 25-6-1901 under S. 5 of that Act, the Local Government of Bengal sanctioned its construction between Bukhtiarpur and Bihar Sharif, subject to an agreement between Messrs. Martin & Co., the promoters of the Bukhtiarpur-Bihar Light Railway Co. Ltd., on the one side and the District Board of Patna on the other which was entered on 21-8-1899. Subsequently, there was an extension of the Light Railway to Rajgir. The agreement of August 1899 is set out in a schedule to the Government Order and I reproduce below the relevant provisions of it:

"(1) The Board will grant to the Company in perpetuity subject to cl. 5 of the free use of so much of the side portion of the said road as is necessary but not exceeding a width of 8' on one side for the purpose of laying thereon and using a steam Tarmway of 2' 6" gauge to be worked by the Company. The Board will also grant to the Company in perpetuity subject as aforesaid full right and liberty to lay the said Tramway across the said road wherever necessary and to use the same wherever laid across the said road.

(2) The Board will promote the acquisition by the Company under the provisions of Act I [1] of 1894 of such additional land outside the boundary of the said road as may be necessary for the purpose of the said Tramway.

(5) In the event of the Board exercising the right of purchase conferred upon them by S. 41 of Act III [3] (B. C.) of 1883 the value to be placed upon the Tramway as a going concern shall be calculated at twenty years purchase of the average net annual profits to the Company during the four years preceding the transaction together with a bonus of twenty per cent., on the amount so arrived at over and above that amount. In case of dispute the matter will be determined by arbitration under the clause in that behalf hereinafter contained.

(12) If any doubt or difference shall arise between the Board and the Promoters or the Board and the Company concerning anything herein contained or any matter in any way connected therewith or with these presents or the construction thereof or the rights, duties and liabilities of any person or persons in connection with these presents or as to the incidence of expense as between the Board and the Company under any of the clauses of this agreement then and in every such case the matter in doubt or difference shall be referred to two arbitrators one to be appointed by each party or to the umpire of such arbitrators in case they differ in opinion but if either of the parties shall refuse or neglect to appoint for one month after notice in writing from the other of an arbitrator being or having been appointed then the arbitrator so appointed may make a final decision alone which shall have the same force and effect as the award of two arbitrators or the umpire duly appointed."

This agreement was confirmed by the Light Railway Company after it was incorporated.

[3] Under S. 41, Bengal Tramways Act, the District Board is entitled on six months' notice in writing to purchase the undertaking upon the expiration of twenty one years from the date of the order under S. 5 of the Act, and, thereafter, the Board has a renewed right of purchase on similar notice at the expiry of every period of seven years after the expiry of the initial period of twenty one years. The last seven-year period expired in June 1950. On 16-12-1949, in pursuance of a resolution of the District Board of the same date, Mr. Syed Hassan, Advocate on behalf of the District Board, gave notice to the Light Railway Company of the decision of the District Board to exercise its right of purchase with effect from 25-6-1950 on the expiry of the current period of seven years, and called on the Light Railway Company to settle the transfer value by mutual agreement. The legal validity of this notice is not admitted by the Light Railway Company, but it is agreed that, for the purposes of this case, the notice may be treated as legally valid. There followed a correspondence between the Company and Mr. Syed Hassan, the details of which it is unnecessary to set out at length. A difference arose between the Company and the District Board as to the interpretation of cl. 5 of the agreement of August 1899. According to the Company, in addition to the amount calculated under cl. (5), the purchase price must include the present market value of the assets, such as plant, buildings, rolling stock, land, etc., whereas, according to the District Board, that amount is an inclusive price for the Railway as a going concern. The Company also questioned the validity of the notice under S. 5. Finally, on 29-3-1950, the District Board gave a notice to the Company, appointing Mr. Baldeva Sahay, Advocate, as its arbitrator, and calling upon the Company to appoint its arbitrator within one month, failing which in accordance with the agreement of August 1899, Mr. Baldeva Sahay would proceed as the sole arbitrator and give "a final and conclusive award". Thereupon, the Railway Company appointed Mr. Abdul Manan, a pleader of Purnea, as its arbitrator, but limited his authority to the point as to whether the notice under S. 5 was legally valid. Upon protest by the District Board on this limitation, Mr. Manan retired from the arbitration and subsequently Mr. Nizamuddin Khan, Advocate, was appointed by the Company "under protest" with authority to consider the question of valuation. The arbitrators, however, were unable to come to a definite decision for want of the audited accounts of the preceding four years.

[4] In the meantime, an agitation had started against the management of the Light Railway Company, and a body styling itself the Bihar-Bukhtiarpur Light Railway Passengers' Association began to voice publicly the alleged grievances of persons travelling on the said Railway and to urge on the District Board the desirability of taking under itself the management of the Light Railway. On account of an assertion said to have been made by Mr. Khaderan Singh at a meeting of the Association at Bihar Sharif on 13-5-1950 that he was preparing to take over the management of the Light Railway on the 25th June whether the Company was willing or not to hand over control, the Company instituted Misc. Jud. Case No. 120 of 1950 in this Court asking among other reliefs for a writ of mandamus restraining the District Board from taking possession of the Light Railway "except in due course of law" Mr. Khaderan Singh and Mr. Subberwal were also impleaded. A rule was issued and an ad interim injunction was granted on 17-5 1950. The case came before Das J., and me and was disposed of on 23-6 1950 by a consent order which I reproduce below :

"This application is disposed of on the following consent order agreed to by the parties.

Subject and without prejudice to whatever right the parties may have in respect of the matters in dispute;

(1) It is agreed to by the parties that the petitioner will submit for inspection such accounts as the arbitrators appointed by the parties may call for; if the accounts so called for be not in the present possession of the petitioner but be in the possession of the auditors, the petitioner will write to the auditors to give every facility to the arbitrators to examine the accounts. It is admitted by the learned Advocate General on behalf of the opposite parties that the audited accounts of the three years beginning from April 1946 have already been submitted to the arbitrators.

(2) The District Board will take possession of the undertaking, viz., the Bihar Bukhtiarpur Light Railway (including the Rajgir extension) only after the purchase to which the District Board claims to be entitled, has been legally completed.

(3) On the submission of the accounts by the petitioner to the arbitrators appointed by the parties, no question arises of inspection of the accounts by any other person or authority; and

(4) There will be no order for costs of the hearing of this petition.

The interim order of injunction is vacated."

It is alleged that, in violation of this order, Mr. Khaderan Singh, representing the District Board of Patna, helped by the other members of the opposite party, has proceeded to take possession of the Light Railway, although the purchase has not been legally completed. At the hearing, it was admitted that the District Board is now in possession of the Light Railway with the exception of the Head Offices at Calcutta and Patna. According to the Light Railway Company, the taking of possession commenced from the midnight of 24/25th June, and has been completed, since the passing of this Court's order on 28th June. According to the opposite party, the taking of possession was peacefully effected at midnight of 24/25th June.

[5] It may be mentioned that, before the District Board proceeded to take possession of the property, it made a deposit on 24th June of Rs. 10,00,623 to the credit of the Bukhtiarpur-Bihar Light Railway Co., Ltd. in the Imperial Bank of India, Patna, as the tentative price of the undertaking on the basis of a valuation made by Messrs. B. K. Sinha & Co., Chartered Accountants and Auditors, Patna. The valuation was obtained by the District Board in accordance with a resolution recorded by the Board of Directors of the Light Railway Company on 11.6.1950 :

"That the only correct approach to the subject would be for the District Board to assess and determine, if necessary by help of experts, the price payable to the Company, and as soon as the figure of amount of price is arrived at, let the District Board deposit the money in the Imperial Bank of India, and call upon the Company to accept the same, and then the Board of Directors shall immediately ascertain the views of the share-holders and shall expedite the transaction."

This action was taken by the District Board "subject to such adjustment as may be necessary according to the award of the arbitrators."

The deposit of this amount is of no importance in the present proceeding, as the District Board does not rely upon it as contributing towards transfer of title.

[6] The rule which was issued on 28th June was obtained on the basis that the petitioner Company was still in possession and that there was merely a disturbance of its possession As it is now admitted that dispossession is complete, the rule relating to the issue of a writ to restrain the opposite party from disturbing possession is frustrated and must be discharged. The only points which arise for consideration, therefore, are ; (1) whether opposite parties 3 to 5 have committed a contempt of Court, (2) if so, what action is called for, and (3) whether, in the circumstances of the case, a mandamus should issue against opposite parties 3 and 4 directing them to restore possession to the petitioner Company. As regards the first point, the argument on behalf of the Light Railway Company is as follows. The consent order of 23rd June contemplated that the District Board will not take possession until the purchase is legally complete. One essential to the completion of the purchase is the ascertainment and payment of the purchase price, and the price, since there has been a difference between the parties, can be determined only by the arbitrators as provided in the agreement of August 1899; the arbitrators appointed have not yet fixed the price, and, consequent upon a difference between the arbitrators, steps are now being taken to appoint an umpire. Secondly, the purchase involves a transfer of tangible immovable property valued at more than Rs. 100 and, therefore, a registered deed of transfer is required for the completion of the purchase. These two requisites being absent, the purchase is still incomplete and the consent order has been contravened. On the other side, there is a four-fold contention, 1stly, that there was no order of this Court or undertaking given to it which could form the subject-matter of proceedings for contempt, 2ndly, that in law the title legally passed to the District Board on the expiry of the 24th June and the District Board had the right peacefully to take possession in accordance with the consent order of 23rd June, 3rdly that the District Board and the Light Railway Company, under the agreement of 1899, were in the position of "partners", using this term in a non-technical sense, and, after the expiry of the relevant date, the District Board became the sole owner, entitled to possession and control, and the Light Railway Company was merely entitled to the price of its share of the undertaking, and, 4thly, that Mr. Khaderan Singh acted bona fide on legal advice in the belief that title had passed to the District Board.

[6] It is unnecessary for me in the present proceeding to set out and examine the elaborate grounds on which the second and third contentions of the opposite party are based, because I think that the opposite party are entitled to succeed on their first contention.

[7] Contempt of Court may be committed by disobedience of an order of a Court or by breach of an undertaking given to a Court. The disobedience or breach may be unintentional resulting in a contempt in theory only, which is not punishable by committal but may render the respondent liable to pay the costs of the application, or the disobedience or breach may involve misconduct resulting in a contempt which partakes to some extent of a criminal nature (Halsbury's Laws of England, Edn. 2, vol. 7, p. 24). The first contention on behalf of the opposite party is based on the form in which the consent order of this Court was passed. It is pointed out that all that the consent order does is to recite the agreement arrived at between the parties and to vacate the ad interim injunction which had been issued by the Court, that, in other words, the rule issued by the Court was discharged. This means, it is argued, that the Court refrained from passing any order, and that the agreement recorded by the Court is at most a contract between the parties enforceable by appropriate action in the civil Court. The first portion of this contention has not been seriously contested. As the consent order stands, there is no direction given by this Court except that the interim order of injunction is vacated and the application is disposed of on consent. It has been very strenuously argued, however, that the agreement of the District Board contained in Cl. (2) of the consent order that it will take possession only after the purchase has been legally completed is an undertaking given to the Court. Wolverhampton and Walsal Rly. Co. v. L. & N. W. Rly. Co., (1874) 16 Eq. 433 : (43 L. J. Ch. 131) and Lord Strathcona Steamship Co. Ltd. v. Dominion Coal Co. Ltd., (1926) A. C. 108 : (95 L. J. P. C. 71) have been cited as authorities for implying the negative stipulation from the positive terms used, but this was hardly necessary;

it was well understood at the time the consent order was passed that this was the meaning of the term agreed to by the District Board and the correctness of this interpretation was not challenged during the hearing of this petition—all that was challenged was the assertion that this term constituted an undertaking given to the Court.

[8] In Kusadhaj Bhakta v. Brojo Mohan, 19 C. W. N. 1228 : (A. I. R. (3) 1916 Cal. 816), Jenkins C. J. (Holmwood J. agreeing) observed with reference to a consent decree :

"It is well settled that a contract of the parties is none the less a contract because, there is superadded to it the command of a Judge. It is still a contract of the parties, and as the contract is capable of being rectified for an appropriate mistake so, as the necessary consequence, is the decree which is merely a more formal expression given to that contract."

Their Lordships were dealing with the question of the maintainability of a suit to set aside a consent decree in a previous suit on the ground of mistake. It should be noted that their Lordships do not describe the agreement as a contract pure and simple, but as a contract with the command of a Judge superadded. The point is elaborated somewhat more in Sabitri Thakurain v. Mrs. F. A. Savi, 14 P. L. T. Sup. 1 at pp. 211 to 212 : (A. I. R. (20) 1933 Pat. 306) where their Lordships observed that, as soon as a petition of compromise is adopted as a part of a decree, it passes from the domain of mere contracts into that of decrees, and a promise by a party to pay is converted into an order of the Court to that party to pay; this is so even though, according to the accepted practice, a formal decree is not drawn up specifying the orders of the Court but the decree drawn up merely says that the suit is decreed or dismissed, as the case may be, in the terms of the compromise, and the petition of compromise is attached to the decree as an annexure. Their Lordships pointed out that the consent decree has this effect because of O. 23, R, 3, Civil P. C., which provides that, after recording the compromise, the Court shall pass a decree in accordance therewith so far as it relates to the suit. The effect is that the agreement between the parties, so far as it relates to the suit, becomes the order of the Court and, to that exent, may be enforced by execution. So far as the present order is concerned, however, there is no provision corresponding to O. 23, R. 3, and there is no reason why the consent order under consideration should be held not to be governed by the following observation at p. 124 of Seton on Judgments and Orders, Edn. 7, Vol. I :

"A compromise ought not to be introduced into the body of the order, but either identified or scheduled. It is, however, common practice to insert undertakings in the body of the order, and in the event of a breach, the undertaking may be enforced by writ of attachment, whereas if it formed part of the agreement set forth in the schedule, proceedings in the nature of specific performance might be necessary."

The learned author distinguishes between orders in which the compromise is introduced into the body of the order and those in which it is kept separate from the order of the Court. The order before us appears at first sight to fall in the first class, but really it belongs to the second class of consent orders. I say this because, though it embodies the agreement between the parties, that agreement is kept distinct from the directions of the Court, as it would be if it were set out in a schedule.

[9] A case on a par with the case before us is reported in Dashwood v. Dashwood, 1927 W. N. 276. By a consent order made in a partnership action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants further proceedings were stayed "except so far as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying this order and the terms agreed between the parties and set out in the schedule hereto into effect."

The defendants subsequently moved for committal of (contempt) or the issue of a writ of attachment against the plaintiff on the ground that he had carried on the business of an undertaker within a radius of three miles from the Guildhall, Portsmouth, contrary to a covenant contained in the scheduled terms. Tomlin J. held that the terms in the schedule were not an order of the Court enforceable by proceedings for contempt and that the proper course was to apply for specific performance or an injunction, and then to base proceedings for contempt on a subsequent breach, if any.

[10] This decision was distinguished by Panckridge J. in Hari Charan Dey v. Ranjit Kumar, 42 C. W. N 203, a case relied on for the Light Railway Company. His Lordship was concerned with a consent decree in a money suit. The terms of the compromise between the parties were given in a schedule annexed to the decree. Clause (4) of those terms is relevant and runs thus:

"The defendants undertake not to dispose of their properties until the decree is fully satisfied."

This term was obviously not enforceable by execution. Panckridge J., held the term to be an undertaking given to the Court and found the defendant to be guilty of contempt by transferring property in contravention of it. The grounds on which his Lordship distinguished Dashwood v. Dashwood, (1927 W. N. 276), support what I have said above. He observes:

"In Dashwood v. Dashwood, (1927 W. N. 276) the action was merely stayed and the schedule and terms of settlement were annexed to the stay order. In the present case the suit has been concluded by the decree of the Court which declares that the terms of settlement ought to be carried out and the same are ordered and decreed accordingly. Thus, there is an order of the Court embodied in the decree directing the parties to carry out the terms, one of which is an undertaking by the defendants not to dispose of their properties until the decree is fully satisfied. But even if the order of the Court were not so clear, the case would still in my opinion not fall on the same side of the line as Dashwood v. Dashwood, (1927 W. N. 276), which Tomlin J. expressly distinguishes from a case where there is in the body of the order either an express direction or an undertaking. Here there are in my view both an express direction and undertaking, so whichever test one applies, the distinction between the present case and Dashwood v. Dashwood, (1927 W. N. 276), is obvious."

The distinction drawn is that, in the decree with which his Lordship was concerned, there was an express direction for carrying out the terms of the agreement, and the terms of the agreement were thus embodied in the decree. This condition is not present in the case before us. The correctness of the decision of Panckridge J., was doubted by a Division Bench of the same Court in Nisha Kanto v. Saroj Bashini, A. I. R. (35) 1948 Cal. 294: (49 Cr. L. J. 567). That case was concerned with an undertaking given by the defendant in a compromise in a suit for ejectment, which compromise was made a rule of the Court. The defendant thereby undertook to remove a Kali image, as also all permanent brick-built and other structures in and around the place where the image stood, before he gave up possession of the said property, or at any time prior thereto on demand by the plaintiff or the owner for the time being of the said property. Subsequently, he was called on by the plaintiff to remove the image of Kali, but declined to do so. Gentle J., held that he had committed contempt by a breach of an undertaking given to the Court, and directed that he be detained in prison for a period of one month. This order was set aside in a Letters Patent appeal. The Letters Patent Bench held that the undertaking was one between the parties and not an undertaking given to the Court. The Letters Patent Bench observed that a compromise is nothing more than an agreement between the parties with the command of the Court superadded, it has really no greater sanctity than the agreement itself and certainly cannot mean anything more than the agreement itself. Referring to the decision in Hari Charan v. Ranjit Kumar, 42 C. W. N. 203, their Lordships pointed out that Panckridge J., had given no reason for holding that there was an undertaking given to the Court except that the word "undertake" was used. Harries C. J., who delivered the leading judgment, observed:

"But as I have stated the mere user of the word 'undertake' does not mean a promise to a Court. It merely means a solemn promise to some one and where the word appears in an agreement between A and B, it appears to me that if A undertakes, he obviously undertakes to B, and not to a Court."

He went on and added that each case must be decided on its particular facts. His Lordship the Chief Justice concluded by saying that, if it was a practice as was urged on behalf of the respondent that practitioners on the original side of the Court did not make it clear that an undertaking in a compromise was an undertaking to the Court, this practice must cease, and, in future, the fact should be made clear. It has been urged before us that the decision of the Letters Patent Bench was incorrect, and reference has been made to several forms in Seton on Judgments and Orders, Edn. 7 (Vol. 1, p. 47 form 2, p. 450 form 3, p. 796, form 5, (Vol. II, p. 1179 form 12 and Vol. III, p. 2322 form 4) showing the embodying in orders of the Court of undertakings given to the Court without expressly stating that those undertakings were given to the Court. A perusal of all the forms cited, however, shows that from the context it is clear that the undertakings incorporated in these forms are undertakings to the Court. Selecting one at random, I reproduce the form at p. 1179 of Vol. II:

"12. Undertaking to appoint Co-Trustee by Beneficiaries when appointed Trustees.

And the applicants, by their counsel, undertaking to take steps immediately for the appointment of a co-trustee in the case of the decease of either of them, appoint A.B. and C.D. new trustees of etc. Re Lightbody. Kay, J., 19-12-1884, B. 1634; S. C., 52 L.T. 40."

This form is clearly intended to be an order of the Court. It is not an agreement between the parties. The undertaking referred to, therefore cannot be merely an undertaking between the parties, but must be one given to the Court. This is exactly what Harries C. J. says in the passage which I have cited above. Turning to the order with which we are concerned, we find first of all, that there is no such word as undertaking, a word which, according to Harries C. J., implies a solemn undertaking. It is not necessary to consider whether this makes any difference, for, applying the further test suggested by his Lordship, the term in question occurs in what is set out as the agreement between the parties. It must, therefore, be taken as a term between the parties and not as an undertaking given to the Court. I am confirmed in this view by the principle that, so long as an order of the Court exists, it must be obeyed and obeyed to the letter, and anyone who does not obey it to the letter is guilty of committing a wilful breach of it: Spokes v. Banbury Board of Health, (1866) 1 E. Q. 42: (14 W. R. 128). If the person bound by an order is to comply with that order to the letter, the Court itself must be very strict in interpreting that order and not put upon that order an interpretation which is open to any doubt or difference of opinion.

[11] It has been urged that this interpretation would make the entire proceedings of the 23rd June meaningless, that it was contemplated both by the Court and the parties that the District Board should not take possession till the compulsory purchase was legally complete and that, if it is open to the District Board to take possession contrary to this agreement without incurring a liability for contempt of Court, the Court is set at naught, and the directions of the Court are treated as unworthy of notice. It is urged, further, that the circumstances clearly show that, at the time when he entered into this agreement, Mr. Khaderansing intended to enter into possession on the expiry of the 24th June, and his entering into the agreement was merely a dodge by which he induced this Court to refrain from exercising its powers and issuing an injunction against the District Board. This, it is said, is a clear overreaching of the Court. The flouting of the Court in this manner, it is contended, constitutes a contempt. In support a reference has been made to Seaware v. Paterson, (1897) 1 Ch. 545: (66 L. J. Ch. 267). The respondents in that case were found guilty of contempt in respect of an injunction issued by the Court, Paterson who was a party to the previous proceedings by disobedience of the Court's order, and Murray who was not a party to the previous proceedings by aiding and abetting Paterson in committing a breach of that order. The important point is that in that case there was an order of the Court on which the proceedings in contempt could be based. In the case before us, there is no such order or undertaking.

[12] The present case is somewhat similar to that reported in Narayan Sahu v. Thakurji Ramji, 106 I. C. 194: (A. I. R. (15) 1928 Pat. 49), which arose out of a first appeal in this Court against a decree for the redemption of a usufructuary mortgage. The appellant applied for stay of delivery of possession. When the matter came up for hearing before the Registrar on 6.6.1927, the respondent decree-holder represented that the application was premature as no steps had yet been taken for delivery of possession. The argument prevailed and the Registrar rejected the application for stay. The decree-holder thereupon went to the execution Court on the 10th June, put in an application for delivery of possession, and succeeded in obtaining delivery of possession on the 13th June, before the appellant realised what was happening. Their Lordships held that there had been an overreaching of the Court and the delivery of possession could not be allowed to stand. This decision was followed in Lahore Electric Supply Co., Ltd., Lahore v. Province of Punjab, I. L. R (1949) 24 Lah. 617: (A. I. R. (30) 1943 Lah. 41 F. B.). That decision relates to a suit instituted by the Lahore Eletric Supply Co., Ltd., against the Punjab Government for a declaration that it was entitled to carry on the Lahore electric supply undertaking as licensee for another twenty years, attacking among other things the validity of a notice given by the Punjab Government to the plaintiff Company of its intention to exercise the option to purchase the licensee's undertaking given to the Punjab Government under the Electricity Act 1910 (Act IX [9] of 1910). The plaintiff Company applied for a temporary injunction to maintain the status quo. The Punjab Government during the pendency of this matter succeeded in taking over the undertaking. This was done before the service of an order of injunction. The Full Bench held it to be a case of over-reaching the Court and, following the decision in Narayan Sahu v. Thakurji Ramji, 106 I. C. 194 : (A. I. R. (15) 1928 Pat. 49) issued a mandatory injunction on the Punjab Government to restore possession to the plaintiff Company. Similar cases are reported in Daniel v. Ferguson, (1891) 2 Ch. 27 : (39 W. R. 599) and Von Joel v. Hornsey, (1895) 2 Ch. 774 : (65 L. J. Ch. 102). In these last three cases, their Lordships, while granting a mandatory injunction, refrained from expressing any opinion as to the merits of the subject-matter of the controversy. It is to be noticed that in none of these cases was there any suggestion that a contempt of Court had been committed. The mere fact, therefore, that there had been an overreaching of the Court will not render the guilty party liable to proceedings for contempt. The effect will not be to make proceedings before the Court meaningless for, as it appears from the decisions to which I have just referred, it will be open to the Court in an appropriate proceeding to give the aggrieved party relief against the misdeed of the opposite party. Having come to the conclusion that there was no undertaking given to the Court, it follows that no contempt of Court has been committed by the action which is complained of. It is, therefore, not necessary to consider the second point formulated at p. 6 above

[13] Coming to the third point, namely, whether a mandamus should issue against opposite parties 3 and 4 directing them to restore possession to the petitioner company, I must premise to begin with that the dispute between the District Board and the Light Railway Company is essentially a private dispute of a civil nature, whether the District Board has complied with S. 41, Bengal Tramways Act, 1883, and is entitled to "purchase" the undertaking and, if so, what should be the price to be paid by the District Board. This is a matter to be settled between the parties themselves by negotiation or by arbitration as provided in the agreement of 1899, or, in the last resort in the ordinary civil Courts. The Light Railway Company seeks the help of this Court in the exercise of its extraordinary powers under Art. 226, Constitution of India, on the ground that the District Board in "gross contempt" of the order of this Court

"forcibly started turning out officers of your petitioner and disturbing your petitioner's possession on the midnight of the 24th June last," and was guilty of a "gross fraud" on this Court by agreeing to the consent order while intending, nevertheless, to take possession of the undertaking on the expiry of the 24th June. In the petition asking for this relief, the petitioner Company included by reference to allegation contained in its petition in Misc. Jud. Case No. 120 of 1950. There were two things complained of in that petition, firstly, that the State Government had illegally, or, alternatively, arbitrarily and unreasonably, appointed Mr. H. Subberwal, a dismissed employee of the Light Railway Company, to inspect its accounts, and, secondly that with the help of the State of Bihar and its officers, the District Board was threatening forcibly to dispossess the Light Railway Company and take over the management of the Railway itself A mention was made of a raid "by the police along with the abovementioned Subberwal", in which the offices and godown of the Light Railway Company in Fraser Road, Patna, were entered into and again, on the next day it was said with the help of the police, some papers of the Railway were seized and some accounts examined. It was expressly stated that there was

"a conspiracy between the State of Bihar, the District Board of Patna and the said Mr. H. Subberwal to take forcible possession" of the property of the petitioner. Stress was throughout laid on the threatened use of force and the fact that, in its threatened action, the District Board had the backing and support of the State Government and the District Officials. We are not concerned here with the first ground; as a result of the consent order, the question of Mr. Subberwal inspecting the accounts did not arise, apart from an incident which has been separately dealt with by us in a proceeding for contempt of Court against Mr. Subberwal (Original Cri. Misc. No. 5 of 1950). The other aspect of the matter was stressed before us and it was urged that the dispossession of the Light Railway Company was effected by force and with the help of the State and its Executive Officers in the District. This is a serious charge and calls for some expression of our opinion on the facts so far as this is possible on the evidence before us. After discussing evidence, his Lordship concluded on the evidence before us. I am not prepared to say that possession was taken by force and that in effecting such possession the District Board was helped by the officers of the State.

[14] The conclusion is irresistible that in the present case the Light Railway Company has asked for the interference by this Court in the exercise of its powers under Art. 226 on a statement of facts which is incorrect in two important particulars, firstly that the possession of the Light Railway Company was merely disturbed, and, secondly, that force was being used and that the State Officials were helping the District Board in taking possession. It was this misrepresentation of facts that, on the 28th of June, led me to issue an ad interim injunction which is utterly inappropriate to the true facts. It is also doubtful whether, if the true facts were before me, I would have issued a rule at all. On the 22nd and 23rd of June, when we were hearing the arguments in Misc. Jud. Case No. 120 of 1950, I made it clear that I was very reluctant to make the rule absolute in favour of the Light Railway Company. I pointed out then that the Light Railway Company was in the position of the person in possession and was entitled to use force to maintain that possession. Had it been a matter between the Light Railway Company on the one side and the District Board alone on the other side, there would have been no doubt that the matter was one to be dealt with by the Ordinary Civil Courts. The stress, however, was, as I have indicated, on the threat of force backed by the State and its officers. This aspect has also been stressed in the present proceeding but the allegations have not been established. In these circumstances, I do not think that a case has been made out for the issue of a writ of mandamus as asked for.

[15] In my opinion, therefore, the petition has no merits and must be dismissed. It remains to consider the question of costs.

[16] I do not think that the District Board and Mr. Khaderan Singh should be granted any costs, since I am not satisfied as to the propriety of their action in agreeing to the consent order on the 23rd June and, nevertheless, taking physical possession on the expiry of the 24th June. It has been contended that Mr. Khaderan Singh acted on advice and in bona fide belief that the purchase was legally complete and the District Board was entitled to enter into possession at midnight of the 24th and 25th June. [After discussion of evidence His Lordship concluded.] It is improbable that Mr. Khaderan Singh took any legal advice to satisfy himself that the District Board was entitled to enter into possession in accordance with the agreement between the parties embodied in the consent order of the 23rd June.

[17] The other members of the opposite party are entitled to costs but opposite parties 6 to 26 will get hearing fees only for one day, as it was intimated on the first day of the hearing that the rule against them had become infructuous and would not be pressed.

[18] In the result, I would discharge the rule and dismiss the petition with costs to the opposite parties other than opposite parties 3 and 4. The hearing fee will be assessed in three sets as follows : Opposite parties 1 and 2 — 5 gold mohars; Opposite party 5 — 5 gold mohars ; Opposite parties 6 to 26 — 2 gold mohars.

[19] Das J.— I have had the advantage of reading the judgment proposed to be delivered by my learned brother.

[20] I think the main questions in issue may be thus formulated : (1) What is the nature of the agreement dated 23.6-1950, on which we disposed of the petitioner's application in Misc. Jud. Case No. 120 of 1950 — was it an undertaking to the Court ? (2) Was there any breach of the aforesaid agreement or undertaking ? (3) If there was a breach, does it constitute contempt of this Court ? (4) Alternatively, are the District Board of Patna or any of their officers guilty of over-reaching the Court in disturbing the possession of, or dispossessing, the petitioner on the midnight of 24-6-1950, in violation of the agreement of 23-6-1950 ? If so, should this Court restore the petitioner to possession ?

[21] My learned brother has quoted in full the agreement of 23-6-1950. I agree with his conclusion that that agreement was a contract between the parties, and not an undertaking to the Court. The distinction between an agreement with the sanction of the Court superadded to it, and an undertaking to the Court on the faith of which the Court sanctions a particular course of action or inaction is not easy to define or determine ; much will depend on the circumstances in which the agreement is made, and the words in which it is expressed to embody the intention of the parties : (see the observations in Nisa Kanto v. Saroj Bashini, A. I. R. (35) 1948 Cal. 294 : (49 Cr. L. J. 567). The agreement in this case did not result in any order of the Court, except disposal of the application without consideration of merits and a termination of the interim order of injunction. It saved "whatever right the parties may have in respect of the matters in dispute" (see the opening clause of the agreement). I accept Mr. P. R. Das's contention that this opening clause does not mean that the points regarding which the parties definitely agreed in the four clauses of the agreement, are to be included in the saving clause, so as to unsettle what has been agreed to. I also accept his argument as to the meaning of cl. 2 of the agreement ; namely, that though affirmatively put, it implies the negative and means that the District Board shall not take possession of the undertaking till the purchase is legally completed. Even accepting the aforesaid contentions, I do not think that the agreement goes beyond a contract between the parties on which the Court disposed of the application without granting any order of injunction. Of course, the formal order of disposal is there, but that does not convert the agreement into an undertaking to this Court. It is worthy of note that the order of 23-6-1950, as recorded, states clearly — "It is agreed to by the parties etc." There is nothing to suggest that there is an undertaking given to the Court on the faith of which the Court is sanctioning a particular course of action or inaction. Mr. Das has contended that on the basis of the agreement the Court refrained from deciding the case on merits, and this would bring the agreement within the category of an undertaking on the faith of which the Court sanctioned a particular course of inaction, that is, refrained from deciding the case on merits. I agree that the Court refrained from deciding the case on merits ; but that does not necessarily mean that the Court did so on the faith of undertaking given to the Court. If Mr. Das's contention is correct, then every action which is dismissed on compromise, without decision on merits, will give rise to a proceeding in contempt on a breach of a term of the compromise. I do not think that that is correct in law.

[22] My learned brother has examined the case law on the subject, and as I am in agreement with him I need not say again what he has already said with greater clarity and in greater detail. It is not disputed that an undertaking entered into with the Court is equivalent to, and will have the effect of an injunction so far that an infringement thereof may be made the subject of an application to the Court for a proceeding in contempt (see Kerr on Injunctions, Edn. 6, pp. 668.669 ; see also Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 7, p. 35, para. 51). But if the agreement does not constitute an undertaking to the Court, what then is the position ?

[23] This brings me to the second question. The learned Advocate-General and Mr. Varma, appearing for the opposite party, have very strenuously contended before us that there was no breach of the agreement of 23-6-1950. Speaking for myself. I find it difficult to accept that argument. We have been taken through the relevant provisions of the Bengal Tramways Act, 1883 ; notification No. 100 R dated 25-6-1901, and the agreement of August 1899 between Messrs Martin & Co. and the District Board of
